AIR RAID

Fire your guns, crash out your sudden death;
Pursue your ends, your self-destructive destiny.
What matters life—or love—or hope
Of Beauty that the world was shaped to bear?
Belch forth your flames, convulse the night
With demonstrations of your maniacal strength.
Enjoy your time—what matters else—
Save noise and fire, the agony of Hell.

Follow on you bombs, release your racks,
Rain down upon your victims numberless.
Stay not your hands from sentimental thoughts
Of desolated homes and military objectives missed.
Why pander to these stupid shibboleths?
The end's the same, and man deserving of no other fate.
Give rein to your sadistic spleen and wreak
Your hideous pleasure on us all.

Crash out you guns, devastate you bombs,
Continue with your dreadful revelry;
Yet remember this,
From out the smouldering ruins and broken hopes
Will come a consciousness from suffering born,
A flaming hate—implacable and stern
'Gainst all you represent of Power and Greed.
From pain and bitterness the weapon will be forged
To smash in turn the might of those you serve.

THE WAR ISSUE

Immediate Anti-War Socialist Government Wanted

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government)

[The following essays were published by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, March 27 and June 12 respectively. Jowett's indictments of Imperialism should be studied and acted on by the entire Labour Movement. He is Labour's most powerful voice of sanity during the present crisis.—Ed.]

(1) DEFEATING HITLER.

We Shall Not Defeat Hitler by Supporting Churchill.

"We must support the war to defeat Hitler," say many of the British socialists who are supporting their Government in this war, although they were whole-heartedly in agreement with the I.L.P. in opposition to the last war.

In this article I want to say why, in my view, those anti-war socialists who believe that by supporting the Government in this war they are helping to defeat Hitler are wrong.

But before I begin I wish to state clearly that I speak as an anti-war Socialist, not as an absolutist pacifist believing in the policy of non-resistance.

I still hold the view which was expressed in the officially endorsed policy of the British Labour Party, until it swung over to the policy of military alliances in the alluring name of "collective security," in the year 1935. For 35 years the British Labour Party, although anti-imperialist and opposed to military alliances, agreed to the provision of whatever military equipment appeared to be necessary for defence. Frequently, the party opposed increases of armaments, but always it was on the ground that the Party was opposed to The Imperialist Foreign Policy for which they were intended, and not on the ground that defence of the homes and lives of our people was unnecessary or wrong.

The first question those who say "we must support the war to defeat Hitler" need to ask themselves is: Are we, in truth, helping to defeat Hitler by supporting the war? A question that cannot be answered without first of all taking account of the fact that supporting the war means supporting the Government in this war, so far as the people of this country are concerned. And supporting the Government to defeat Hitler is a futile policy because it ensures support from the German people for Hitler.

The Government's declared intention is to dictate terms to a defeated and disarmed Germany, which is therefore to be kept disarmed by military force of foreign powers for a period estimated by the British Foreign Secretary Eden at twenty years. Is it likely that the German people will cease to support Hitler with such a prospect before them in the event of defeat, with the memory of terrible privation and humiliation under the dictated peace after defeat at the end of the last war?

How can it be possible for any anti-war Socialist who has not been deceived by war propaganda to believe it is possible to defeat Hitler by supporting the war policy of a Government, the aims and objects of which cannot be trusted by the German people.

What in heaven's name is there in the present military situation to give the slightest encouragement to belief in military victory to which alone the Government is pledged?

The war which, when it began, was the result of a clash between two chief rival imperialisms—the British and the German—was from its first beginnings bound to spread as the combatants sought new allies and strategic bases and as other imperialist powers came in to fight for a share in the spoils of an imperialist war.

Every extension (save one, and that the least desirable one from the point of view of the most influential and powerful members of the British governing class, namely Russia) has brought with it a new crop of difficulties for British imperialism.

The British Empire is in process of rapid liquidation. Humpty Dumpty has fallen and can never be put together again. As "Observer" in Peace News, says:

"The Japanese have conquered Java. Rangoon has gone. . . . The Burma Road has been effectively cut. That is to say that the whole of the Far East is now in Japan's possession; and the possession is secured by natural defences which, when developed by Japan will be practically impregnable."

In this situation nothing in my opinion could be less realistic than to support the Government in the hope or expectation of a military victory to defeat Hitler.

In this situation, more clearly than ever, it has become of vital importance to deprive Hitler and his Nazi Government of support which fear of consequences of defeat with another dictated imperialist peace has induced.

In the war of unimaginable duration to which Churchill and his Government are calling us, and Hitler is calling the German people, there is hope only that common cause in common suffering may bring the peoples of both these nations into the mind for peace.

And the first step to this indispensable approach to peace born of belief in a common cause that we who are anti-war British Socialists can, and must, take if we do not belie our faith, is to get a Government that will challenge the world to a new Social Order by its example.

A Government willing voluntarily at long last to accept liquidation of the British Empire, and to issue a call for peace recognising the right, and agreeing to the distribution of the world's resources for the mutual benefit of all peoples.

(2) THE IMPERIALIST DIE-HARD FOLLY

We have not yet won the war and the day of its ending seems to get further away the longer we go on with it.

Speeches such as that of Lord Halifax, given world-wide publicity in the daily press last Tuesday (June 9th) make an early ending impossible and they also make it practically certain, in the light of past experience, that even if we win the war we shall lose the peace.

Speaking to America and the world at large as British Ambassador to the United States, Lord Halifax declared for the Vansittart policy of punishing the German people as well as its Nazi Government and Hitlerism. So Nazi Germany's chief propagandist, Dr. Geobbels, after making effective use of Lord Vansittart's warning to the German people of the fate which awaits them if they allow Hitler's Nazi Government to lose the war can now put special punch into this war propaganda by quoting the Prime Minister's most trusted overseas Minister, Lord Halifax.

Lord Halifax, like Lord Vansittart, says that when the Allies have won the war they must not treat the German people so well as they did after the last war! Also, in agreement with Lord Vansittart, Lord Halifax assumes as confidently as if the question had already been considered and settled, that the Anglo-Saxon world (that is to say, Britain and the United States) "will be the guardians of peace after the war." Not Britain and France, chiefly, with Belgium and Italy as junior partners, as on the last occasion when the German people were held in subjection after defeat, but Britain and the U.S.A. only.

Others of the Allied nations, including Soviet Russia and China, whose peoples have suffered most and who are the most hopeful of all peoples as future peace-builders, are not thought worthy of notice by Britain's Ambassador, Lord Halifax, in this connection.

Even the Yorkshire Observer (June 9th, 1942) expresses serious concern as to the effect of Lord Halifax's speech, and goes as near to calling for its repudiation by the Government as could be expected by a highly respectable pro-war organ of partisan Liberal non-conformity.

"In 1918," says the "Yorkshire Observer," "Government and people were alike swept away by the cry of vengeance which arose in the first intoxication of victory. The cry will be much fiercer now and will have much more substance behind it."

The effect of this mad policy of lumping the whole German people with their Kaiser-headed militarist Government to the conditions of peace imposed on the German people by victorious powers at the end of the last war, and the certainty with which that policy led to another and worse war, can best be understood by referring back to experience and warnings placed on record at the time.

There is evidence recorded by a cloud of witnesses which were accurately prophetic of the sad experience of these days. I will give two examples whose evidence is quoted in current issues of weekly journals. One is the evidence of Mr. A. G. Gardiner, a journalist of the highest character and reputation who went into Germany and Austria shortly after the last war to get facts concerning post-war conditions. The other is that of Mr. J. L. Garvin who denounced, before it was signed, the Treaty which was forced upon the German people by the Halifaxes and Vansittarts of that day and foretold its inevitable result in this war.

How, having regard to this knowledge of the consequences of such madness, Mr. Garvin has become a regular staff writer for the Sunday Express, is a matter for Mr. Garvin himself to explain. There are many, however, who, like myself, cannot do so.

For this is what Garvin's Sunday Express said last Sunday:

"The real feelings of this country were voiced by Viscountess Simon the other day when she stood on a public platform and said 'I WANT GERMANY WIPED OFF THE FACE OF THE EARTH.'

"'That is my view, too,' said Garvin's colleague, John Gordon, and proceeded further to reveal himself in the following manner:—'Pernickety minds,' reluctantly Mr. Gordon admitted, 'might point out that such extermination is impossible. I agree with them as well. BUT IT IS AN IDEAL. AND I WAS TAUGHT TO STRIVE FOR THE STARS; EVEN IF I COULD NEVER HOPE TO REACH THEM.'" (F.W.J. is responsible for giving Gordon's own aspiration in capitals).

And here I will bring to witness what A. G. Gardiner wrote 24 years' ago, of the results of that dictated peace, won by successful war strategy of starvation blockade and propaganda culminating in the devilish prostitution of President Wilson's Fourteen Points. Here is A. G. Gardiner's unquestioned evidence, recorded at the time, of what decent people can be induced to do to each other when a vicious hate propaganda has been carried on for years:

"'For five years,' wrote Mr. Gardiner of German and Austrian children—'that is for almost the whole of life they remember—they have been starved. They were never worse starved than during THE NINE MONTHS' BLOCKADE THAT FOLLOWED the war. . . . The fortunate ones die (50 per cent. more infants died in Berlin alone during 1919, a year of 'peace,' than in 1913) the rest are starting their life with a physical and mental inefficiency that will make life a burden. The 'English sickness' (rickets) alone, the result mainly of post-war blockade, has claimed hundreds of thousands.'

"Tuberculosis, in all its variations, has swept the child like a plague. In Leipsig there are 8,000 tuberculosis children, in Cologne 10,000, Berlin 30,000. The mortality of older children has gone up by 85 per cent.—nearly double."

("What I saw in Germany," by A. G. Gardiner. Quoted in "Peace News," June 5, 1942).

And this is what J. L. Garvin said at the last dictated peace which followed a starvation blockade war and vicious war propaganda. It was prophetic. We are paying the price foretold now. This is what Garvin then said of the last victory-dictated peace before it was actually signed:—

"If the Germans are wise, they will sign, of course.

"For if they signed and sealed it twenty times over, they, like any other race in their place, would determine to seize every opportunity of mitigation or repudiation AS THE INEVITABLE TROUBLES AND DISSENSIONS OF THE REST OF THE WORLD ARE QUITE CERTAIN TO PROVIDE.

"The root vice of the whole Treaty is that it leaves the German race NO REAL HOPE EXCEPT REVENGE—no matter how long the revenge may have to be deferred. In the whole Treaty there is no glimmering perception of the constructive necessities of Europe as a whole. UNIVERSAL AND ABIDING ANTAGONISM TO IT WILL GIVE THE GERMAN PEOPLE A FRESH BASIS OF COMMON INTEREST. AFTER PASSING NO DOUBT THROUGH CONFUSIONS AND CONVULSIONS THEY WILL BE SOLIDIFIED AND FORTIFIED BY ADVERSITY. IT IS NECESSITY THAT MAKES MEN STRONG, SUCCESS THAT USUALLY BLINDS THEM." (Quoted in 'Forward,' June 6th, 1942—My capitals—F. W. J.).

How truly spoken is the second half of that last short sentence in the light of our own British experience. The British Empire is in progress of compulsory liquidation!

"COMMUNIST" WAR CHARLATANISM

Chapter XVI. of Part I. of Socialism and Parliament deals with Communist Parliamentarism and relates the political charlatanism of William Gallacher.

Since this pamphlet was issued, we have collected a few more entertaining facts concerning this unscrupulous "Communist" careerist.

On Thursday, June 26, 1941, announcing the intended withdrawal of the Communist Party candidate from the Greenock by-election, William Gallacher said:

"The big question is co-operation between Britain and the Soviet Union in the interests of the peoples of both countries. Therefore we will support the British Government in any steps it takes to advance and further that co-operation. . . .

"We have always opposed a peace or a 'sell out' of any kind. We have nothing to do with the peace by negotiating party. I admit in some of our documents we did not make that sufficiently clear."

We deny absolutely that the present governments of the warring nations represent the interests of the peoples of the countries they govern. Hitler does not represent the interests of the German people. Stalin does not represent the interests of the common folk of the Soviet Union. Churchill does not represent the working-class of Britain.

Gallacher's reference to a "sell out" peace is undiluted scoundrelism and worthy of the political gangsterdom to which he belongs. The truth is that, so long as the Hitler-Stalin pact existed, Gallacher and the Communist Party opposed the war and defended a German peace. One can understand a genuine militarist. One can understand a genuine pacifist. But one cannot understand, except in the terms of hireling corruption, this zig-zag militarist-pacifist capitalist opportunism, dictated by the foreign policy of the Kremlin, and not by any proletarian principle or idealism.

In the Sunday Mail for November 23, 1941, Gallacher's message to the Clydeside was reported under the heading: "Communist M.P.'s Victory Call."

Our contemporary said:

"Mr. William Gallacher, West Fife's Communist M.P., has issued a message to Clydeside workers urging them to support the troops in Libya in 'their brilliant offensive' by increasing production."

It then reproduced two paragraphs from Gallacher's message. We quote one, describing the "Libya offensive":

"The offensive will, I am sure, have a tremendous effect on the people of the occupied countries of Europe," he says, "It will give them new hope, inspire them with fresh courage, and urge them to greater acts of daring against the invader. . . ."

This statement of opportunist pretence and pseudo strategic knowledge requires no comment. Gallacher knows as much about military struggle as he does about anti-militarist integrity and Socialist thought. All he understands is how to trade in verbal falsehood for the sake of Gallacher's personal emancipation within Capitalism.

The Scottish Daily Express for November 23, 1941, gave another version of Gallacher's message under the heading "Gallacher urges 'loyal enthusiasm.'"

Beneath this heading, the letter-press read:

"Mr. William Gallacher, Communist M.P. for West Fife, has issued a message to Clydeside workers urging them to redouble their efforts to increase output in support of the troops taking part in the Libya offensive.

"In an appeal to all shop stewards to attend Lord Beaverbrook's meeting at Glasgow next Sunday he asked them to make it 'a mighty demonstration of enthusiastic loyalty to our lads in Libya and for the alliance with the Soviet Union, an alliance Lord Beaverbrook is working so strenuously to implement.'"

Anyone who has seen the film reproduction of Beaverbrook's meetings, or read the Express verbatim reports of his speeches, will know that the man is an ignoramus. As an orator, he is a disgrace to the public platform, as a thinker, he ranks somewhere between the ape and our pigmy aboriginal ancestors. That a great people like the English speaking races, with their famed tradition of speech and writing, should be represented in the hour of crisis by this financial war-lord of the press, who slays in safety on the public platform to the tune of manufactured plaudits, spreading disaster among the human family, is an added calamity to the suffering of our time. Gallacher appealed for public support for this ignoramus, this builder-up of Hitlerism, this consistent pre-war slanderer of the Soviet Union. What a farce!

The Beaverbrook press repays the compliment.

The Sunday Express, June 28, 1942, in its "To-day in Scotland" column, written by Albert Mackie, says :—

"When I met Britain's solitary Communist M.P., Willie Gallacher, he was indulging in an extra pipeful of that strong tobacco he smokes, and beaming with paternal pride.

"His son, Paul Donald, young graduate with honours in philosophy, has just been capped at Gilmorehill."

Is this why the Fife miners turned against Willie Adamson and voted Gallacher into Westminster? That his adopted son might go to the University and receive the Capitalist degree of philosophy. Are their sons likely to be capped with anything except a fall of coal? Is this pursuing the class struggle? What a knave and hypocrite the man is. Recall his manifestoes and denunciations of "the bourgeois I.L.P.," "the bourgeois Anarchists," his attacks on the Free Speech fight; all his climbing assumption of revolutionary speech and approach, and then—reflect! His son is capped at Gilmorehill in the third year of a world war in which the workers, men and women, from the youngest to the oldest, are being conscripted either to death or to arduous tasks, which sap their health and destroy their lives. The proud father's adopted son plays at philosophy in Gilmorehill!

Willie Gallacher turns from his proud nursing to go forward, this over-age militarist, to press for a second front, with Harry Pollitt, Harry McShane, etc. Not one of these hirelings, who have forgotten about the hunger-marches they monopolised for their career's sake, intend to go to the Second and Third fronts themselves. They will remain at the back of the various fronts directing! Instead of chasing these political rogues for their lives, the common folk, here and there, fall for them.

Recall these people's attack on King George V.'s jubilee. Recall their anti-war attacks on the coronation of George VI. All the hot-air that secured the exciting support of the unemployed and the ex-soldier. And it comes to this: in war-time, support Beaverbrook, be militarist, be more militarist than the Government. If some Socialist, who is a Socialist, denounces "Capitalist war," accuse him of helping to spread Fascism round the world. Of, course, the Hitler-Stalin pact did not help Fascism!

To-day, Gallacher, and his satellites, Pollitt and McShane, having burned their past pamphlets and manifestos, as all political charlatans must do to save their faces, by a peculiar logic pretend that there are only two choices before the common people of the world: the imperialism of Hitler or the imperialism of Churchill allied to Stalin.

What has become of their Marxism, of those dinner-hour anti-war economic lectures Willie Gallacher conducted during the last war, as a conscience-sandwich to the manufacture of munitions? Does he not realise that Fascism or Nazism is the last desperate attempt of the Capitalist system to utilize demagogically the social discontent of a dispossesed middle-class to establish an iron dictatorship.

A genuine anti-Fascist war cannot be waged by a government that supports the shoddy platitudes of the Atlantic Charter. It can be waged only by those who support a programme of social justice, who stand for genuine revolutionary Socialism. A genuine programme of Socialism and world peace would break the tie between Hitler and the German people. The business of Socialism, and of the Communists, is not to pursue militarism and destruction, but anti-militarism and reconstruction: to turn national or independent wars into civil wars: to liquidate civil wars into the struggle of ideas: and to restore vision to poor, war-blinded, charlatan-misled working, suffering humanity.

THE BEDFORD PROGRAMME

Reviewed by MICHAEL DE LA BEDOYERE.

[Reproduced from "The Catholic Herald," London, May 15, 1942.—Ed.]

It is a pity that the Duke of Bedford should be almost exclusively publicised as a pacifist and an advocate of a negotiated peace with Germany. And it is an even greater pity that his little booklet, Why Blunder On? should begin with arguments in favour of peace on almost any reasonable terms at the earliest moment possible.

This is obviously a highly controversial question, and the vast majority of the British people will have nothing to do with it. Nor do the Duke's arguments in this respect carry very much weight. They are largely based on his personal belief that we cannot win the war outright, and about the totally unknown war conditions of the future his opinion is worth no more than that of the next man.

It is a pity, then, that this material should be linked up with the Duke's plans and programmes for political, social and economic reconstruction, for many of these are most interesting and highly worthy of discussion apart from the results of the war. In any case, his challenge to the vested interests of Right and Left—the money-power of the few and the money-grabbing of the many—is unlikely to be given a hearing in any powerful organ of press and publicity. But joined with his war-views it stands no chance whatever, and those who have other reasons for refusing to listen can ease their conscience by saying that they will have nothing whatever to do with a "defeatest."

What is the plan? It is a long one, the summary of which cannot even be printed in these reduced columns, still less the commentary that follows it.

But one thing at least seems to me to stand out from it all—and that is that the Duke's reforms seem in no way to clash with Christian and Papal doctrine, but actually embody in practical fashion the social and economic points made by the present Pope and the leaders of the Churches in Britain.

Here are some points :—

DISARMAMENT.—If total is unobtainable, the maximum to which nations will agree, provision being made for further progressive disarmament.

FOREIGN POLICY.—World interests should be considered even before national interests; a survey of world resources to be made, with wealthy countries assisting poorer ones; no enforcing of international authority decrees, but all-round education to see the point of voluntary co-operation for the good of all.

HOME POLITICS.—Abolition of Party system; occupational franchise; Ministers elected by Parliament; Parliament to have right to dismiss either Government or Ministers; Referendum on special issues. New Second Chamber, representative of Churches, education, culture, industry and distinguished servants of the State.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—Work to be performed by Corporations, such as Medical Corporation and Transport Corporation.

INDUSTRY.—Corporations of employers, workers and consumers with Government arbitration for disputes.

EDUCATION.—All children to have equal opportunity up to eighteen, with emphasis on importance of manual training.

PRESS.—Obligatory publication of name of principal owner; no hostile statement against foreign countries without Embassies having right to reply; liability to prosecution for false news deliberately published for private interest.

CHURCH.—Disestablished, but given adequate income for work.

Of course, this brief summary of a summary gives but bare bones, and the real interest lies in the further elucidations. Moreover I have purposely left out the heart of the Duke of Bedford's reforms which are monetary.

His view is that all taxation for revenue and national debt should be abolished, the new money required annually being created by the State, the amount needed by the State being earmarked for its own use. Taxation would be exclusively for the purpose of preventing inflation. The distribution of money would be according to real needs, always taking into account the country's ability to produce or import the goods which the money will be able to purchase.

It is true enough that radical reforms of these kinds, whether intrinsically desirable or not, have little real meaning unless they can be related to what is practicable in the light of what the public, so to say, will stand for. Reformers, like the Duke of Bedford, are too apt to think in a social vacuum. But it is very profitable to look at the matter from time to time from the wrong end of the telescope and—if the metaphor may be changed—work backwards. That way there is much less danger of confusing what the public will stand for with what the vested interests of the country will permit them to stand for.

CIVIL LIBERTIES.

The National Council for Civil Liberties is organised to defend the essential liberties of the people, such as:

The civil rights of the individual.
The rights of democratic organisations.
Freedom of speech and the press.
The right of trial in open court.

The Council makes its appeal to those who know that:

(i) The well-being of the individual is dependent on the enjoyment of full civil rights and liberties;
(ii) These rights have been dearly won in the past;
(iii) They will last only if they are maintained and fought for now;
(iv) It is more than ever necessary to ensure that the forces of reaction do not use the war situation to achieve their traditional purposes.

The Council owes allegiance to no party, religion or creed, but is pledged to defend the equal liberty of every individual and every organisation.

The Mockery of Parliamentary Careerism

Thomas Johnston Indicts Himself

[. . . As will be seen from the reports of our 1921 trial published in recent issues, MacRobert, K.C., was the Counsel who prosecuted us in the 1921 trial. When these trials are issued in collected book form, this essay will find a place in the appendix. Meanwhile we publish it as a separate essay. It is one of Johnston's many indictments of himself for his present-day associations.—Ed.]

In Forward for January 16, 1926, Thomas Johnston devoted three columns to an indictment of MacRobert, beneath these headings—spread across the three columns:—

RECORD OF MACROBERT, K.C.

His Votes for the Rich: His Votes Against the Poor, the Widows, the Orphans, and the Unemployed.

Beneath these streaming headings, the letter-press stated:—

We have received serveral inquiries about the voting record of Mr. MacRobert, K.C., the Tory candidate for East Renfrewshire. Below we give a list of the most important divisions since the Tory Government went into office with Mr. MacRobert's record in each.

Then followed the record. MacRobert did not vote on certain questions where the Labour Party forced the issue, like Women's Vote at 21; Improved Workmen's Compensation; Singapore Dockyards; Widows' Pensions, Ordinary and War. On other issues he voted against the humane or progressive policy. He showed himself either indifferent to the wrongs of the poor or opposed to them.

MacRobert voted against the motion or the amendment in the following issues and so showed himself against the miners, against the poor, against the unemployed, and on the side of the profiteers. The headings are Thomas Johnston's as are the records. We have omitted from each paragraph the words "Mr. MacRobert voted against."

HOUSING POLICY.

On December 16th, 1924, the Labour Party moved the following amendment to the King's Speech:

"But humbly regret that your Majesty's advisers are committed to a policy of leaving the solution of the housing problem mainly to private enterprise and the operation of occupying ownership, thus ignoring the importance of carrying out a long-term scheme of building houses to be let at rents within the means of the working classes, and failing to take advantage for increasing employment in the building and auxiliary industries."

ON THE SIDE OF THE PROFITEERS.

On March 4th, 1925, the Labour Party moved:

"That the composition and the proceedings of the Royal Commission on Food Prices are not such as to inspire public confidence, and this House is of opinion that action, legislative or otherwise, based upon the large mass of evidence already available and designed for the protection of the public against profiteering in the sale of food, should be undertaken without delay."

MUNICIPAL COAL.

On March 24th Mr. Beckett, on behalf of the Labour Party, moved:

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable municipal authorities to act as retail distributors of coal; and for other purposes incidental thereto."

DEAR COAL.

On March 25th the Labour Party moved the following motion:

"That this House calls upon the Government to prosecute measures to prevent excessive charges for coal supplied to household consumers."

AGAINST THE MINERS.

On March 25th Mr. Stephen Walsh, M.P., on behalf of the miners, moved the Coal Mines Minimum Wage Bill to give the miners a living wage.

THE DEATH PENALTY FOR SOLDIERS.

On April 1st the Labour Party moved an amendment to the Army and Air Force (Annual Bill). The purpose of this motion was to restrict the death penalty for soldiers to cases of treachery.

SOLDIERS AND STRIKES.

On the same day the Labour Party moved a new clause to prevent use of military in certain duties during trade disputes.

AGAINST MOTHERS' PENSIONS.

On April 1st, 1925, the Labour Party moved the following motion:

"That in view of the urgent necessity that, wholly apart from the Poor Law, pensions adequate for the proper upbringing and maintenance of children should be provided by the State for all widows with children or mothers whose family bread-winner has been incapacitated, this House calls for the introduction this Session of the required legislation."

THE EIGHT HOURS DAY.

On May 1st the Labour Party introduced an Eight Hour Day Bill.

LEGAL MINIMUM WAGE.

On May 13th the Labour Party introduced a motion in favour of a Commission to inquire into and report upon legal minimum time rates of wages.

FOR DEAR SUGAR.

On 16th June the Labour Party proposed to repeal sugar duties.

AGAINST EARLY OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

On July 14th the Labour Party moved an amendment to bring the Old Age Pensions into operation six months earlier than the date proposed by the Government.

DEPENDANTS OF EX-SERVICE MEN.

On the same day the Labour Party moved an amendment to secure pensions under the Bill for dependants of ex-service men.

PENSIONS AND COMPENSATION.

On the same day the Labour Party moved an amendment to omit clause 25, which discriminated against children receiving workmen's compensation in respect of the death of a parent.

On July 22 the Labour Party moved an amendment to allow pensions in cases where the widowed man dies and children receive compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

A HARD DAY'S WORK—UNEMPLOYED NOTE.

On July 30th, on the Unemployment Insurance Bill, the Labour Party put down a motion to omit Clause 1 (discretionary power given to Minister of Labour with regard to payment of extended benefit).

On the same day the Labour Party put down a motion to postpone operation of the Clause until April, 1926.

On the same day the Labour Party moved an amendment to give persons unable, though willing, to find work a better chance of receiving Unemployment Benefit.

On the same day the Liberal motion that regulations made by the Minister of Labour under Clause 1 shall be submitted to Parliament.

On the same day the Labour Party moved a motion to omit Clause 3 (waiting period extending from three days to a week).

On the same day the Liberal motion to postpone operation of Clause 3 until December, was defeated.

These paragraphs and headings are as set out by Thomas Johnston. Each paragraph, in the original, carried the chorus:

"Mr. MacRobert, K.C., voted against."

Johnston varied the chorus in his account of the following divisions, although the import of his record was the same:

TAXING SILK STOCKINGS.

On May 11th the Labour Party moved an amendment to the Budget Resolutions against artificial silk duties.

Mr. MacRobert, K.C., voted for the Tax on Silk.

FOR DEAR TEA.

(June 9th.) On the clause in the Finance Bill putting 4d. a lb. on tea, the Labour Party moved to substitute 1d. for 4d.

Mr. MacRobert, K.C., voted for the 4d.

FOR THE SUPER RICH.

On 15th June the proposed remission of super tax was opposed by the Labour Party.

Mr. MacRobert, K.C., voted for relief for the super rich.

MORE MONEY FOR WAR.

On July 29th the Labour Party moved to reduce the Supplementary Estimate as a protest against the new cruisers.

Mr. MacRobert, K.C., thought we could afford more cruisers and voted for them.

Let the workers remember this indictment was penned by Thomas Johnston.

By such indictment of MacRobert Johnston, who has never suffered a moment's inconvenience or imprisonment or victimisation for his alleged Socialist principles, attained his present status as an administrator of capitalist society. His present association with the colleagues and successors of MacRobert notwithstanding, Johnston's indictment stands. It classifies MacRobert.

Does any worker believe that we ought to have suffered sixteen months' imprisonment during 1921-22, while MacRobert was climbing to the position of Lord Advocate? The man only escaped becoming a Senator of the College of Justice through the intervention of death. Does anyone believe that a man with such a record, a puny creature of a lawyer, was a lover of law and harmony, an upholder of social justice, a loyal servant of commonwealth? Does any sane citizen believe that we, who opposed the MacRoberts, were the seditionist and that MacRobert was the true exponent of jurisprudence?

How then does parliamentarism elevate the Johnstons to the camps of the MacRoberts?

One point in Thomas Johnston's 1926 indictment of MacRobert makes as strange reading to-day as the above cruiser quotation:

SINGAPORE.

On March 25th the Labour Party moved to reduce the Naval Estimates as an opposition to the Government's policy for intending dockyards at Singapore.

Mr. MacRobert, K.C., did not vote.

To-day, without any apology, by due process of parliamentary opportunism, Johnston is Secretary of State for Scotland in a poorly diluted Tory Government that said, "Signapore must be defended." The Government was right, according to the canons and requirements of Capitalist Imperialism; but how does Johnston explain the propaganda that helped him to rise to position in it as an apparent parliamentary semi-anti-militarist? How does he explain these 1926 tit-bits about the cruiser and Signapore votings. How does he explain his present careerist silence about the Truman Commission Report, the dollar-a-year men corruption, and the general incompetence of the Government to which he belongs?

In our imprisonment we were standing for Socialism not only against the MacRoberts but also against the Thomas Johnstons. We were standing not for violence but for Socialism and Peace. So we were jailed for alleged sedition and viewed with horror by the very folk who had been driven into a servitude of misery and despair since—some even to their graves after an intensified horror of unnecessary suffering—by the anti-social conspiracy of those who jailed us that they might flourish and ape greatness. What shameless hypocrisy!

Our legislators of the parliamentary Socialist movement like their Tory colleagues, are engaged still in this licensed mockery of class society. They fear lest our voice be heard in the land, even as they feared in 1909, when we stood for Freedom of Press and Speech in India, and again in 1921. Only by a strained miracle has our propaganda been sustained. Even then, with rare but marked exceptions, it has been and is viewed still with jealous spite as the activity of a man who is dangerous and has no right to a place in the sun: a man to be written down and slandered, simply because he can think, write, and speak clearly, and for nearly forty years has written and spoken clearly, simply, and directly in the name of Socialism. The 1909 and 1921 trials alone, apart from our four Courts-martial and Free Speech struggle, have earned us our place in the Labour Movement and on its platform. That place ought to be assured to us before it is too late. Small careerism blocks the way of united struggle against the social wrong and tragedy of ruling class violence and exploitation. Upon the calamity of careerism is built the monstrous edifice of perpetuated war and endless mass starvation.

LET US WORSHIP LIFE

By JOHN ROEBUCK

"Man's chief end is to glorify Life and enjoy it for ever."

The business of Living is the biggest Big Business in the world. It is the universal "Chemical Industry Unlimited." Its ramifications extend, or so we profess to believe, even beyond the astronomical universe. It is absolutely immune from liquidation. Plagues, Typhoons, Earthquakes, Wars may dislocate it but never destroy it. Its plant is ever sufficient and adaptable to changing circumstances. It comprises a multiplicity of branches or departments all of which, with but one exception, carry on their appointed purposes with remarkable efficiency and harmony. The exception is, of course, the Human depart. ment. Here chaos has always reigned to a greater or lesser degree—and to-day surely to the greatest degree ever. It is seething with discontent, hatred, cruelty, hypocrisy and every other cause of inefficiency and disharmony.

Here then is our paramount concern: How to bring our department up to scratch. Religion postulates the Worship of God as the only possible way to this end. But it seems to me this proposition is simply begging the question; for is not the Worship of God one of our principal functions even now? And what of its reflection in practice? No. This side-line worship of God simply won't do, because it ignores God's breath. I submit that the worship of Life is what is needed. This would be an all-embracing religion, a practical religion, a militant religion indeed.

Without the slightest irreverence one could say, "In the beginning was The Word and the word was Life." And since it is essentially the motion of life which creates situations of opportunity for human functioning, it follows that every moment of conscious life is an opportune moment for Service. It constitutes situation actual, the conditioned time and place for the fulfilment of individual responsibility. And the propitiation or vitiation of the momentous issue depends upon the exercise of that unique human attribute, volition. Obviously man is an agent of Life, not its master. The situation in which he finds himself was there before him; the objective was there for subjective recognition; the need was there before the potential service, the appeal before the response. For if it be true—and it is certainly our professed belief—that man is a purposeful Being, then assuredly his Purpose must challenge him all along life's way. And he must put his very all into Being. However little his all is, he is not chargeable for more. No guilt attaches to lack. He is in default only for what he deliberately holds back. He must pay his way spot cash, as it were, to the limit of his means. He cannot be upright if he stoops to meanness. To be Righteous in theory and wrongous in practice is duplicity. "O thou invisible spirit of evil, if thou hast no other name to be known by, let us call thee Duplicity." (The italicised words are not Shakespeare's.)

Now, we all ostensibly desire to "make something" of our respective lives, but the fact is that it is Life which wants to make something of us. And it will make something of us eventually—there can be no doubt about that. Life may be hindered in the fulfilment of its purpose but it cannot be frustrated. Man cannot escape his Karma or Nirvana. His soul, like John Brown's, "goes marching on." Even orthodoxy, so vague about most things, is quite definite about that. It says, "O grave where is thy victory? O death where is thy sting?" Indeed, the perpetuity, the indestructability, the All-in-all of Life has been manifested as a positive truth for millions of years.

When God is spoken of as The source of life, two things are implied where there is only one. Life is God. Or, if you will, God is Life. The sooner we realize the One-ness of God and Life the better it will be for us. The idea of their separate-ness is a mental aberration like unto that now largely discounted belief in a personal God. Is not the glorification of God simply the expression of joyous Being? Or can a miserable person glorify God? Surely not! Being prompted to do, the pleasure of doing and the satisfaction of having done a good deed are all, as we say, first "felt in the blood."

One could cite many scriptural passages from which the synonimity of the terms God and Life can be logically deduced. And certainly every Religion primarily teaches man to live. It sets up a mythical or a biographical example and says, "Live likewise if you would serve God." Nor is there any question of capacity or qualification to do so. That is taken for granted. It is simply a matter of choice, not between two masters but between service and disservice to Life. Good and evil being concepts of rational life it follows that all the good and evil in the world is attributable to rational life alone. If each one of us is a Temple of The Living God—"The Kingdom of God is within you" — there is no denying the fact that the living devil often enters to defile the Temple. And many of us seem to like a mess up now and again. "It's only human nature," we say in self-exoneration. We know to-day better than ever what we should and what we shouldn't do. Our feelings tell us, even if we have no thought of an All-seeing Eye. The knowledge is rurimentary that we ought not to injure others since we dislike injury done to ourselves. And there is nothing of the supernatural about such a consciousness. It is plain common-sense.

The Golden Rule, which is the basic ethic of the Christian religion, which is in very truth the Christian gospel in miniature, makes no mention of God. Without affecting its cogency one iota it might be paraphrased thus: "Howsoever ye would that others should live, so live you!" Good-living is the one and only criterion of Godliness. Deeds are adjudged good or evil whether or not they are backed by belief in God. "By their works ye shall know them." "Faith without works is dead." Even our Law-courts modify the Oath to accommodate Unbelievers. And rightly so. Sincerity after all is the quintessence of well-doing and an Unbeliever is not necessarily less sincere than a Believer.

Consider too how we religiously laud and memorialise as heroes those of our kindred who have fallen in War. Many of them have never even pretended to be Christians. But no matter, "Greater love hath no man than he who layeth down his life for a friend." And how very true that is. But how false in the circumstances of war inasmuch as the enemy fallen never merit the tribute. Nay. They have suffered retribution. God has struck them down because they belonged to the devil. They had taken up the sword and had perished by the sword. As they had sown so had they reaped. And these things are said by many of those who boggle at common or garden blasphemy, forsooth! But let one suggest that possibly we reaped at Dunkirk and elsewhere what we had sown at Versailles and he will run the risk of being imprisoned.

But the truth stands irrefutable to-day, despite all religious claims to the contrary, that the whole civilised world is reaping as it has sown. It has sown the wind and reaped the whirlwind. What more striking a contradiction in terms could one cite than, "Civilisation at War?" A still small voice replies, "God in War." And I smile my acknowledgment of its ready wit. Certainly a God of Love taking sides in war rather stumps ones imagination. Moreover, they who accept the religious commonplace "God is Love," must of necessity admit the logical inference, "Love is therefore God." And since love is an expression of human life primarily, a loving way of life should be man's foremost concern.

Jesus was The Christ because He worshipped life. He came "that we might have life and have it more abundantly." He went about doing good. He loved life and all living things. He embraced the whole cosmos in arms of love. He exemplified good-living and stressed the imperative accountability of every individual soul. He was no doctrinaire. He espoused none of the religions of His day. Institutionalism was foreign to Him. His métier was Brotherhood and He was the world's greatest Individualist. And when He said "No one cometh unto The Father but by me," He clearly meant . . . "but by living like me." Here then is the much needed common-ground religion for fallible mortals—The Worship of Life.

WALTZ TUNE

By LADY DUNN

We all know that the Danube is a muddy, yellow river, flowing through an enemy country —and that it is at present full of shipping, barges carrying troops, munitions, and supplies.

It is either a yellow sullen—or a rapid river in flood—but always helping the enemy.

And yet!

Each morning I put on a recording of a beautiful tune called (I suppose foolishly) "The Blue Danube."

It is played by the finest orchestra in the world (and I do not say perhaps) the Philadelphia Philharmonic — conducted by Leopold Stokowski—and it was composed by a certain someone who, drifting down the Danube one summer's day—between vineyards, mountains, monasteries and churches—and being deeply in love—imagined and saw the great river as blue.

What a happy fallacy—and how grateful the world should be to Johannes Strauss.

"And why?" you may ask.

Because any vision of beauty, however mistaken, is still something for which to be grateful.

Anyone who during the darkest "blackout" sees things blue instead of black—is surely someone to be encouraged and thanked.

And so I put on my record every morning—and I dance.

To many this may seem as Nero dancing whilst Rome burns; but the record finished and my dancing done I can with lightened heart, body and mind, the better face the day with its series of disappointments, its struggles—and all the petty annoyances which a war brings, even to those who have found sanctuary and security from the greater troubles.

The Blue Danube!

We hear of optimists—who view the world through rose-coloured spectacles—and are called for their trouble "poor fools."

But I wish that we could see all muddy, yellow rivers as blue; that the crash of the traffic, the shouts of the boatmen, and the dull roar of engines could all melt away into that beautiful waltz tune, and that not only I, but all (and by all, I mean all enemies) could share for a few minutes the same lovely vision—and in the sharing perhaps turn and smile at each other—and in a great "foolishness" find a "greater wisdom."

For even the bird of happiness—so earnestly sought—is blue—bright, shining, heavenly blue—pushing from memory the black and muddy yellow of our present misfortune.

WAR: A STUDY IN FACT

By RUDOLF ROCKER

(Concluded from Vol. III, page 136)

SECOND ESSAY.

The Russian despotism is older, much older than the present German State. It also is much older than the Prussian State, which has had such a terrible influence on the political and social development of Germany. Those who are at all acquainted with history, know, that the Prussian State developed directly under the protection of Russian and French absolutism. The Dukes of Brandenberg—i.e., the predecessors of the Prussian Monarchy — were only paid servants of the French Feudalistic Monarchy; and the Prussian State was allowed to develop as a means of breaking the Austrian political power in Europe, a weapon in the hands of the French despots against the Hapsburg dynasty. The founders of the Prussian State were not allowed to have any political will of their own. They only were permitted to serve as tools in the hands of Russian and French despotism.

When Frederick the Great attempted to assert himself by refusing to give military assistance to Louis the fifteenth against England, France united with Russia and Austria, and Germany was laid waste for seven years. Prussia would have completely disappeared from the map of Europe then, if her king had not thrown herself into the arms of the Russian despot. The Czar saved Prussia from certain extinction, on the one condition that the Prussian ruler became a dutiful and obedient servant of Czarism.

Kropotkin reminds us that, in 1905, the Kaiser was prepared to send an army into Poland to suppress the revolution. But that which the Kaiser only contemplated, Nicholas I. actually accomplished in 1848. At that time, —when the Hungarian revolution everywhere was successful, when the Austrian Monarchy was tottering to its fall, and the German revolution had lifted its head once more,—at that critical moment, the Czar came to the assistance of Austria with an army of 140,000 and defeated Hungary, the last hope of the 1848 revolution in Europe. True, the disgraceful act of Nicholas I., in no way, can justify the equally disgraceful plan of William II.; but it again shows that Germany is not the only danger in the world, the revolutionaries have to reckon with.

Opinions differ as to which state is the greatest menace to the development of freedom in Europe. To Kropotkin, the centre of reaction is Berlin — and he has complained that, unfortunately, he is too old to shoulder a gun to defend France against German Huns. Bebel made a similar declaration twelve years ago when he avowed that, were there a war between Russia and Germany, he would take a gun and march, shoulder to shoulder, with the German bourgeoisie aginst barbaric Russia. To him, the centre of reaction was no other place than Petersburg, and he had as many arguments to urge against Russia as Kropotkin has against Germany. Had Bebel had the opportunity of reading Kropotkin's Terror in Russia he would have many more undoubtedly. In his reasons, Bebel was as correct as Kropotkin; in his conclusions, as false. When Bebel said he would take up a gun and march with the German bourgeoisie against Russia, he denied, thereby, everything he had stated about the "proletarian class struggle." And when Kropotkin said, in his interview with the Russian lawyer, Azieff, "that the people of the Allies must all take an active part in the present war and come to the assistance of their respective governments," it was as complete a denial of the elemental Anarchist principles which he has expounded in such a brilliant way.

That the German Social Democratic Party regard the war from the same point of view as Kropotkin, but look for the enemy in the opposite direction, will appear from the following quotation from Vorwearts:—

"The victory over the Allies of Russia is only necessary because they are allied with Czarism. But that necessity exists only as long as England and France may hinder the destruction of Czarism. . . . We must not pursue, therefore, a policy which may prolong the enmity between Germany and the West European countries, i.e., Germany must not seize any territory nor interfere in the integrity and independence of other nationalities, as that would give Russia the opportunity of playing the part of conciliator in Europe, even should she be beaten. . . .

"If we are not able to defeat Czarism, should the strategical exingency take the place of the political necessity, it may happen the present war will result in another 'Holy Alliance,' whatever the intention of the rulers might be. Instead of an Alliance of civilized nations, Czarism will continue to hold its ruling power. . . . If it should prove to be the case, the present war has lost its justification.

"No! This war must not be a means of usurpation and the building up of a new world-power in place of the British and Russian world-power: but it must be the means of freeing all nations. Freedom from Muscovitism: freedom and independence for Poland and Finland; a free development for the great Russian nation herself, and the destruction of the unnatural alliance of two civilized nations with barbaric Czarism—this is the aim that called out the enthusiasm of the German people, and hence their readiness to make the necessary sacrifices."

The above view, no less than Kropotkin's, may be held by an ordinary radical citizen. It has nothing in common with Socialism, and less with Anarchism. In both cases, it seems to be forgotten that this war, like any in the past, is not in the interest of the so-called culture problems, but to advance certain economic and political ambitions; to extend the sphere of the power of the State and capitalism in the respective countries; particularly a competition of power between British and German capitalism. None of us know much of the secret intrigues of diplomacy. Hence we cannot say who is foremost in responsibility for the present catastrophe, but we know for certain that all governments have been participating in the participating in the secret intrigues and diplomacy of the finance kings. They have been preparing for this war for years, and none were surprised by the latest developments.

In his last work, The Modern State, in the chapter entitled, "The War," Kropotkin explicitly declares that the loan of £50,000,000 the Russian Government received from French capitalists in 1906, under the protection of the French Republic, was accepted for the purpose of crushing the revolution. Kropotkin details the enormous corruption in the French world of finance and ends with these sarcastic words:—

"What a lucky incident it is! The Government of a big State is in danger! It has to suppress a Revolution! Such luck does not occur every day!

But in his letter to Steffen, Kropotkin makes no mention of this disgraceful betrayal of the Russian revolutionaries by the Republican finance kings. Instead he says:—

"Let us not forget again, that when France advanced the loan to the Russian autocracy in 1906, it was because she felt that, if Russia was unable to reform her army after the defeat in Manchuria, France would be torn to pieces by Germany, Austria, and Italy, who were allied against her."

We do not know the secret plans of the German government, and we expect anything but good from her. But, with the best will in the world to believe what he says, we cannot see the logic in Kropotkin's assertion. If Germany really meant to destroy France and occupy Finland, etc., as Kropotkin states, the question is: Why did she not seize the opportunity when the Russian army was paralysed so completely after its defeat in Manchuria? Why did she make no attempt to realise her ambition? Just at that moment the German despot addressed to Nicholas the famous telegram: "Russia's mourning is Germany's mourning." It would have been so easy for it to have been Russia's mourning and Germany's joy!

No! There is no reason, whatever, to change our former attitude with regard to the State and Capitalism. If a revolution had broken out in France, and the Kaiser, with his armies, had attacked her in order to suppress it, then even we would have taken a gun in defence of France. Only in such circumstances can Socialists and Anarchists justify war. Every other war is only a curse to mankind, a hindrance to real progress, and an enemy to every development of freedom. Such is the present war. And as an Anarchist we still stand, today, for the same principles as Kropotkin formerly represented with us, and which we now represent without him and against him.

The whole civil press in Britain and France, the statesmen and politicians, use the same arguments as are employed now by Kropotkin. They all talk of the cultural meaning of this war, and condemn Germany for invading the neutrality of Belgium and for attacking France. But such disgraceful acts are not confined to the German State and the German "Huns." Those great statesmen know this only too well. The subordination of India and Egypt, and the attack on the Transvaal by Britain; the suppression of Morocco by France; the murderous conduct of Italy in Tripoli, etc., prove that the "Huns" do not live in Germany only.

We certainly condemn the brutal deeds of the German armies in Belgium, and our entire sympathy goes out to the innocent victims of the bestiality of militarism. Our sympathy goes out also to the unfortunate inhabitants of Galicia, East Prussia, etc., who suffer the same pain and are in a like helpless condition. They are, undoubtedly, no more responsible for the crimes of their respective governments than are the peasants and workers of Belgium. It is not because we stand for one or the other of the robbers that we tender our sympathy, but because we carry on a fight against the whole murderous system, and its brutal and tyrannical representatives in order to bring about a brighter and better future for mankind.

Militarism may be developed more in Germany, but its spirit is everywhere the same. It is the spirit of barbarism, tyranny, and brutal force. Militarists like Kitchener and Roberts, Joffre and Fayre, Moltke and Kluck, belong to different nations, but are united through ideals and aims, and are, everywhere, the tools of reaction.

Kropotkin talks about the degradation of the German nation during the last forty years, and its thirst for war. According to him, every German is a born soldier, a wild savage who always is ready to spring upon his prey. Kropotkin makes no difference between the German State and the German people. If forty years could produce such a change in a nation, the question is: Then in what condition of decadence and degradation must the Russians be, who were brought up for centuries under the yoke of brutal despotism?

We do not deny the psychological influence of the military system on the spirit of the masses. We are not blind to the corrupting impression made by the pro-German agitation. Though we detest with all our heart this method of poisoning the minds of the people, we must say that Kropotkin's vision of the German people has no connection whatever with the reality. The Germans are no more warlike than any other people. On the contrary, they are inclined to be more peaceful than most other nations. The German Anarchists and Revolutionaries find it a hard fight to overcome the pacifism of their countrymen. Were the Germans more warlike, they would long since have overthrown their military yoke. This sounds paradoxical, perhaps, but those who are acquainted with Germany know this to be only too true.

Thousands of young men leave their fatherland every year, because they hate the barracks like poison. Thousands ruin their health and make cripples of themselves, for the same reason. If they should abolish compulsory service in Germany, not a single soldier would be left in the barracks. Had the German people had any say, we would have had no war. The same is true of other nations, no doubt. This is really the tragedy, that the people allow themselves to be ruled by a handful of bandits!

True, the spirit that rules Germany, to-day, is one of hate, revenge, and murder. The same is true of Britain, Russia, and France. Let Kropotkin only glimpse at the medieval accusations against the Germans, with which the British press is filled daily. Let him give his own verdict about the pogrom-tactics of the Conservative press, and the brutal persecution of thousands of German workers and their families in this country, that cannot be justified on any grounds of exigency. Then let him tell us if Germany alone is the home of degradation and decadence.

A few months ago, the word "Cossack" embodied with it in this country the idea of barbarism and brutality. To-day, the Cossack is the hero of the whole English press. Men like Chesterton and Cunningham Grahame tell us of "the democratic spirit" in Russia, and Kropotkin's daughter idealises the Russian officer in the Liberal Daily News. And this change came about in a few weeks, not in forty years. Is this not a sign of decadence?

We will say nothing about Kropotkin's optimism over Russia's near future. But, if he thinks that, "the unity of all parties against the common enemy will make it impossible for that country to go back to its old autocracy," we sincerely hope that he will not find himself deceived. So far the Russian government has made no compromise with the progressives, but the revolutionaries have compromised with Czarism. Not only has the Russian despot not allowed the least freedom for the moment, but he has suppressed all hitherto existing liberties. For instance, the rights enjoyed by the Jewish people in those parts of Austria that Russia has captured. The Czar has made a few indefinite promises, that is all. Kropotkin knows best what value such "promises" have.

He opines that it is dangerous for a despot to play with revolution. We do not doubt the danger, but we know, also, that often despotism is victorious. The Prussian despot promised his people a constitution, if they would help him to defeat Napoleon I. But when the people had driven off the French, the King forgot the constitution and became a member of the Holy Alliance. It is really danger for the despot to play with revolution. But it is much more dangerous for revolutionaries to play with despotism.

Kropotkin appeals to those who stand for the great principles written on the banner of the International. We stand for them: that is why we are against Kropotkin in the present crisis. The International taught us that the workers have their own interests, which are the same in all countries. It did not teach us that we had to march shoulder to shoulder with our governments, but to unite in the struggle against all government, against all forms of exploitation. On the banner of the International was not written: "Proletarians of all lands kill each other!" But: "Proletarians of all lands unite!" Kropotkin's attitude involves the bankruptcy of international solidarity. Of that he will convince himself when the war is over. But we stand firm and true to the old banner of Anarchism, against State and Capitalism, for the complete emancipation of the whole human race.

Plausible Politicians Poison The People!

THE WAR-TIME ART OF CUNNING AND TRICKERY

BY ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE

War always drags in its foul trail the worst that is in man. The present War is no exception to this rule. Not only do we find otherwise "honest politicians" turning political somersaults in their careerist interests: overthrowing their political aims of peace time, and turning their backs on the ideals that gave birth to their political elevation: but in war we find good Christian people surrendering the very first things of their Faith: reading their Bible through rejecting with violence the Sermon on the Mount, the spectacles of war-mongers, openly repudiating the Peace mission of Jesus Christ, and "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" is now the universal cry of the churches. "When we fight Hitler we fight for God," is their clarion call. "It is the duty of Christ's own to kill Germans," this being the considered declaration of the Free Church of Scotland, as that Church urged converted men and women to go to the help of "suffering Poland," a country whose Protestant and Jew inhabitants suffered more under Polish rule before this war, than it has suffered under the Nazis since the war began.

Our present purpose, however, is to deal with a pretty fair specimen of the cunning and trickery of our Democratic politicians: to show how these plausible rascals are poisoning the people. For, from that standpoint of Christian ethics, our politicians, from Churchill downwards, have become a menace to accepted morality in this Protestant Nation. Without exception (will someone refer us to the exception?) they are as rank as the rottenness of the war system which they support, because it supports them. To-day there is hardly an honest politician in the land: they are mostly liars, and they are lecherous in their mad drive to hoodwink the credulous people who put faith in them. Be it a Churchill or a Gallacher, they are one.

CUNNING CITRINE.

Here is a fair speciment to which we at present refer, and there are hundreds like him. Sir Walter Citrine, K.B.E., described by himself in his book, In Russia Now, as "The Right Honorable." Author of other books, including My Finnish Diary. Trade Union leader and tourist, at the workers' expense, at the battle-fronts of Finland and Russia. A working man's representative, wining and dining with the greatest of the land, and other lands, this Socialist? is a fair specimen of the kind of political pundit chosen to delude the people, and to enslave the minds and intelligence of the simple working classes.

To reveal what sort of a character this Citrine is (and let it be borne in mind that he is the chosen specimen out of scores of others), we refer to his book, My Finnish Diary, published as a "Penguin Special" and which is sent out for human consumpt as solid food. Elsewhere the Editor of this journal has made a pretty full exposure of My Finnish Diary, Citrine's literary vomit which he has since swallowed whole. (Interested readers should read the Book of Proverbs, chapter 26, verse 11; also 2nd Peter, chapter 2, verse 22.)

On page 5 of My Finnish Diary, Sir Walter Citrine writes thus; his opening words:

"On Thursday, 30th November, 1939, to the dismay and horror of the civilised world, Soviet Russia brutally attacked her little neighbour of Finland. Socialists and democrats were stupified at this out burst of savagery."

And now the same gentle Trade Union leader, Democrat and Socialist, has similar words in his subsequent book, In Russia Now, but for another occasion. On page 5, the opening words again:

"In the early hours of the morning of Sunday, 22nd June, 1941, Nazi Germany made a brutal and unprovoked attack on Soviet Russia."

In My Finnish Diary, Citrine shows what a grand people the Finns are. He publishes pictures of bombed Finland and others of beautiful Finn buildings. He expresses his delight at the bravery of the Finns, and he denounces wholesale the crimes of Soviet Russia. He records his interviews with Russian prisoners of war in Finland, states that Soviet troops "physically and intellectually" are "of a most decidedly lower type than the Finns." He records his talks with Soviet prisoners who beg the Finns not to send them back as exchange prisoners to Russia, for Stalin would murder them! Citrine was told not to touch the Soviet prisoners in case he would contract some disease!

Sir Walter says of the Soviet troops whom he examined, "They wore only thin tunics into which no wool had gone in the weaving. . . . Their boots were not made of leather but a sort of composite substance in which felt predominated." He also says, on inspecting a Soviet officer's tunic, "It was a poor flimsy thing made of dark grey cotton, and very little warmer, I should say, than a good dungaree overall." The weather for such wear, it is pointed out, was "45 degrees freezing."

Incidentally, did the reader ever note how active our leading politicians, Tory or Socialist, are becoming with their pens? But it pays! HOW it pays! The Citrines are amassing small fortunes in these days of war, for it will not always be thus. Not always will the British working classes want to read the specious pleas of these political gentry who can so ably put it over a credulous public in the interests of "Democracy").

In the Glasgow Evening Citizen (29/12/41) a report of Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden's visit to the Moscow Front is given. Mr. Eden spoke to German prisoners of war, and he says about the Germans what Citrine said about the Russians. Thus Mr. Eden says, "He talked with German prisoners who did not suspect his identity, and who were inadequately dressed in thin, unlined coats, poor boots."

Compare that with what Citrine said about the Soviets! In his other book, In Russia Now, Citrine very wisely refrains from making any comment about German prisoners of war on his visit to Russia to see for himself. Probably he was not permitted to get anywhere near German prisoners of war. But, while in My Finnish Diary, Citrine shows how the Soviet prisoners of war fear and detest Stalin, we have this in his new book, In Russia Now, "There is no doubt of the veneration in which Stalin is held by the Russian people."

The mockery of the whole thing is enough to make decent men and women sick! When we were on the side of Finland, Russia was bad, very bad. The Finns were Co-operators, Democrats and Socialists. They were the salt of the earth. But as soon as Russia is up against Hitler, and on our side, we hear no more about the Finns. But we do hear quite a lot about the Russians. They are now even Religious: they are now the salt of the earth: they are now fighting for Democracy. When Stalin attacked Finland he was brutal, a savage, a veritable fiend! But now, Citrine in his second book refers to Stalin as "Man of Steel," and Stalin "does not belie his name." We cannot say the same of Citrine! Unless "Citrine" means straw!

Citrine has made it clear that he is dead against Communism. Yet he is now aiding and abetting Communism and helping Stalin to spread his Communism over Europe. Citrine detests the British Communist, because he is British. He agrees with that other turncoat, Morrison, that the Communists' Daily Worker should not see life again. If a foreigner is a Communist, he is a gentleman, a man of steel: a great Democrat. But if a Britisher is a Communist he is the Devil's own! And, unfortunately, the British working-classes mostly agree with Citrine there. They have every love for the foreigner, do these Citrines, because the foreigner treats them well and with much respect. The foreigner wines and dines them, and kisses their hand. But the Britisher: he actually has the nerve to heckle the Citrines: to ask them questions: to show them up!

The Sins of the Father

By Rev. H. J. DALE

Assistant Minister, Baptist Church, Kings Rd. Reading.

Both Government and people in this country will have to undergo big changes of heart and outlook before the responsibilities already referred to can be rightly discharged. The signs are that we still have a long way to go before we reach that point of renunciation a new world order demands. So long as the "Land of Hope and Glory" idea persists, it is impossible to put forward anything in the nature of really constructive proposals, and to abandon it calls for the display of a larger measure of grace than at present we appear to possess. To such an extent are our leaders devoid of vision and imagination that the catch-cry "Destroy Hitler and his gang" is about all one can get in the way of concrete aims from those whose primary duty it should be to make definite proposals whereby all the evil forces that threaten man's well-being may be challenged and destroyed. Contrary to popular opinion, Hitler is by no means the only, or even the greatest, obstacle to human progress. To place the total responsibility for the world's chaos upon the head of one man or one nation may be an essential element in the working of the propaganda machine, but it is as evidently untrue as it is foolish. That the German people and their leader must share a part of the blame, no reasonable person would deny, nor can their conduct in many instances fail to arouse feelings of the deepest shame and disgust. But we should be moving more in the realm of actualities were we to say that the Nazi regime is a product rather than a cause, the inevitable issue to a succession of events for whose emergence others besides Germany must be held accountable. Its working denotes the presence of a disease that has attacked not one nation alone, but the whole world, and is now threatening civilization with total destruction. To track down the real causes of our troubles one must look in more than one direction.

Not the least among these contributory factors—though many try to make light of it—is the faithless, unjust and humiliating terms imposed on a defeated and defenceless enemy at the end of the last war. From complicity in that revengeful treatment of a beaten foe—however one may make excuses for it—we can never be exonerated. A victory that might, if rightly used, have been turned to splendid account, proved, for want of understanding and generosity, a defeat of the very worst kind. When the testing time came we were not big enough to rise to the glorious opportunity that presented itself of wresting good out of evil, and starting the world upon a new course.

The German nation was treated as deserving only of the severest penalties that could be imposed upon them, so that even the moderate and peace-loving elements in the country began to lose hope, while the reactionary influences grew stronger. When finally Hitler seized power and declared his intention no longer to submit to such humiliation, and, if needs be, to gain by force the equality which had been denied, he was acclaimed a national hero and assured of whole-hearted support. What people would not have done the same in similar circumstances? Mr Churchill has admitted that no serious attempt was made to come to terms with the moderate Governments which existed under the Parliamentary system.

To try to belittle the fact that both in the Treaty of Versailles and subsequently the Germans were shamefully wronged, is worse than useless. We and those who acted with us stand condemned. The Armistice was concluded on the basis of President Wilson's 14 points, one of which was that the blockade of Central European Powers should be raised immediately hostilities ceased. Despite this, however, Britain and France persisted in maintaining the blockade until the Treaty was signed seven months later, thus causing starvation to hundreds of thousands of the poorest people and inflicting untold hardships and misery on many more. But why was the blockade continued after an undertaking to the contrary had been given? The answer is, in order to coerce Germany into signing a crushing and vindictive Treaty. The German representatives at Versailles refused to sign a Treaty containing a clause which branded them as solely responsible for the war, and consequently returned to Germany with their task undone. Yet the blockade continued. Eventually representatives were sent who signed, not because they were more favourably disposed to the terms, but for the sake of their suffering fellow-creatures. This completely unjustifiable breach of faith on the part of the Allied Powers speaks for itself, and should not be forgotten when charges of falsity and treacherous conduct are levelled against Germany and other countries.

Then there was the invasion of the Ruhr, followed later by the Ottawa Agreements. The French entered the Ruhr in 1923 beause Germany had defaulted on her reparation payments. She had no alternative. Yet it is significant to recall that the French had to evacuate the Ruhr six months later, having earned nothing from the venture save the implacable hatred of the German people.

The effects of the Ottawa Agreements were even more disastrous and destructive of good feelings. As a result of the economic crisis of 1930-33 a wave of economic nationalism swept over the world. This found expression in Britain in the formation of a "National" Government and subsequently in the Ottawa Agreements. Speaking in general terms these had the effect of making the British Empire a closed economic unit. The result was calamitous for all debtor nations, and most of all for Germany which at that time was the greatest debtor nation in the world. A position that had already been made almost intolerable was now strained to breaking-point. Is it to be wondered at that the people in their despair turned to one in whom they believed deliverance from their persecutors could be found? Commenting at the time on the tariffs and quotas of Ottawa, Sir Archibald Sinclair said that "they would breed in other countries tanks, aeroplanes and warships. Nations were determined not to go on paying tribute to Britain but to acquire raw materials for themselves." How fully justified was that warning we know only to well. German autarchy today is the answer to Ottawa. One by one the birds of ill omen we have let loose are coming home to roost, and more will follow.

Those people who hold Germany solely responsible for plunging Europe and the world into war must not overlook the fact that there was sufficient provocation. Versailles set the course of international events for the next twenty years, and to imagine that the defeat of the Axis Powers is all that is necessary to put things right is to live in a dream world. The truth is that neither victory nor defeat upon the battlefield can achieve the results for which we look. Indeed, the more decisive the one or other may prove to be the less will be the chances of establishing a constructive and lasting peace. Much more than victory is required. The old spirit and methods must give place to something in closer accord with the realities and needs of human life and thought and progress.

When there was none to say her nay, Great Britain did not hesitate to act on the principle of "wider still and wider" and to take the fullest possible advantage of whatever opportunities of expansion presented themselves. We set our feet in every place to which we could gain an entrance, often without any regard for either the rights or feelings of those whose territory we annexed. If this was not aggression, then words have ceased to have any meaning. But memories are conveniently short where self-interest is concerned. Even if occasional twinges of conscience cause a temporary sense of disquiet, it can be laid to rest by the comforting thought that things have changed now. At what precise point in the development of international political relationships this moral transformation took place, no one seems to know. As a matter of fact it never has taken place, and the suggestion that it has is only another typical piece of humbug whereby we try to cover up our own misdeeds by emphasizing those of others. Mention needs only to be made of Africa, India, the Far East, the West Indies, to show that we have little ground for holding up our hands in pious horror when we are told of what terrible deeds others are committing. Have we forgotten that there ever was an Opium War, or that huge fortunes were amassed through "Red Rubber"? Though the average individual does not realize it, the formulation of national policies and their execution are oftentimes more in the hands of the big financial speculators than in those of the Government immediately concerned. Morality counts for little where material advantages are to be gained.

Moreover, if we are sincere in our condemnation of aggression, how is it that we have not taken action long before this? Was not Japan guilty of aggression against China, and Italy in her annexation of Abyssinia? Yet in both these instances the same determining factor is seen directing our policy. Because our "vital interests" — in other words, big profits—were not endangered, intervention by us was allowed to pass by default. In fact, it was to our benefit not to interfere. We and the U.S.A. were supplying Japan with a large proportion of her war materials, notwithstanding all our professions of friendship with China. Was it not we, too, who years ago encouraged and tutored Japan in the use of modern weapons and methods of war? This growing Power in the East at once provided us with a safeguaurd for our imperial interests and offered an attractive market for our manufacturers. Now that she has determined to throw in her lot with the Axis she is denounced as guilty of every conceivable crime against international decency. As to Italy's invasion of Abyssinia, all that needs to be said is that profits from the supply of Iranian oil were considered of greater importance than the fulfilment of any moral responsibility on our part.

A similar inconsistency is to be seen in our alliance with Russia. Here again action has been dictated purely by considerations of self-interest. Not so very long ago leaders of religious and political thought in this country were at great pains to condemn in the strongest terms the anti-God movement, and to show how real was the menace of Bolshevism to our religious and social institutions. More recently still indignation was aroused by what was described as an absolutely unjustified attack on Finland. But suddenly all this is forgotten. We are in imminent danger. Instead, therefore, of thinking of the Russians as "bloody baboons," we are asked to see in Soviet totalitarinism a force making for righteousness. If, however, as has repeatedly been affirmed, Bolshevism and Nazism are but variations of the same evil spirit, and equally threaten the liberty and security of "free" peoples, surely we ought to be as eager to destroy the one as the other.

The truth is that having embarked upon a most perilous enterprise, those in high places are determined to go on with it in complete disregard of the future troubles and embarrassments they are storing up for themselves. The tide that might have taken us upon a very different course was allowed to run out without our availing ourselves of it.

FROM SOLDIER TO PACIFIST

CHARLES H. COLE
Portrait taken in Cairo in 1916.

In Portsmouth, the cause of Pacifism is maintained boldly by our comrade, Charles H. Cole, Minister of the High Street Unitarian Christian Church. Mr. Cole offers the direct contrast to the over-age conscientious objectors who occupy political positions of distinction as directors of warfare in the councils of Government to-day. He served in the last war and from experience in France and Egypt developed a strong opposition to war.

Mr. Cole's present pacifist activities in this country include speaking tours in many parts of England for the Peace Pledge Union, and he is now Chairman of the Portsmouth Group (P.P.U.), Secretary of the local Advisory Bureau for C.O.s; and Chairman of the Hampshire District Committee of the Southern Regional Board for C.O.s.

In this issue we publish a picture of comrade Cole in uniform, taken in Cairo in 1916, whilst "on active service" with the New Zealand Expeditionary Force.

In 1935, comrade Cole was the unsuccessful I.L.P. candidate for the City Council, at Christchurch, and polled nearly 5000 votes. One local paper summarised his career at the time of his canditature as follows:—

C. H. COLE: Mr. Cole, the eldest of the four nominees, is a returned soldier, having seen service both in Egypt and France. He was educated for the ministry, but after serving four years as minister of the Baptist Church in St. Albans, he resigned to take up the position of secretary to the "No More War Movement" in Christchurch. Mr. Cole is President of the Canterbury International Relations Club, secretary to the Free Religious Movement, and also the secretary to the Canterbury Unemployed Workers' Association.

Another Christchurch paper described the work attempted and achieved by comrade Cole on behalf of the relief workers in Christchurch. It related an incident when he led a deputation of relief workers and their wives to the City Hall. The Rev. J. K. Archer, then Deputy Mayor of Christchurch, left the building without seeing the deputation, and excused this shirking of his responsibilities by declaring: "Mr. Cole is an irresponsible person."

The Rev. T. K. Archer thus placed on Mr. Cole's shoulders the full responsibility of meeting the demands of the hungry men and women. This responsibility says the report, has been adequately discharged. Clearly where comrade Cole succeeded, the Deputy Mayor, with his civic authority, ought not to have failed.

The paper added that Mr. Cole was "a forceful speaker and assiduous worker on deputations and at demonstrations."

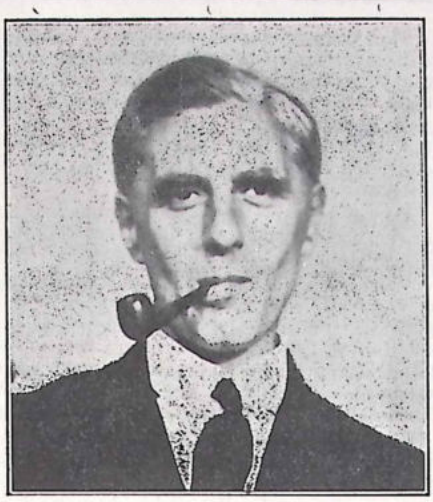
In March, 1929, Mr. H. Ormrod, Secretary of the New Zealand Baptist Young Men's Bible Class Union, put the seal on Mr. Cole's work as a Baptist pastor in the following letter:—

51 Bowen Street,
Musselburgh,
Dunedin, 26/3/29.

Pastor C. H. Cole,
St. Albans,
Christchurch.

Dear Charlie,—At the annual meeting of our Union you were accorded a hearty vote of thanks for your faithful service as "Editor" of "Christian Manhood," during the last two years.



CHARLES H. COLE
Unitarian Minister and Pacifist Propagandist

Your efforts have been much appreciated and it is felt that the Editorship of the paper has, under your guidance, reached a high standard.

Yours as ever,
(Signed) H. ORMROD,
Hon. Secretary.

We reproduce this letter because it is the custom, in war-time, to underestimate the more orthodox or conventional services and status of those who become Pacifists and Socialists.

In February, 1938, as a passport of introduction to Pacifist and Socialist comrades in Britain, comrade Cole received the following letter from Mr. N. N. Bell, M.A., B.D., Chairman of the No More War Movement of New Zealand:—

134 Fitzgerald Street,
St. Albans,
Christchurch, 28th February, 1938.

To Whom It May Concern,

The bearer of this letter is Mr. C. H. Cole, who is a member of the No More War Movement of New Zealand and of the Free Religious Movement of Christchurch. Mr. Cole held the office of secretary in N.M.W.M. and was closely associated with myself in carrying on the F.R.M. Previously he was a Baptist minister. He has had various experience, being at one period closely associated with the unemployed workers' movement in this city. He is now on his way to England. Mr. Cole has done during the last 15 years or so much public work, being a practised speaker. He has travelled all over New Zealand on peace work and is fully acquainted with the conditions of the peace movement in the Dominion. Any assistance that may be given to him will be much appreciated by the writer.

(Signed) N. M. BELL, M.A., B.D.,
Chairman of the No More War Movement of N.Z.;
Chairman of the Free Religious Movement of Christchurch.

Mr. Bell edited "Cosmos", a quarterly journal of Pacifist Thought whose watchwords were "UNITY, UNIVERSAL KINSHIP, UNDERSTANDING." In its issue for March 1936, "Cosmos" published a very full account of the work of the Christchurch Socialist Guild of Youth, founded in May 1932, of which comrade Cole was the leader. This Guild used the British Socialist Sunday School Hymn Book.

In London, comrade Cole spoke in Lindsey Hall, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, under the auspices of the Free Religious Movement. The leader of the Movement at that time was the Rev. William Hayes. In its calendar for September to December 1938, the Free Religious Movement welcomed Mr. Cole in the following note:—

Our visiting speaker, Mr. C. H. Cole, will give addresses on October 9th, November 13th and December 11th. For ten years Mr. Cole has been associated with Mr. N. M. Bell, M.A., B.D., in the Leadership of the Free Religious Movement in New Zealand. And Mr. Bell started with direct inspiration from Dr. Walsh. The teaching of the F.R.M. has girdled the globe!

In the Programme of Subjects, Mr. Cole's approach was indicated as follows:—

October 9—SOME PERSONAL CONVICTIONS.

Mr. C. H. Cole, joint Leader of Christchurch (N.Z.) F.R.M., will give an outline of some conclusions about Religion and Life.

November 13—THE REAL REVOLUTION.

Mr. C. H. Cole will show that there is only one Revolution. That Revolution signifies a change of mind. To what?

December 11—THE DIVINE NEED OF THE REBEL.

Mr. C. H. Cole will tell what happens when a devoted soul with high moral purpose allows the currents of the Universal Being to flow through him.

The motto for the Free Religious Movement at this period was taken from the Buddhist Scripture:—'As a mother so long as she lives watches over her only child, so among all beings let boundless goodwill, unmixed with enmity, prevail throughout the world."

When Mr. Cole left New Zealand in 1938, he intended to return in 1940. Consequently, he left a wealth of record and press cuttings behind him. Instead he passed to the charge, as a lay minister, of the Portsmouth Unitarian Church, early in 1939, and has remained there since.

On the outbreak of the present war, on Sunday, September 3, 1939, he made a personal confession of pacifist faith from the pulpit of this church, in which he quoted at length from Dick Sheppard's pamphlet, "The Christian Attitude to War." He quoted verses from Canon Stuart Morris denouncing "Conscripting Christianity." and the "old unfaiths." Stuart Morris states clearly in this work:—

"... individual Christians must testify openly by their attitude to war, however it may be disguised, that they believe it to be irreconcilable with Christian principles and Christian practice."

In this pulpit confession, entitled

"I RENOUNCE WAR"

Mr. Cole said:—

To-day Britain has declared War upon Germany, and the era of Peace for which some of us have so earnestly worked and prayed has been suddenly and ruthlessly denied to us.

Confronted with this tragic situation, I have considered it to be my duty to-night to let you know just what is my attitude towards it. In these last few fateful days, whilst we have been anxiously waiting for the issue to be decided, I think I have understood, with perhaps a clearer understanding than ever before, that cry which was wrung from the very depths of the soul of our Master—Christ—as He contemplated the sacrifice He was being called upon to make: "If it be possible—let this cup pass from Me." For I had hoped that never again would I have to face a similar issue to that which I faced in 1914; but now, twenty-five years later, the necessity to do is forced upon me and upon us all.

When I definitely became a pacifist, I mentally resolved, that if another war should come and I found myself then in a position of leadership and responsibility, particularly as the minister of a Church and the leader of a congregation, I would immediately make clear my own attitude and position. That resolution I must now honour, as a duty I feel I owe both to myself and to you. . . .

I shall not enter now into the pros and cons of the War. In any case, it is extremely doubtful whether we know enough of the true facts concerning what has led us into it, which would enable us to properly understand and estimate the real situation. Probably, as in the last Great War, the truth will not emerge until long afterwards;—just now we remember Lord Ponsonby's dictum, that "the first casualty in wartime is Truth."

But in any case I am one of those who believe that all war, for whatever purpose, is wrong—a crime against humanity and a denial of all true Religion which is based on belief in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

And I declare I shall not support, nor participate in this or indeed in any war, in any way whatsoever.

My pacifism is based primarily upon my Christian beliefs. . . .

If individual Christians would everywhere make that confession, the churches would be compelled and would have the power, to make it impossible for their Governments to continue to wage war.

And if you agree with me that war is sin, the least that you can and should do, is to renounce it absolutely and to act continuously upon the assumption that no Christian can consistently engage in it for any purpose whatsoever.

We are called at such a time as this to an utter loyalty to our Leader and Master, Christ, and "to lay hands on this amazing world and dedicate it to the glory of God and the welfare of man."

Part of comrade Cole's Armistice Day Address, 1940, will be published in our next issue.

Such golden opportunities as have been ours seldom recur. In our frantic endeavour to safeguard our temporal and material well-being, we have come desperately near to losing our soul.

What value is there, for example, in promising freedom to peoples now suffering under German oppression, if we persist in withholding the right of self-determination from those to whom it is in our power to grant it? In India and Ireland we see how our denial of the liberty justly demanded has borne the fruit of prolonged discord and bitterness. No war emergency pressure can now make good what our lack of goodwill and weak statesmanship have failed to achieve in the past. Far from increasing liberty, war only stifles it and endangers whatever element of it remains. This is becoming clearer every day.

The expedients to which we have been compelled to have recourse prove how weak is the foundation upon which our cause rests. A purpose prompted solely by considerations of love, truth and justice requires no such compulsory urges and restrictions as have marked our war effort. Patriotism is not to be measured by the determination that one's own country shall maintain political and economic ascendancy over others, but by a disinterested pursuit of those high ideals that are the common inheritance of all and without the enjoyment of which neither men nor nations can fulfil their true destiny.

A SOCIALIST SHOULD BE RATIONAL

By

S. W. FRANCES

To-day is the day of propaganda, the period of the LIE. Nations have arisen and grasped the sword, whole empires are divided into only two sections of thought, War and anti-War. The thinking capacity of the individual has diminished, now people think in groups. They support this idea or support the opposing idea; not as rational human beings, but because the particular idea which they believe, is propagated with all the power of the press and the radio, or alternatively by their own party press. If people do not support the popularised, conventional beliefs, it is because they are "cranks"—or, in other words, because they think for themselves.

We have seen in Germany the effects of the propagation of the lie. Hitler's well-known statement that the bigger the lie the easier it will be to put it the lie across, has been proved abundantly in Germany. Literally millions of Germans are the worshippers of Hitler, millions of Germans support his aims and his ideals, and in all probability those same millions can only repeat in defence of Hitler's aims and ideals, phrases that have again and again appeared in the columns of the German Newspapers or which have been hurled countless times across the ether.

The age of propaganda is exploiting people in a manner that they have never experienced before. In medieval times, popular support was obtained by State repression. Ideas and actions contrary to the State's interests were punished with violence. This method was not satisfactory. It created a strong feeling of hostility from the population against the Government.

Now it is possible to obtain the popular support without creating the hostility. If the same idea is propagated with sufficient energy, if the same philosophy and ideals are presented often enough and long enough, with no opposition ideas receiving publicity, the populace will begin to believe that the ideas propagated are true and just, and will believe in those ideas even to the pitch of fanaticism. The hostility towards Government repression has disappeared and people will not believe in the propagated ideas on pain of punishment, but will believe in them because they see those ideas to be the best ideas. There being no very conspicuious alternative to the Government point of view, what else is there for people to believe or place faith in?

Is this propaganda phase to be exploited by the Socialist? The Socialist has an idea, a point of view, a philosophy of life. He believes that, for the benefit of humanity, Socialism should be achieved as rapidly as is possible. Can he secure the best results by propaganda and by inducing people to act on their emotional instincts, or is it preferable to rely on peoples resoning powers? Is he to propagate Socialism to the degree that Nationalism is propagated in the warring countries of the world? Is the red flag to replace the Union Jack, Lenin Mr. Churchill, and "die for Socialism" replace "die for England?"

Doubtless many readers have been to meetings that have been held up and down the country. They have heard speaker after speaker supporting various social projects. They may have, as have countless others, had their hearts wrung with grief, been filled with intensified indignation, felt revulsion to injustice coupled with sympathy for the speakers cause; they may have formed part of the huge audience that has dipped deep into its pockets to supply money for the cause the speaker has defended. In the last few years, thousands of pounds have been raised by eloquent public speakers, who with masterly skill have produced lumps in the throats of their audience, who have fired the hot-heads and produced in all a tremendous emotional response. Remember the "Aid to Spain" meetings.

Is this method the method that the Socialist should use to its fullest extent. Those audiences had no logical, historical, or true reasons put before them. They were not able to see for themselves the "truth" in the arguments. Instead, their emotions were played upon. A specific example of injustice was introduced and with many emotional side issues, featured as the centre of the speakers case.

Undoubtedly this produced an admirable effect. If therefore the Socialist is convinced that Socialism is for the benefit of all people, and if he believes that few people of to-day will take the trouble to think about things clearly and logically, is it not better to obtain the support of the people by emotional stress? Having obtained their support and put Socialism into operation by the very value of a practical demonstration of Socialism he can then create the logical and intelligent thinking that he would really like to see.

A glance at history shows clearly that when changes are caused, it is not because the people stand up and clamour saying "we can see logically and intelligently that the present conditions are bad; we therefore need to change our condition." No, change in Society is caused by the emotional opposition of the people against a system, coupled with the influence of material environment upon them; combined together, this synthesis bursts asunder the old regime, and creates, willy-nilly, a new regime.

If change can therefore be produced by the emotional appeal to people, by all means must our Socialist use this method. But there is an essential factor. The people will be following blindly their emotional dictates. It is the Socialist who will be guiding the flood of emotionalism with its material power, along the paths to Socialism.

But all is lost if our Socialist, too, loses control of his thinking self and is swept away by the emotionalism that he has helped create. Our Socialist must maintain at all costs his ability to think clearly. He must be able to weigh up carefully all the pros and cons and not to follow his party blindly. Whatever new ideas develop within the party they must be fully considered in order that a fair judgment may be formed. He must decide whether these new ideas are oppositional or whether they may not be helpful.

Socialism may be achieved by the use of emotionalism. But Socialism can only be continued by the development in all people, of the ability to think clearly and rationally. How much responsibility thus falls upon the Socialist? He must learn to think logically himself, from his own opinions and not blindly accept the dictates of his party.

NORTH WALES TRIBUNAL

The Welsh National Party has complained to the Ministry of Labour about the conduct of the Chairman of the North Wales C.O. Tribunal, His Honour, Judge Walter Samuel, K.C., when dealing with Welsh Nationalist C.O.s. The conduct of the chairman is illustrated by reference to the case of Mr. Hywel D. Roberts, whose case was heard at Caernarfron, on Friday, December 19, 1941:

Mr. Roberts, in pleading his conscientious objection to being called up under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, expressed, as was his moral and legal duty under oath, his whole conscience, including therefore his objection as a Welsh Nationalist. In examination the Chairman referred to the Welsh Nationalist Party, of which Mr. Roberts is a member, as y "y Fyddin Gymreig" ("the Welsh Army"). When corrected by Mr. Roberts, the Chairman clung to his designation, adding "Bu bron i'ch Byddin Gymreig chwi fynd i ryfel a Lloegr ar fater Ysgol Fomic Llyn" (Your Welsh Army nearly went into war with England over the Lleyn Bombing School").

Later, referring to this side of Mr. Roberts' case, the Chairman told the applicant "that he had unnecessarily harnessed himself to a question of prejudice. It would have been quite ample for you to have merely stated your case on Christian and pacifist grounds.

In the course of further examination, Mr. Roberts referred to the case of Mr. Glyn Williams, who, he understood, had at Colwyn Bay been given exemption on national grounds; the Chairman replied that "that applicant had also been foolish enough to harness himself to Welsh Nationalism."

The letter of the Executive of the Welsh Natinalist Party, dated January 21, 1942, avers that this case proves "the unmistakable animus and prejudice against Welsh Nationalist applicants exercising their undisputed rights under the Act."

The Ministry of Labour replied on February 5, stating that it is satisfied that the chairman carried out his duties in a fair and impartial manner.

The Nationalist Party replied on February 16, stating that the reports, both Welsh and English, which had been submitted, could not have been considered by the Ministry.

The Minister of Labour replied on March 11, maintaining his previous attitude of satisfaction.

The correspondence has been sent to Welsh Members of Parliament, with the request that the matter be raised on the floor of the House.

The Duke of Bedford

In the House of Lords on Tuesday, July 21, the Duke of Bedford made his third pacifist speech as a member of the legislature. We have now the official report before us. The Duke followed Lord Cranborne, and was interrupted by Lord Mottistone (better known as Major General Sir John Seeley), who asked if he was in order. Lord Snell, acting as leader of the House, said that the rules were very wide, and the Duke proceeded to attack the Prime Minister. Lord Gainford rose. As the oldest peer present (he is 82) he moved that the Duke be no longer heard. Gainford, formerly Joseph Albert Pease, is notorious as the one-time Chairman of the anti-working class Federation of British Industries---the British F.B.I. !

Lord Strabolgi opposed the motion and Viscount Bennett protested against it mildly. In a brief and severe speech, agreeing to the expressed wishes of these Lords, the Duke promised to speak on a more relevant occasion.

The Duke's third, and interrupted, speech is the most important and vigorous speech he has made in parliament. It will be issued in pamphlet form this month, at 2d, post free 3d.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir,—I have pleasure in sending subscription renewal for "The Word." With best wishes for your continued championship of Peace and Liberty.

Yours faithfully,
ROYSTON E. MOODY.

London, N. 10, May 12.

Dear Sir,—I have pleasure in enclosing subscription for "The Word," and would like to congratulate you on the service you are giving to freedom by the outspoken comments and views expressed on the most horrible of crimes—war.

With best wishes.

Yours truly,
W. A. MACKAY.

Leith, May 11.

Dear Guy Aldred, — The May edition of "The Word" and your article in particular is excellent.

With best wishes.

Yours fraternally,
LEONARD DUTHIE.

Aberdeen, May 12.

Dear Guy,—The articles republished in "The Word" under "Regeneracion" seem to laud the forcible intervention of the Spanish Brigade against General Franco, and it stands up for Conscientious Objectors. If it was right to fight Franco who is said to be, and I think on good grounds, the agent of Hitler, why is it so wrong to fight Hitler and all he stands for?

I may have misunderstood, but it seems absurd for "The Word" to support Spanish Intervention and be so gracious to Conscientious Objectors, who will not fight Franco's Master whilst "some" of them will fight Franco!

I know that an ardent fighting and fire-eating Conservitive will, sometimes, support a Conchie on some Religious Principle or Ethic, and even on Political grounds.

But, I am sure you will not shield behind this sort of attitude, as yours must be qualitatively quite different. What are you doing to tolerate killers, even if, in their own discretion?

Yours sincerely,
CHAS. E. BERRY.

Paignton, May 26.

[We reproduced the "Regeneracion" leaflets because they established our opposition to Fascism. We were opposed to Franco and we were opposed to the hypocritical policy of non-intervention, under cover of which the Capitalist "democratic" governments advanced the interests of Fascism in Europe. Our comrades Jane H. Patrick and Ethel Macdonald went to Spain to play their part in the struggle. We are in favour of conscientious objectors and see no contradiction in this fact. We do not believe that Vansittart, Londenderry, and Donegall stand for Democracy against Fascism. The war against Fascism is not of arms, but of ideas and ideals. No supporter of Imperialism can overthrow Fascism. Opposition to Fascism implies a struggle towards a new social system. No one is more opposed to Fascism than Lord Wedgwood. No one is more willing to fight Fascism. No one has defended conscience more strenuously. The matter will be treated fully at an early date. The "Regereracion" leaflets will be reprinted, as occasion permits, until every one is reprinted. They are facts and belong to history. We were opposed and are opposed to Fascism. We are opposed to Imperialism.—Ed.]

Dear Sir,—I should be glad of another 6 copies of the Duke of Bedford's great pamphlet, "Why Blunder On?" I should like to congratulate you on the excellent way you have presented the work to the public. I am sure you will agree that such a fine effort as the Duke is making deserves all the encouragement, and support we can give it.

With my best wishes.

Yours faithfully,
NORMAN F. HAYWARD.

Bournemouth, May 12.

Dear Comrade,—I am expecting a summons to the local court or to the appellate tribunal to show whether I have reasonable excuse for not complying with the local tribunal's order to take up full time work under the War Agricultural Committee. There has been one attempt by the 'would be' little Hitlers in the town to force me out, it's a long story and I won't bore you. I am quite willing to work on certain lines on the land. There is an established relationship between the ill-health or infertility of soils and the ill-health of the people that live on them. Only a highly fertile soil will grow healthy food, and the present trend of the controllers of our agricultural policies is to grow as much as possible by any means, without any thought of the decline in fertility, which has never been regained since the last war.

I would like to see a small corner of "The Word" devoted to this side of Pacifist and Socialist thought. We C.O.s on the land can do much to carry the message and lay the foundations of good health for future generations. If you care I will write you a short article on my pet theory, if when you have read it and think it worth while to put it in "The Word" I shall feel honoured.

All good wishes in the Struggle.

Sincerely yours,
CUTHBERT LEIGH.

Keswick, May 13.

Dear Sir,—You will be glad to know that I have posted both an April and May number of "The Word" to each parson in this town. Also to the Mayor. Hope the copies do good.

I send herewith what John Wesley said about war, copied from his book on "Original Sin." I feel sure it will do good printed in "The Word."

Yours faithfully,
H. GOOD.

Nuneaton, June 1.

Dear Sir,—I have just finished a very illuminating novel of Glasgow life in the '70's by Guy McCrone, "Antimasassar City." Perhaps you have read it, but in it you get a clear picture of the social struggle, when progress is measured in terms of the distance one's domicile is located west of the Saltmarket.

It will be rather interesting if Herbert starts to keep his eye on Bob. The Duke of Bedford's speech served to accent sharply two of the many schools of thought in the British Academy of Unity, and although the results will not be blazoned throughout the press, it will act as a rallying ground for all humanitarian thought.

"The Word" is a truly remarkable paper. If it has any policy it seems to be that of providing a platform for anyone with a sincere contribution to make towards the realisation of true social relationships.

With best wishes.

Yours sincerely,
THOMAS MILLAR.

Norwich, May 24.

Sir,—Some time ago there was a slump in gas masks. Every man, woman and child slung gas masks over their shoulders, yet still the shop windows were full of gas masks which no one wanted. Then huge posters appeared—"Hitler will give no warning" and there were illustrations to show how the people were to affix their gas masks. The chemists offered gas ointment for sale which one told no one bought. Still there was no demand for this altogether superfluous decoration. And now again the pressing invitation to the Germans to use gas is again being issued. But the truth is that no gas has been used in this war except by the British who murdered hundreds of the German minorities in Poland with this poisonous weapon. The Fuhrer's eyes "azure as the heavens" were blinded by gas for several months in the last war. He has sworn that never if he had the command of an army would he allow gas to be used—(he has kept his word).

BEATRICE MARSHALL.

Sydenham, London, S.E., June 2.

[We do not agree with the gas mask campaign. We hold that this is war propaganda, the propaganda of fear. We have never had a gas mask and would refuse to carry one. A little while ago, we informed the authorities that, if we were imprisoned for our war opposition, we would refuse, in prison, to have a gas mask or to participate in gas-mask drill, whatever the consequences. That is our considered and definite attitude. But we are not prepared to accept, without evidence, Beatrice Marshall's statements. We are unwilling to be moved by the bias of anti-patriotism. We would like to know the facts about Poland. We are not willing to accept Hitler's word in this matter. Hitler is a power politician like the other statemen of Europe. We believe that he had the opportunity to prove himself a great man and to save the world from desolation. He wasted that opportunity. He destroyed culture and built concentration camps. He warred on free opinion. We are his enemy. But we do not consider the way to social freedom in Europe and the world is the way of Imperialist war. We are opposed to the money changers who rule in the Temple. We stand for a new social system. We are opposed to Hitler, to High Finance, to War, and to Capitalism generally.—Ed.]

Dear Comrade,—It must be three years since I last saw "The Word." Now that I have again become a subscriber it is a great joy to find that you are carrying on as vigorously as ever in spite of all that has happened to discourage such efforts.

My own pacifism and socialism has been strengthened by the experience of war, but times are bitter indeed for those of us who are able to discuss the grim tragedy behind the trumpetings and mass hysteria. Hence the value of such journals as yours is greater to-day than ever. I only regret having denied myself the informative pleasure of reading your journal before war.

Sincerely yours,
MAURICE CRANSTON.

London, June 9.

Dear Sir,—Have been reading "The Word" for a good while. Have had it lent, but now I have several friends I would like to be able to read it. Hence, desire to have it sent regularly. Would consider it a favour if you could send me May's publication, as it is particularly fine.

Wishing you every success for the future of your paper "The Word."

Yours sincerely,
D. PEARSON.

Leeds, May 14.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I have been receiving odd copies of "The Word" from various friends, in London, and find that I began to expect it so I herewith enclose subscription, to make it a certainty

Trusting that your good work will keep on.

I am, yours sincerely,
JOHN H. BREWER.

Barkingside, Essex, June 1.

Dear Sir,—I was very pleased to receive the current issue of "The Word" and particularly that of last month containing the Truman Report.

Recent Press reports have spoken about the cartel system between I.C.I. and America and German Chemical Combinues, also, that the British Government by placing orders with American firms which used German patents, have indirectly been paying royalties to German arms firms, while the Standard Oil Co. have been accused of giving a secret synthetic rubber patent to Germany just before that country and the U.S.A. went to war. As I feel that a large number of your readers might be interested in the arms traffic, perhaps in your future issues of "The Word" you might be able to supply more detailed information concerning the recent activities of these arms trusts, and also, the precise particulars of the Comptroller General's Audit Account on arms profiteering. I do not know how many of your readers are interested in the immorality of war. However, on the back page of yesterday's "Daily Dispatch" there was a newspiece headed "Army Sex Talks Attacked." It contained part of a report made by the Free Church of Scotland, who intend sending in a protest to the authorities concerned, and I thought if you could get a full account of this and other particulars concerning immorality, such as whether illegitimate births have increased or decreased since the war; brothels for troops, etc., the findings of the committee on the A.T.S. who made an enquiry into alleged reports of indecency, than an essential service would be given to the community and be of extreme interest to your readers, in reporting the facts.

Yours fraternally,
JAMES N. LUND.

Since the early days of the war the national press has followed the practice of ignoring speeches made in Parliament which represent the so-called minority view. That a vast number of people agree with the views expressed from time to time by Members of the Parliamentary Peace Aims Group, all of whom are Labour Members, has been demonstrated by the reception given to the Group's first publication Ignored Speeches. With this encouragement it has been decided to issue a second volume entitled More Ignored Speeches, which reproduced the views expressed in Parliament by Members of the Group for the critical period May 1941 to March 1942.

Published by The Parliamentary Peace Aims Group. Price 1s. each, post free; 10s. per dozen, post free.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR'S LETTER

Dear Guy Aldred,

My case is the very common one of refusal to submit to a "medical," and also refusal to comply with a Ministry of Labour direction to undertake work at a first-aid post and refusal to enter the N.F.S. I should make clear that the "medical" I refused was in order to enter the N.F.S.

I had previously registered as a conscientious objector when my group (1922) was called up on 6th September, 1941; and on 3rd November, 1941, at Lincoln C.O.'s Tribunal I was registered as a C.O. on condition that I did "full time civil defence work." I did not appeal against this decision, because at that time I thought I could conscientiously undertake such work. However after I had lost the right to appeal to the Appellate Tribunal I finally came to the decision that I could not take a part in the machinery of war.

It took me about two months before I finally came to a decision on this point. I had taken my stand at the Tribunal on humanitarian and ethical grounds; and the case I put before the Tribunal appears to me now very meagre and unsatisfactory. However, after my appearance at the Tribunal I started seriously studying Socialism and after a while my very humdrum moral and humanitarian grounds of opposition to the war became almost, if not entirely superceded by Socialist grounds. As soon as I became a convinced believer in Socialism, I determined to have nothing to do with the war-effort of our captitalist government whatsoever. Therefore, as regards the war, I became an "absolutist" C.O., and, of course, refused to undertake any form of civil defence work. This attitude has cost me my job at the G.P.O., since I was "released" in order that I might perform civil defence work. The Ministry of Labour has advised me of the various penalties to which I am liable in addition to this fate of unemployment. So I may regard myself as a "jail-destined C.O."

Religion has played no part in my stand against this war, as I have been for some time an agnostic.

The book of yours that I have read with special interest is "Socialism or Parliament." To me, this work was ten times more thrilling and exciting than any detective novel or "Wild West" thriller. In reading it, many of my cherished illusions concerning the Labour Party, and even Willie Gallacher, were knocked on the head. To young Socialists like myself (19) a detailed history of the Labour Party and other so-called "Socialists" and "Communists" in Parliament even up to the early "thirties" is largely unknown.

I have been wondering if you have thought of publishing your trials in pamphlet form. They would be handy for reference and would be greatly interesting to people who have not been able to read them all in "The Word."

What about a pamphlet on the stand made by different members of the Russell family for freedom, tolerance, and peace at various times? It would be most appropriate at the present time, when the Duke of Bedford is championing the cause of peace so gallantly. There is plenty of material, such as the attitude of the Duke of Bedford during the French Revolution; Lord John Russell's opposition to the war with Napoleon, 1815, when he was one of the 73 members who voted against the resumption of hostilities. Also his attitude on the suspension of Habeas Corpus in 1817, when he said:

> "We talk much—I think a great deal too much—of the wisdom of our ancestors. I wish we would imitate the courage of our ancestors. They were not ready to lay their liberties at the foot of the Throne upon every vain or imaginary alarm."

That message might hold some truth and wisdom for us even to-day. What a pity Lord John Russell did not live up to his early promise!

With all good wishes in the struggle.

Yours fraternally,

THE WORLD COURT

"The World Court for International Justice and Safety," by Charles L. Nordon, LL.B., Walter Judd, London, 1939. 2s. 0. Out of print meantime.

Undoubtedly one of the most important features of a post-war world in which there is reasonable chance of lasting peace, will be the establishment, or maintenance, of some World Court for Internation Justice, which commands the respect of the peoples of all nations and is endowed with that degree of authority which such appreciation and respect could furnish. Mr. Charles Norden's statement of his views on the constitution, nature and powers of a Court for International Justice is a very thoughtful and constructive contribution from one whose knowledge of International Law entitles his opinions to respectful consideration.

Mr. Norden's book "The World Court for International Justice and Safety" suggests, indeed, a possible constructive approach to the restoration of peace which does not appear as yet to have been explored or even recommended. It would surely be possible for the suggestion to be made through some neutral channel that the Governments of all belligerent nations should, without animosity and for the benefit of their peoples and of the world in general, state what their exact attitude would be towards such important questions as the World Court for International Justice; the sharing of the world's economic resources; disarmament; religious liberty; the recognition of the rights of other nations, etc. There would be nothing in the making of such a statement to hinder the prosecution of the war even by the most belligerent country; nor would a Government be asked in any way to set on one side its avowed incapacity to trust the members of another Government.

WHICH WAY, BRITAIN?

"Which Way Britain?" by Wilfred Wellock. 1/-. Birmingham. Obtainable from The Strickland Press.

Mr. Wilfred Wellock's "Which Way Britain?", written in a vigorous and challenging style, is perhaps more valuable for its comprehensive and often penetrating survey of recent world events than for its constructive proposals or the probable accuracy of some of its forecasts.

Like many writers with Left sympathies, Mr. Wellock fails to differentiate as clearly as he might between the evils of Finance and the evils of ordinary Capitalism, not, it would appear, realising how much Finance is the enemy of the ordinary Capitalist as it is of the weekly-wage earner. On the other hand, it would be unfair to Mr. Wellock not to add that he is far more alive to the importance of financial issues than are many others who share his political outlook.

In estimating the possible character of the post-war world, Mr. Wellock does not seem willing to consider what at the moment seems an increasing probability, viz., that the end of the war will leave the Axis Powers in a very strong position in Europe and Asia.

In his recommendations to those who would prepare to build a new order on sound foundations, even before the war has ceased, Mr. Wellock does not go much beyond the familiar recommendations of Socialist idealists. He might, for example, have been more original and constructive if he had substituted for the limitation of incomes, a proposal that the country's money supply should be so created and regulated as to ensure maximum consumption and production; coupled with the further recommendation that during the post-war years of scarcity which are likely to ensue, there shall be a continuation of a rationing system and one which distributes an equal share of the necessaries of life to every member of the community.

There are three factors which make it extraordinarily difficult for Mr. Wellock or anyone else to make an accurate forecast of what will happen in this country after the war. There are the abundance everywhere of selfish and untrustworthy men in positions of authority, and the scarcity of men of a better type of character to replace them; the almost unbelieveable stupidity of the British people on many important issues; their docility; and their susceptibility to propaganda; and (perhaps in some contrast to this second point) the unpredictable reaction and its equally unpredictable results when the less unintelligent individuals at last awaken fully to the extent to which they have been betrayed by their political leaders and the propaganda agencies.

Though not alone in outstanding merit, there are two passages in Mr. Wellock's book which all would do well to take to heart. The first is "Had Britain at any time in these last two decades put one-thousandth part of the effort, the wealth, the sacrifice and courage she is putting into this war, into attempts to revolutionise the social order in Britain and to rationalise international relations, we should now be organising fêtes celebrating the achievements of a united and unified Europe instead of wading through seas of blood as a prelude to violent revolution." The second is "My experience is that the average person is extremely responsive to the appeal of good living. He does not readily respond to theory, but is keenly alive and responsive to sacrifice and courageous endeavour. If Democracy is saved in Britain, it will be by sacrifice and not by power."

ANARCHISM AND VIOLENCE

Dangers Discussed at S.P.G.B. Debate

We have received the following letter from comrade Cash, of the S.P.G.B., concerning his debate with comrade Gapes, of the London Anarchist Groups, at the Conway Hall:—

Dear Aldred,—My attention has been drawn to a letter published in the July issue of "The Word," by Matt Kavanagh who makes a reference to the debate held recently at Conway Hall, between the Anarchists and myself as the representative of the S.P.G.B.

Kavanagh states that I cut a sorry figure. This must be left for others to judge. But I must take him to task over one or two statements he makes, in which I am supposed to have brought your name in sneeringly.

I deny emphaticaly that I did anything of the sort, for, quite frankly, having watched your activities over many years, dating from the time when as a boy I came into personal contact with you and was considerably influenced by you, I have always had a certain regard for you.

What I did do was to state that Anarchists had differed widely over very fundamental issues—there were the Anarchists who had advocated bomb-throwing and assassination in the name of "propaganda by deed" to those who completely repudiated all uses of violence.

I used your name as one Anarchist who had stated that it was impossible to prevent the police from getting information as to any insurrectionary attempt that may be planned and it was as your considered opinion that all action should therefore be open and above board.

Regarding the other point of not being able to distinguish an Anarchist from a policeman. I stated that the Anarchist movement had always had to suffer this bugbear. There have been numerous clubs in London and elsewhere closed down largely because of the fact that a condition had been produced as a result of certain Anarchist theories that attracted "Agents Provocateurs" and police spies in large numbers. This is not a sneer at the Anarchists. It is a statement of fact and was not denied. I hold that there are lessons that should be learned from these facts and endeavoured to point them out.

I do not propose to take any more of your space and so will not enter into a discussion of this matter. I am only concerned at the moment with answering statements that are sheer misrepresentations.

Yours for the revolution,

S. CASH,

London, N.W.1., 4/7/42.

RICHARD CARLILE

The Theosophical Forum, Point Loma, California, U.S.A., in its issue for June 1942 (vol. XX, No. 6) publishes the following review of our "life" of Richard Carlile:

"This is one of a series issued by the publishers of a monthly magazine called 'The Word,' and devoted to the cause of social reform. It is the latest and revised edition of a former work. The author writes the life and work of his hero and teacher, whom he believes to have met with too scant appreciation, even by other workers in radical and rationalist circles. Carlile is called atheist and social republican, and identified with revolt. The extreme courses to which agitators were impelled may be explained by the nature of the times. In this case it was those earlier years of last century, when the excesses of the French revolution and the subsequent Napoleonic wars had scared the ruling classes in Britain into extreme reaction. The reforms which later on and by less violent means gradually produced the conditions to which we have been accustomed may prevent us from realizing the dreary lot of the lower classes in those days. And when it seemed that the Christian churches formed part of the great reactionary movement, people who were not supporters of those churches were dubbed atheists, however truly religious they might have been, and doubtless were driven to accept the title as a badge rather than a reproach.—H.T.E."

ANTI-WAR SOCIALISTS

At this period of grave war crisis to all mankind, it is urgent to bring into one grand alliance the revolutionary, progressive, and anti-militarist forces of the world. We therefore have pleasure in reproducing the following letter addressed by our comrade Jowett to comrade Jim W. Taylor, of the I.L.P., on the occasion of comrade William Stewart's birthday anniversary celebrations in 1941 :

My Dear Jim Taylor,—So my old Scottish comrade and friend, "Willie" Stewart has achieved his 85th birthday. What a Span! And what a life! I feel that I have been in company with him in the fight for Socialism for more than 50 years, although we rarely met personally during the first 15 of them. Both of us were weekly writers to the old Clarion in the days when "Nunquam" Blatchford's "Merry England" went through a million copies of its penny edition.

Memories of Hardie and the early days of the I.L.P.; the Boer war; huge meetings in Glasgow's Metropole Theatre during the last great war; are vividly awakened by "Willie" Stewart's 85th birthday anniversary.

He is to be honoured by a celebration at which I must regretfully be an absentee. But I am joyously glad he is being so honoured. For there is not now, nor was there ever, a more patiently faithful crusader for Socialism than Hardie's trusty friend and biographer, Scotland's "Willie" Stewart.

He is 85 and still rings true with a life's record of unblemished service behind him. Who could more deserved to be honoured?

May he have health and strength to enjoy many more years of life, and may he also continue to the end to enjoy the priceless blessing of the affectionate appreciation of his fellow workers in the cause of Socialism.

With greetings and good wishes to you all.
I am,
Yours fraternally,
F. W. JOWETT.

Bradford, 7th July, 1941.

We asked comrade J. W. Taylor for some details of that conference, and received a reply which was intended to provide "something to write around." To our mind the letter tells its own story and we accordingly publish it with only very slight omissions that have no relation to the main purpose of the letter, and are merely ornamental to ourself:—

Muirend, Glasgow,
10/7/'42.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Whitley Bay I.L.P. Conference was held at Easter 1926, with that old Anti-Militarist "war horse", Jowett as Acting Chairman. Clifford Allen was then Chairman of the Party but was unable to be present. It was at this conference that Maxton was elected to the chair.

Our dear old comrade, "Willie" Stewart, accepts the authority of the registrar that he was born in Dunfermline in the year 1856—the same year as Keir Hardie and Bernard Shaw. So that 1856 did itself proudly!

Willie attended an alleged elementary school with persistent irregularity until he was 12 years or thereby; and of course in these days there were no compulsory attendance officers and no schoolboards. Thereafter he spent most of his working time inside Dunfermline linen factories, varied by frequent periods of unemployment, when there were no Exchanges and out of work benefit. It was in this atmosphere that his Socialist education commenced.

In due course Willie began to take an interest in public affairs, and with some kindred spirits he formed the first Socialist Society in Dunfermline (early '80's). He served for three years on the first Parish Council in Dunfermline as an avowed Socialist, found that he could not get on with the work he wanted to do, and did not offer himself for re-election. He was then writing under various nom de plumes for local newspapers—articles politically heretical but readably acceptable. Comrade Stewart helped to form the first Trades Council in Dunfermline. He inaugurated and edited a monthly paper called "The Worker", which kept alive for three years but went under in 1899 on the outbreak of the South African war. The paper, of course, denounced the war and naturally collapsed. In that year Willie came to Glasgow and became a sort of auxiliary member of the "Labour Leader", Keir Hardie's weekly. Here he wrote under the name "Gavroche", and his articles were very popular and useful.

For some six years comrade Stewart wrote a weekly article for the old "Clarion" under his own name, and thousands of Socialists at home and abroad got to love the man they had never seen.

In 1912 he became organising secretary of the I.L.P. in Scotland. War came in 1914 and the work was uphill. During the whole war period he wrote antimilitarist and pro-Socialist articles in "Forward", besides speaking for the I.L.P. all over the country. Some of his "Forward" articles are included in his book "War Time and Other Impressions"—a veritable treasury.

Then he wrote a biography of Keir Hardie (the standard issue of the I.L.P.). Other books from his pen included:—"Burns and the Common People"; "Fighters for Freedom"; "The Nativity of Adam"; "Products of Victoria's Sixty Years Reign", all now out of print, unfortunately.

Needless to say "Willie" early on became a reader of good literature. Many hours he spent and continues to spend with the poets.

Yes, Guy my boy, "Willie" is a great soul—a real nobleman. To thousands these past 50 years he has been guide, Counsellor, and friend in the onward march of the common people to the age of reason and justice and all that flows therefrom.

With regards.

Sincerely yours,
J. W. TAYLOR.

REAR-ADMIRAL'S DAUGHTER OPPOSES WAR

[Photograph from "Daily Mirror" copyright.

Miss Adela Grace Vandeleur Creagh, of Mycenae Road, Blackheath, has taken her stand as an opponent of war. Miss Creagh is the daughter of Rear Admiral James Vandeleur Creagh, D.S.O. Miss Creagh believes in Christian principles and their application to life but declined to attend Church to establish her Christianity as she considers religion and its expression to be a personal matter. She is a member of the People's Common Law Parliament group.

Miss A. V. G. Creagh, 22, daughter of Rear-Admiral J. Creagh, of Mycenae-road, Blackheath, London, brought her father as a witness when she appeared before the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal at Fulham on Monday, July 20 last.

Admiral Creagh testified to his daughter's sincerity, although he did not agree with her, and believed her views to be misplaced.

She would always listen patiently to arguments, but preferred to act according to the dictates of her own conscience.

"I don't believe all wars are bad—I was in the last," Admiral Creagh added.

Miss Creagh, who was on the stage before the war, said that she felt her first stirrings of conscience over Abyssinia when she was at school.

She believed it wrong to take human life, and she thought both sides in the present war were wrong. She did fire-watching and gardening because she was not relieving men for war work.

Judge Hargreaves refused to register Miss Creagh as a conscientious objector, but she could appeal. At present, he felt, she had only a vague feeling that "something is wrong somewhere."

Miss Creagh gave notice of appeal.

Rear-Admiral James Vandeleur Creagh, D.S.O., was born in 1883. Following upon the report of his daughter's appearance before the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal, the admiral was interviewed by the "Daily Mirror." He pointed to a photograph of the King, flanked by two Union Jacks, and said:

"That is what I believe in—truth, honour and justice."

This report brought him a heavy correspondence. He wrote an answer to his critics to the "Daily Mirror" which was published by our contemporary, in part, in its issue for Saturday, July 25. We reprint the admiral's letter from its columns:—

Sir,—Referring to your report on July 21, you correctly pointed out what to me was the symbol of Truth, Honour and Justice, but it seems to have suggested to some people that I am satisfied with conditions as they are. Definitely I am not.

I am convinced that we have to remove the evil that conflicts with these high principles in our own country if we are to be fit to exist as a nation, let alone an Empire. If we are unable to do this we are unfit to have a democracy. . . .

Constitutionally we are entitled to know the official policy of our public servants, but the Home Secretary is and has been unable for many months to state whether it is his official policy to give effect to this first principle of good government (equal justice for all), whereever it is violated in our country.

It is a part of our constitutional common law and finds expression in Magna Carta—but the constitutional law is violated.

"DISHONOURABLE."

In my official experience I have known people in authority who will act as an official in a way which I am sure they would consider to be dishonourable as a private citizen.

I believe the Admiralty to be one of the best of our departments of State, but I have known officers conspire to give false evidence at an inquest, apparently to cover a technical department, with the approval of the Admiralty.

Until we remove these officials who have not the moral courage to do these things which they know to be the right thing to do, we must continue to be dominated by powerful vested interests whose interests clash with those of our natural human interests and the constitutional rights of the people who form the State.

Inventions which enable the enemy submarines to do so much havoc in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans could be ours to-day; they were gratuitously presented to the Germans by the action of our own officials.

We are still denied the use of these and other valuable inventions, some of which would obviate the use of imported fuel.

"MISLED."

The aluminium shortage was unnecessary; so are the Black Markets.

None of these evil things would have been possible had there not been one justice for the rich, another for the poor.

I have still sufficient faith in my countrymen to believe that it is criminal to keep the truth from them. They have already been misled too much and too long—I hope not intentionally.

Though you may not agree with the plain statement it is my considered opinion based on experience. In spite of its length, I hope you will be able to find space to publish it to correct any doubts that may still exist as to my views. . . .

Your obedient servant,
(Rear-Admiral) J. V. CREAGH,
D.S.O. (Rtd.).

It is clear that the Admiral knows how to think for himself. His daughter pays him the compliment of resembling him in this matter.

WHEN I AM GONE.

When I am gone from this fair earth,
Where you can plant an apple tree
To grow above my breast,
A tree that will each April bloom,
That winter-weary eyes
Can see the blossom, snowy-white,
Against the azure skies,
Perhaps a bird will seek a branch
Whereupon to build its nest,
(The springtime song of mating birds
Did ever please me best)
And of an eve, when air is mild,
With pearly light above,
A lad and blushing lass may come
To speak their words of love.
My blessing would be with them there,
For life has naught more sweet
Than those strange joys that swell the heart
When youthful lovers meet,
And in its shade on summer noon,
Maybe the aged men
Would gather there, and rest their bones,
And live their youth again.
Oh! all those things would please me well,
For they mean joy and peace.
But there is something more I wish,
My pleasure to increase—
May there be one strong, sturdy branch,
Ten feet above my head,
Where those who lured folk into war
Were hanged till they were dead.

—JOE CORRIE.

PEACE AND THE COMMON PEOPLE

DUKE OF BEDFORD'S PEACE SPEECH CONSIDERED

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government)

[The following valuable and important essay from the pen of our comrade Jewett is reprinted from the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, August 7 last, Comrade Jewett writes with his usual keen fearlessness and his contribution should be discussed and endorsed by the entire Labour and Pacifist Movements. Jowett is the clearest writer and thinker on the war issue in the Labour Movement to-day. We ask comrades to express their opinions of Jowett's declaration. All groups who endorse it should see that this view is broadcast and made known. We would like all our comrades of the Peace Aims Group of the Labour Party, whose members have made such splendid speeches in Parliament, to define their position in this matter.—Ed.]

The Duke of Bedford has delivered a most courageous speech in the House of Lords. It has been published by the Strickland Press, George Street, Glasgow, priced at 2d. and merits wide-spread circulation. "Peace and Reconstruction" was the subject of the speech and is the title under which the reprinted report of it is being sold.

It is no small thing for a Ducal member of that House of refrigerated arrogance, the House of Lords, to stand unperturbed in his place there and advocate peace by negotiation and make proposals for reconstruction which, although they were not proposals for common ownership (including land) necessary for a Socialist commonwealth, would seem even more hateful, because more immediately menacing to his hearers.

It is my purpose to state, substantially, what these proposals are and to what extent I, as an anti-war socialist, am in agreement with them, or feel it necessary to add to them.

There are, it seems to me, three main features in the Duke of Bedford's proposals, each of which should be considered separately. These are:—

(1) That a negotiated peace, without waiting either for a military decision or for a people's international revolution, is desirable.

(2) That peace terms should be offered to Axis Governments.

(3) That peace terms should consist of an offer to ABANDON THE SYSTEM OF INTERNATIONAL FINANCE which, before the war, had practically tied foreign trade by means of credits and debts to financially powerful states and given them preferential access to the world's raw materials and cheap native labour, if the Axis Powers would restore freedom to nations and individuals.

In my opinion a negotiated peace, if possible, is not only desirable but urgently necessary and not only for our own people, but FOR THE PEOPLES OF ALL OTHER NATIONS CONCERNED DIRECTLY AND INDIRECTLY.

Even looking at the question from our own point of view, a military decision which at every stage of the war has become more distant and uncertain, can give us no moral or material gain, whilst the cost in lives would be colossal and in suffering would be indescribable.

For what is the present position? Soviet Russia, which, since June of last year (at the cost of millions of lives and devastation of vast areas of its fertile land, many of its towns, and many of its hard-won social and industrial achievements) has, by its supreme efforts to resist overwhelming force, stood between us and actual experience at home of intensive air warfare with the latest of war's devilish improvements, will soon cease to afford us that protection to which we have become accustomed.

One thing is sure, whatever else happens on the Russian War Front, Soviet Russia cannot now do more than hold a defensive line against Hitler's Nazi German army.

NEARLY HALF of Russia's wheat-growing lands are gone, 70 per cent. of its iron ore, 60 per cent. of its coal, almost the whole of its aluminium and the best part of its railroads.

A million invaders are at the Don, threatening the Caucasus and Russia's remaining oil supply with ten to twelve thousand airplanes, most of which will almost surely be switched over before long for action here and the middle east.

With a prospect such as there is before us, and the military victory promise of political leaders, nothing more than an illusory mirage, I can see no sound reason, even, I repeat, from our own British point of view, for not trying to get peace by negotiation if that is possible.

(2) Nor do I see any objection to offering terms of peace to peoples of enemy governments addressed officially to their governments. If the terms are fair and the intentions are transparently honest, it is the peoples they are most likely to influence favourably, whatever reply their governments may make to the offer.

And after all, as the Duke of Bedford reminded the House of Lords, in a recent speech, "even Stalin, while he said that he hoped that the war would result in the downfall of the Nazi Government, made it fairly plain that he did not make this an essential war aim or peace condition."

It is the business of the German, Italian and Japanese peoples to overthrow their Nazi and Fascist Governments, not ours. And they are all the more likely to do it if we honestly disclaim any intention to question their right to choose their own Governments.

(3) To give the exact purport of the peace terms suggested by the Duke of Bedford, I will quote from the report of his House of Lords speech (June 2nd). This is what he said:—

"The plain fact is that we want a breath of fresh air let into the whole war situation. We need some statesman whose mind is not clouded by war hatred and who is still able to realise that the people of other nations are fundamentally very like our own, being a mixture of good, bad and indifferent individuals, the majority of whom can be reached by an appeal to their good sense and good feeling, if words are accompanied by deeds. Such a statesman needs to make to the peoples of the warring nations and their governments an appeal of the following kind.

"'Look here,' he should say, 'this mass-murder in which we are all engaged is sheer madness and is getting us nowhere. It is unworthy of human beings claiming to be civilised. Why not stop killing one another and, armed for the first time in history with an economic system which enables us to realise our aim, get together and plan so that we can develop the world's resources for the benefit of the peoples of the world with due regard for their needs and numbers and without any regard to race, colour, or political opinions? We realise that the wealthy nations must help the poorer ones, if need be with actual gifts of goods and not by an economy which gets them into debt.' (That is the new economic need of the world: GIFTS of goods by wealthy nations to poorer ones.) 'We realise, also, that governments must restrain the anti-social activities of their big business monopolists who limit production for selfish ends or political reasons. The governments of the Axis powers, with which we are at war, have often said that their chief enemy is International Finance. We have come to realise that International Finance has been the enemy of our people also. We therefore offer a fair bargain. We are prepared, as our contribution to the building of the new world, to abandon the tyranny of International Finance and its anti-social practices. We invite the Axis Powers, on their part to restore freedom to nations and individuals.'

If peace could be secured on some such basis as this, each side could then claim to have secured victory. The Axis Powers could claim that they had secured victory over International Finance, and we could claim that we had gained victory over tyranny."

Having stated the Duke of Bedford's suggested peace offer in his own words, I want now to say that I agree with his opinion that this war in one of its aspects (its most immediately important one, I believe) represents:—

"an attempt by the money-lending financiers, currency speculators, and big-business monopolists to destroy the relatively sane financial system of the Axis Powers."

I agree with him that:—

"... the government should announce their recognition of the fact that international payments must be made with goods and services and that on no account should a debt be settled by the borrowing of a further sum of money."

The government would have to do this if it made the suggested offer, otherwise its offer to "abandon the tyranny of International Finance and its anti-social practices" would be meaningless.

The full significance of the suggested offer to "abandon the tyranny of International Finance," therefore, is that Britain would agree to abandon the system of getting control of markets and preferential access to raw materials and cheap native labour. It would pay for imports with exports, money being recognised as only a book-keeping device for balancing accounts for goods and services exchanged.

Consequently the main cause for war, namely, the urge to export goods in excess of imports and to create money debts for moneylenders, would be finally removed.

To get Axis Powers to restore freedom to nations and individuals in exchange for the terms of the suggested offer, would be immeasurably better than to wait and endure either for the constantly receding illusory prospect of a military victory or for a continental uprising of peoples for a socialist revolution whenever it might come. Under the world conditions of our day, such an uprising would have quite unpredictable and, possibly, disastrous results.

It is peoples, not governments, that we may look to for favourable response to peace offers, to whatever official address they may be directed. It is here that in my opinion, the Duke of Bedford's suggested offer is lacking in substance.

Without definite and complete assurance of a fundamental change in our own relations with native peoples and removal of the food blockade from, at least, the peoples of all non-belligerent nations, I cannot see the possibility of even the non-Nazi masses of German people throwing off their fear of another, and worse, dictated peace than the last one. Nor can I see anything like a near approach to the possibility of whole-hearted trust by ex-Allied and neutral European nations, whose ships are being exclusively used to bring food and munitions to us, until we are willing to permit food, at least, to reach them in their dire need of it.

A government that would freely forego financial domination, at home or abroad: a government which demonstrated its solidarity with the common people everywhere by allowing food to reach them—such a government might rally the peoples of all Europe for support of its peace offer. Would to God such a government were in sight!

THE WAR AND THE LABOUR MOVEMENT

By HARRY POLLITT

1940 Communist Party Pamphlet Was Suppressed by the Communist Party

[This essay was published in pamphlet form by the Communist Party at King Street, London, W.C.2, and printed by the Marston Printing Co., Cayton Place, Cayton Street, London, E.C.1, on June 12, 1940. The edition was advertised as being 10,000. This pamphlet was withdrawn and suppressed by the Communist Party when Hitler invaded the Soviet Union. Of course, the publication was insincere as are all the publications of the Communist Party. The Communist Party has withdrawn and suppressed this pamphlet, but it would revert to the anti-militarist position to-morrow if required to do so by the Soviet Bureaucracy. We ask our readers in the workshop, whether militarist or anti-militarist, to read this pamphlet and to note that it was circulated with the same impertinent aggression as is assumed to-day by the Communist Party when allying itself with Beaverbrook. Gallacher and Pollitt are the two most unprincipled figures on the public platform in Great Britain to-day. We share Churchill's and Morrison's contempt for the Communist Party mendacious power politicians and hireling stooges. Pollitt was so proud of this anti-war pamphlet that he published his name on the title page, again on page 3, and at the conclusion. Now he has suppressed it.—Ed.]

These are indeed dark days. The deadly hand of war has laid waste the homes and lives of innocent men, women and children over half of Europe.

The mind revolts at the frightful scenes of death and destruction that spread over France, Belgium, Holland and Norway. All workers offer sympathy to the people of these countries beyond the understanding of the ruling class.

And now Britain too is menaced with the threat of such a war that the majority of the people never believed possible in these islands, a war that people complacently imagined in the past could only be the fate of foreigners.

No wonder there is a feeling of alarm and anxiety. The question "How will it end—what is to be done?" is on all our lips.

In such a situation it is very easy to work on our legitimate feelings of horror and passion and distort them for false aims—easy to provoke anger and resentment against others, and so escape our own responsibilities.

At this moment of danger the majority of the workers naturally turn to their Labour organisations for guidance, expecting from them a policy based on a true understanding of their interests. But what do they find? Once again, as in every crisis of capitalism, the leaders of these organisations have not only made common cause with the millionaires but also come to their rescue in spite of their responsibility for the outbreak of the war.

THE POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT

The position is all the more serious and critical because by the decisions of the recent Labour Party Conference at Bournemouth, and of the Special Conference of Trade Union Executive Committees held in London, the official Labour movement is now committed to the policy of the Churchill Government.

How dangerous a step this is can best be shown by recalling the names of the principal Tories in this Government.

Churchill, Chamberlain, Beaverbrook, Lord Lloyd, General Page Croft, Amery, Duff Cooper, Eden; these men represent everything that stands for Toryism, the historic enemy of the Labour movement.

They stand for Imperialism, Poverty, Unemployment, Derelict Areas, Means Test, Trades Disputes Act, the Betrayal of Abyssinia, Czechoslovakia, Non-Intervention in Spain. They suppress the colonial peoples of the Empire; they are enemies of the Soviet Union, they sabotaged the building up of collective security and the Peace Front.

The Tory Die-hards represent a class that will never fight for democracy or freedom for the common people. Rather it will use the mass feelings against Hitler's fascism to impose certain aspects of that same rascism on the workers of Britain and not hesitate to enlist the help of the Labour leaders for that purpose.

No wonder this Coalition Government spreads alarm in every factory, local Labour Party, Trade Union branch, and Co-operative Guild.

Workers are being told that "the interests of the Nation are at stake"—"War ends all political differences." But in actual fact the coalition of Labour with Tories is to save capitalism and enable attacks to be made on the workers, which if they were attempted by the Tories alone, would meet with stern resistance.

The Tories have only taken the Labour leaders into the Government for their own purposes. Remember how in the last war the same tactics were used. Remember how when the Labour leaders had served their purpose, the Tories ignominiously discarded them, as they did the late Arthur Henderson.

The millionaires may change their tactics but they never change their class outlook, nor will they ever allow others to change it for them, or ever voluntarily give up their class system.

WHAT THE LABOUR LEADERS STAND FOR

The Labour leaders boast that they cannot be deceived or outwitted, that they are cleverer than the Churchills, and that "Labour should be proud that its leaders are called to save the nation from Hitler."

Who are these leaders entrusted with the unpopular jobs in the Churchill Government?

They are the men who refused to support the People's Front movement in Britain which could have defeated the Chamberlain Government long ago and have prevented war; they supported non-intervention in Spain. They have always opposed the policy of uniting the forces of the workers in the struggle against capitalism, and preferred class co-operation and support of rationalisation. They hailed rationalisation as part of the development towards organised capitalism, through which they hoped to achieve a peaceful transition to Socialism without any trouble or strife.

They are moreover the bitterest opponents of the Soviet Union, and this very year clamoured for war against her.

These same leaders declared last September, through the mouth of Greenwood, that the Chamberlain Government could not exist for a single day without the support of Labour, and yet allowed it to remain in power with all the terrible consequences that now face Europe in general and the British people in particular.

THE WORKERS MUST DECIDE

The workers of Britain cannot afford to trust their destinies to such leaders either in peace or war. The workers of Britain must denounce the policy that has proved wrong on every vital question, and that has worked for the interests of the capitalists and capitalism against those of the workers and Socialism.

None of us can escape the terrible challenge that faces us. We must accept a greater responsibility than ever before in the history of the British working-class movement.

For the very existence of the working-class movement is now at stake.

In the present war crisis the workers are faced with a series of emergency measures which are alleged to be necessary for "the victory of the Nation," but in fact prop up, the interests of the millionaires, armament and food profiteers.

These measures are not formulated to take over large scale industries, banks and land without compensation, nor to abolish the system of royalties and profits. There is no provision to conscript wealth and take control of large fortunes or limit the luxuries and extravagances of the rich.

No. Only vague phrases that mean nothing in practice, only vague hints about "control" of wealth and "looking into" the books of the employers.

But when it comes to the sacrifices expected from the workers there is no vagueness. The emergency measures are then quite clear and definite. They mean the complete dictatorial control of wages, hours, trade union rights, customs and the actual lives of the workers. They sweep away every privilege won by past generations of working-class struggle against capitalism.

In France similar measures have already resulted in unlimited overtime, drastic reductions from wages and overtime earnings regardless of the cost of living, militarisation of labour, and restriction of the rights of shop stewards.

If these measures are allowed to go through they will result in a striking victory for the millionaires of Britain both now and in the future.

IN DEFENCE OF WORKING-CLASS STANDARDS

The workers must guard their standards of living, their democratic rights and liberties, or generations of working-class struggle and sacrifice will be thrown away.

To-day, as never before in our lifetime, Labour must rely on its own strength in the factories and trade unions.

It is time to end panic-mongering, speculation and irresolution as a means to coerce the workers against their own interests.

It is time to organise against every encroachment on the living conditions and rights of the workers.

In Britain, just as in Germany, there is a handful of rich families who live on rent, interest and profit extracted from the labour of the workers. These capitalists are as surely opposed to the workers' interests as are the foreign capitalists.

Anyone who attempts to persuade the workers otherwise is deceiving them.

The workers should get together.

They should ensure that wages shall keep pace with the cost of living, and that they make it their special concern to secure immediate increases in the allowances paid to the dependants of men in the armed forces. At the same time they should demand adequate disability pensions for all wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and airmen, pensions for the widows and children of men killed in action, sufficient to enable bereaved families to live in comfort and ensure the future welfare of the children.

It is time for the workers to safeguard existing trade union custom and practice, and to strengthen every form of factory and shop steward, trade union and trades council organisation. And it is essential to bring about one hundre dper cent. trades union organisation especially of all women and youth labour now being drawn into industry, and to ensure the application of all Factory Acts that apply to women and youth labour.

The disregard of existing factory legislation, as permitted by the new regulations, can only result in a very grave increase in the numbers of accidents, cases of physical exhaustion, and sickness.

The workers should resolutely oppose any compulsory deductions from wages such as outlined in the Keynes Plan. They should work in every locality for the extension of all forms of social services that safeguard the health, education and social welfare of the workers and their families.

The workers should demand the immediate withdrawal of all Regulations that impede their right to effectively protect every hardily won gain of the past.

They should oppose the Purchase Tax which is one of the most drastic methods of reducing the purchasing power of wages.

MONEY THE MASTER KEY

By Sir Alliott Verdon-Roe.

[The author of the following short article is a distinguished figure in the aviation world and has led a life of practical courage and adventure. He has sent this article to us for publication because he is in entire agreement with the Duke of Bedford's views about a negotiated peace.—Ed.]

There is no more important subject than currency, for if it is unsound it does not give Christianity and honesty a chance; neither is it possible to have a good government, an efficient nation and a bad currency. Only a very small fraction of our currency is good, that is, created by the State. Our present system of almost entirely bank and cheque currency—owing to the present method of operating cheques—has impoverished and weakened us beyond conception, causing untold suffering. What progress has been made has generally been due to those who have struggled on against heart-breaking conditions.

The politician who advocates currency reform is apparently debarred from the sweets of office; this may explain why none of our leading "statesmen" or politicians are currency reformers. Our currency system—like that of the other Democracies—enriches the few at the cost of many, whereas it could, and should, enrich the many at the cost of none. A good currency system is vital both in peace and war, especially since the Axis powers broke away from the bankers' counterfeit currency ten years ago, which accounts for their new found strength; whether they have adopted a good currency system time will show. So long as we tolerate our present system we shall blunder on and not only ruin our ability to continue as a leading nation, but will forfeit the right.

It is a significant fact that the "Times" published an article by their Special Correspondent on March 25 admitting—what currency reformers have been advocating for many years—that a new financial technique was required and that the State must create and issue the currency instead of the banks. When this is done in proper manner the benefits will be incalculable, so the sooner the better. Actually a scheme for doing this has been devised which will free many thousands of bank employees to do creative work, but this is a very minor matter compared to the great benefits which the nation and the people will derive. When the currency is created and issued properly, the problem will not be how to find orders, but how to cope with demand. Therefore the best currency system will be the one which will require the minimum number of people and time to operate it. The Government should look into the various schemes available and adopt the best features from them with the least possible delay.

DEMOCRACY IS — ?

"The Northern Echo," Darlington for August 3, publishes the following letter from the pen of the Duke of Bedford:—

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD ON THE ACID TEST OF A DEMOCRAT.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. C. B. Maxwell, wishes to intern me and others because we differ from him in believing that the continuation of this war will not promote the interests of the British Empire and the world in general. It would be interesting to know in what respect he considers that his own mentality differs from that of Hitler, who also interns his political critics?

The acid test of a man's love of real democracy is the freedom and justice he is willing to accord even to those with whom he most strongly disagrees. Any tyrant can show leniency to those who think as he does.—Yours, etc.

FAITH and WAR

BY REV. W. BOTTOMLEY

(Minister, Melbourne Unitarian Church, Australia).

In the Christian Register (American Unitarian journal) for March, 1942, there appears a sermon by Rev. George Lawrence Parker on the subject "How the War helps Faith!" It is a timely utterance, to which I am glad to draw attention. The conclusion drawn by Mr. Parker is that "loss of faith causes war, not vice versa." Speaking for himself, he declares:—

"First, once upon a time, I had a faith that said that materialism, uncontrolled, would wreck human blessedness. The war has confirmed that faith.

Second, I once had faith that peace, personal or international, was the heart of the Christian message. The war has confirmed that faith.

Third, I once had faith that 'righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a rebuke to any people.' The war has confirmed that faith.

Fourth, I once had faith that man's hope was limitlessly enlarged by the entry of Jesus of Jesus of Nazareth into history. The war has confirmed that faith.

Fifth, I once had faith that moral chaos comes when a man or a nation presumes to be God. The war has confirmed that faith.

Sixth, I once had faith that love is the abiding security of the universe. I cannot now see that hatred is succeeding very well."

All this is clearly stated and should help people to realise that the fundamentals of one's faith need not be destroyed, but rather confirmed by the war. For the war, and its dreadful effects, ought to be a sufficient demonstration of the disasters following upon moral apostasy. When nations will neither keep faith with God nor man they destroy themselves.

But now I would put this question: What faith have Christian people generally revealed in the present crisis? Led by their ministers, and clergy, they have, for the most part, allied themselves with the nation in prosecuting the war. The justification they plead can be stated in few words. They will tell you that their faith consists in the belief that the United Nations will win the war because theirs is a just cause—that they must win the war so that principles of right may prevail over the forces of evil. Let it be clearly understood that I do not justify aggression of any kind, and therefore am in no sense "going over to the enemy." But I cannot imagine Jesus making any such plea. His faith was of a different order—need I say a higher order? And it is the faith which Jesus had which I believe to be right, and which those Christians who trust in war to justify them evidently fail to possess.

Of course it comes down to an issue which will have to be pressed home more and more. Did Jesus live and die to reconcile God to men, to wipe out the effects of "original sin," and to make possible the entrance of men to heaven hereafter: or did he live and die for a faith in a different kind of life for men and for human society, a kind of life which he believed men could live if they would, and through their living transform the kingdoms of this world into the kingdom of the Heavenly Father? Unitarians affirm that the second of these alternatives is the true one, and that Christianity, as generally preached and understood, is a theological fiction, the ineffectiveness of which is again being amply demonstrated by present events.

We Unitarian Pacifists believe this war will be disastrous to "Christianity," but not disastrous to the faith of Jesus. The two things are not the same, as we intend to repeat until at length it dawns upon the minds of men that "there is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death"; and that there is a way, which Jesus taught, which leadeth unto life.

CHRISTOCRACY

A REVIEW BY THE REV. F. H. AMPHLETT MICKLEWRIGHT, M.A.

(Minister of The Unitarian Church of The Saviour, Southampton).

[Mr. Micklewright was formerly a minister of the Anglician Church, and wrote for these columns whilst occupying the pulpit of that Church. Later he joined the Unitarian body and received his present appointment. He is secretary of the Southampton Rationalist Press Association. Mr. Micklewright is one of the greatest scholars of the Christian Church. We hope to publish essays and sermons by him at an early date, dealing with Christianity, Socialism, and Pacifism.—Ed.]

CHRISTOCRACY, by J. Middleton Murray. Andrew Dakers & Co. 6/-. Obtainable from the Strickland Press.

This new book by John Middleton Murry is important for it carries the author's argument and thought a stage further. In his last work, he rejected the traditional churches as having betrayed their principles; he now arguses for a Christian social order based upon the politics of Christocracy. He analyses the causes of the present breakdown and applies them to this country. Leaving Nazism and Communism to work out their own salvation, he urges that it is the peculiar British task to bring about a social order based upon Christocracy and which is determined to evolve in peace and liberty. He sees loyalty to Christ in the service of higher values than those which determined violent revolution and he urges the need for a pacifist approach to life. The author illustrates his thesis from various examples, drawn mainly from the inter-war years.

The book is well worthy of attention. Middleton Murry has become one of the major prophets of this generation with an unbounded influence extending far beyond his own immediate circle of sympathisers. It raises many problems and should be provocative of much discussion: Certainly, the author punctures the type of argument which would secure peace and freedom by taking it away! Democracy, fraternity, justice, liberty, are words which have become no more than catch-phrases; they are bandied about by those who possess no obvious intention of fulfilling them. The sudden conversion, in 1939, of notorious anti-democrats into lip-servers of democratic liberties would be humorous if it were not dangerous and pathetic. The idea of the Tory Party waging a war nominally for freedom and justice is an excellent example of the lengths to which political insincerity may be driven and the perversions of words which may take place.

Opinions will differ regarding the moral pacifism which forms the basis of Middleton Murry's Christocratic social order. Pacifism may mean many things; it is not easy to assert that it forms the only true foundation for a religio-political society. There will also linger a suspicion that Mr. Murry's references to the results of violent revolution are coloured by partisan considerations. Again, what right has he to refer to "Christocracy"? Little or nothing is known of the historical Jesus; the recent work in the critical field of Loisy and Guignebert shatters the old orthodox claims. Christianity is a wide generic term; it may mean much or little. In many ways, it has broken down in the Western world. It is not possible to pick up the fragments and put them together into a new and orthodox shape. The old credal myth, in Goethe's sense of the term, has decayed into legend; certain elements of a specifically Christian kind remain and a new value may be given to religious mysticism but this is not the historic belief of Nicaea and Chalcedon. The extent to which much preaching is given over to the proclamation of conventional social ideas is a good indication of the ebbing away of life from the older theological creeds.

In view of these considerations, those who take the view of Middleton Murry would do well to ask themselves whether they are wise in seeking to utilize a superstructure from which life has departed. Is the word Christocracy a sound indication of the idea which they are striving to reach? Just as society is steadily emerging into new forms so too is religion. It will contain some place of veneration for the figure of Jesus but it must be doubtful how far it will retain the vast traditional Christian superstructure which points away from Palestine to the ancient Christ-cultus of the Hellenistic world. In this sense, moral idealism only limits and hampers itself when it accepts an identification with some previous stage of culture-history.

THE WORLD COURT

By CHARLES L. NORDON, LL.B.

[Mr. Nordon is a very distinguished London solicitor and Quain Prizeman in International Law. He is author of a very detailed work outlining the case for "The World Court for International Law" and showing how such a Court would function. In "The New Commonwealth," London, for July, 1939, he published the following essay. We omit the three opening paragraphs in which the author refers to the campaign of Lord Davies in favour of an Equity Tribunal to solve International Problems; the interest of Winston Churchill in such a method of avoiding the killing expeditions known as WAR; and request made by Hitler on April 28, 1941, to know how such a Court would function. Mr. Nordon proceeds to answer this query.—Ed.]

Speculation is invited by world thinkers upon the result of any ruler to-day or in the future seeking openly and without coercion or propaganda a flat mandate from his people to cope with an acute international dispute. Let us suppose the ruler to adumbrate the dispute and then ask his people:

(1) Do you authorise me to submit the dispute for decision by an approved and impartial tribunal? or

(2) Do you prefer that I shall send you to kill and destroy in our opponent's country and leave them to kill and detroy in our country?

Can the nature of the answer be doubted?

Unquestioning obedience to the sovereign authority is of necessity the outstanding characteristic of those bodies of men whose training is to destroy life, limb and property, who operate on, over, and under sea and land, and who are conventionally termed Navy, Army and Air Force.

The purpose for which the sovereign authority may call on that obedience is the destruction of:

(a) An actually attacking body, or

(b) The lives and property of the countrymen of those who are intending or feared to be intending to dispatch an attacking body.

The sovereign authority in a democracy is (at least in theory) appointed by the elected representatives of the people; in an autocracy by or through the agency of the destroying services themselves. The extent to which there is any practical difference lies in the stage of political, humanistic and cultural wisdom and benevolence reached by the community under consideration. When the destroying services refuse obedience to the sovereign authority what is called a revolution ensues, that is to say, the destroying services then demand, and if successful, command, obedience from the former master. The mass wisdom of the destroying services is not necessarily the same as that of each individual member. It is of the essence of membership of a destroying service that individual wisdom shall be suppressed. Otherwise indiscipline and confusion would result, and strategy could not succeed, just as it would be impossible to navigate a ship if any seaman or junior officer were permitted disobedience to his captain's order because he might think it to be erroneous.

This position has only to be stated when the thinker will see how essential it is for the safety of the people that those who control and command the destroying services shall not only be wise and unselfish but able to understand that there must always be two sides to any disagreement upon which only the detached and impartial mind can pronounce.

Rigidity and inflexibility of Governments constitute the upper and nether stones of the Mills of Fate between which the peoples are liable to be ground and crushed. It will not avail the people on either side, or their professional propagandists, to assert that their sovereign power is right, for their opponent's people and propagandists will make the same assertion. Nor can abstract right ever be the subject of pontifical assertion.

On the other hand every sovereign authority internally establishes its courts of justice. In doing so it knows that only 50 per cent. of the resorting litigants can be right and the remaining 50 per cent. must be wrong, though until judgment has been pronounced each litigant believes that he is right, and is usually supported in that belief by his advocate. Without a judicial body, established under the sovereign authority and capable of enforcing its decisions, violence, murder and mob rule would prevail, and the authority and progress of the sovereign State would totter and crumble.

If, then, the establishment of courts of justice is essential internally, it must follow, and for the same reason, that a court of justice is essential for the prevention of international violence, murder and mob rule. Physical weakness will never deter from war those nations whose people are told that they are only surrendering their freedom in order to regain it, but who are not told they are to sacrifice their own or their relatives' lives in order that their rulers may continue to rule. The alternatives are put as (1) slavery (? encirclement) and (2) death. From time immemorial, the lesson is preached:

How can man die better
Than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his father
And the temples of his gods.

That is the plea for blind obedience, but now the view is gradually prevailing that it may be better after all to live for one's country than to die for it. How to do so is not so easy to define in these days of militant propaganda unless the lesson of the just Arbitrator is to prevail.

It has to be borne in mind that to "love thy neighbour as thyself," though increasingly easy nationally, with the inculcation of social amelioration, is made very difficult internationally through the mass regimentation of international public opinion.

Thus, although every nation would agree in theory that international differences should be settled by reason rather than killing, it is upon the practical application of that theory that difficulties arise, for international judges might be presumed to reflect, and to be certain in their decisions to apply, the views of their own countrymen.

That difficulty must be faced and met by a long-term policy of preparation and with the preservation of the status quo meanwhile.

In The World Court for International Justice and Safety (January 1939) the writer endeavoured to set forth in skeleton form a scheme for the constitution, jurisdiction and procedure of a tribunal which at least would form a starting point for the intellectual efforts of those who think that only by reason can civilisation be saved and who are prepared to make sacrifices for that salvation.

But, as a famous statesman said, "It is men we want, not measures," and to man the Court may well prove even more difficult than its constitution. Here, then, it may be useful to suggest certain essential qualifications for the members of the Court:

(1) Linguistic ability to the extent of at least three languages.

(2) Proved study and research in jurisprudence, ethics, and logic, and scientific, political and social economy.

(3) Non-participation in any national government for at least five years preceding appointment, during which time the proposed appointee shall have devoted himself impartially to the first-hand study of the internal, social and political problems of the nations upon whose affairs he is likely to be called upon to adjudicate.

(4) Five years' residence in a neutral country except for research study abroad. For this purpose it would be desirable to select three or more countries as the permanent seats of the tribunal and which (or to their capitals) might be accorded certain extra territorial rights of complete neutrality as the principal seats of the world Court, of which one would be selected according to its proximity to the site of the problem, e.g., Switzerland (Geneva); New Zealand (Auckland); Argentine (Buenos Aires).

(5) Reasonably reliable health (remember Talleyrand's advice that everyone about to enter an important conference should "have his liver examined").

History shows that the nations of the world do not march into war, they rather drift into it, through lack of scientific objective. Initiative must be opposed to apathy. Preventive rather than remedial measures should be sought. Long-term principles rather than hand-to-mouth palliatives must be applied. The devotion of scientists has conferred benefits on humanity the full enjoyment of which is hampered by political adventurism, and therefore every right-thinking man and woman must take an active part in this campaign against casual killing. The effort is worth while. The honour of a "Victoria Cross," or any other emblem of physical bravery on the field of battle must pale before the greater magnitude of humanity for the abolition of the battlefield itself and the substitution of a tribunal of justice, morality and equity which can relegate the battlefield to that background of anarchy to which it rightly belongs.

(Registration applied for under War Charities Act, 1940).

In view of the considerable distress which exists amongst the families of British men detained under Section 18B to all who believe that it is unjust for the innocent wives and children to be penalised by the loss of income caused by the detention of the family breadwinner, to donate as freely as possible to remedy this injustice.

Gifts of Old Clothes

We have been asked to make the above announcement and do so willingly and freely. We uphold the rights in every country of the Jewish citizen, the Atheist, Socialist, and Anarchist. We oppose and detest all campaigns of hatred and calumny. In our view, no citizen ought to be arrested, detained, or interned at any time without charge. Habeas Corpus is a right that applies in times of crisis. Precisely because we are an enemy of Fascism, we hold that no man or woman should be detained under any executive order in any country. Certainly we are against suffering being extended to their children. Many of the 18B internees are very orthodox and are not likely to share our views of life. Some have served in the Armed Forces and have had distinguished service records. Even if they had been tried and sentenced they would be entitled still to expect that citizens would treat with care and tenderness their children. Because of our Socialism we endorse this appeal.

END THE STAGNATION IN THE LABOUR MOVEMENT

The workers need to remember their own experiences. It is easier to lose things than to win them. The Boss Class has never given anything away—every improvement in conditions is the result of struggle and sacrifice. And now under cover of the war situation the Bosses plan to take things away from the workers, to impose restrictions upon them. If this attach on the Home Front is allowed to succeed the workers will have to face bitter payment later on and the realisation that they have not only let down the pioneers of the past, but the boys at the front, who are told they are fighting for a brave new world.

But if the workers in the factories and trade unions defend their working conditions and future interests the result will be a re-awakening of political thought and class consciousness. and an end to the present passivity and stagnation in the Labour movement. In every section of the Labour, Trade Union and Co-operative movement there will be roused a new purpose, interest, activity and aim. It will galvanise the organised workers into new life and action, and eager support will then be forthcoming from the ranks of professional people, small shopkeepers, and important sections of the countryside, all of whom are profoundly alarmed at the crisis to which capitalism has brought them.

A NEW GOVERNMENT FOR BRITAIN

This mighty force can then combine to establish a new Government in Britain. One free from representatives of capitalism, friends of fascism and Fifth Column traitors. A Government whose power would rest on the organisation of the workers in the factories and the trade unions, and was ready to safeguard the interests of the workers, restore lost liberties, conscript wealth, nationalise the main industries, land and banks without compensation, give freedom and independence to the colonial people, and establish contact with the Soviet Union—it is such a Government that alone can find a way out of this tragic war and save the people.

Such is the policy that should be discussed in every working-class organisation, factory, trade union branch, local Labour Party, Co-operative Guild, Trades Council and workmen's club.

It is a policy certain of support. It will restore confidence and the will to victory over all enemies either within or without Britain. It will, if fought for, lead to the victory of the workers over capitalism.

It is not too late. Take up the struggle now.

FOR THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE LABOUR MOVEMENT

Repudiate the surrender to the Churchill Government of every victory won by the Labour movement in the course of its long and glorious history.

End the coalition of Labour with those who have brought the people of Britain to the verge of disaster.

Resist the attempt to impose fascism on the British workers by British capitalists.

Defend the freedom which means the opportunity to advance the cause of peace and Socialism.

End the coalition with the British Imperialists intent on dimpening down the mass movement in France, and support the French workers in the struggle against their capitalists.

Victory over the capitalists in Britain, and the encouragement of real working-class internationalism, will help the workers of Britain, France and Germany to establish working-class order, law, peace, happiness and prosperity for the peoples throughout Europe.

The traditions of our Labour movement are our guarantee of success.

It is easy to slander and misrepresent those who remain faithful to Socialism and Internationalism. But serious Labour men and women cannot subscribe to the theory that Socialist propaganda is all right in peace, but must be put in cold storage in times of imperialist war.

Remember the last war when the Labour leaders acted in the same way as they act to-day, with terrible results for the working men and women of Britain.

If we allow Labour to be tied to the war chariot of Imperialism, the whole movement will once more face a terrible and menacing future.

INTERNATIONAL WORKING-CLASS SOLIDARITY

How can we sincerely call upon the German workers to overthrow fascism, and not ourselves strive to win power in Britain?

The British, French and German workers have common Socialist aims. They must all remain faithful to the historic working-class policy in regard to imperialist war.

The Socialist way was taken by the Russian workers and peasants in 1917. We can also win victory if we keep faith with the traditional workers' policy in imperialist war.

We must refuse to be swept off our feet. We must refuse to allow our political judgment to be distorted by the brutality, agony and horror of war. Remember that those who wave flags and hold up their hands in horror at the cruelties of war, are silent and blind to the miseries inflicted by capitalism on the majority of the workers in peace time.

It is easy to be carried away on the flood tides of war propaganda and passion. It is hard to fight against the stream.

But our movement has been built up by men and women prepared to fight on the difficult and dangerous side. That is our history from Tolpuddle to the "Jolly George."

This will be our history again, and as the Pioneers of the past triumphed, so shall we, who in these days of heavy hearts and heavy fights, are prepared to champion in every-day struggle, the present and future interests of the working class.

And if the fight be hard, and the battle long, let us be inspired by the example, not only of the heroes of our own Labour movement in the past, but of the heroic working-class fighters in Germany. Through years of persecution and savage repression they have kept the fight going and are now able to look forward, along with ourselves and the French workers, to that brave new world which our common struggle will win.

"COMMUNISM," COAL, and THE SECOND FRONT

Dear Guy,—One of the scenes in the "Merchant of Venice" lives to-day. The agreement was that the pound of flesh could only be taken without the spoiling of a drop of blood. Well a party so-called by the name Communist has already taken that pound of flesh, and would like that drop of blood, but the hand of justice must be raised on behalf of the working class.

To-day, the Communist Party wants—
"MORE COAL FOR THE BATTLE!
MORE COAL FOR VICTORY IN 1942!"

I cull these slogans from a leaflet issued by the Scottish District, C.P.B.G., 221 West George Street, Glasgow, C.2. Funny how the Communist Party can get paper for throw-away handbills by the ten thousands, although its propaganda is supposed to be suppressed.

The Communist Party wants more coal for victory, wants rationed coal, for the very simple reason that Russia is in the war.

This handbill announces a meeting that, I presume, was held yesterday, in these terms:—

COAL AND THE SECOND FRONT COMMUNIST PARTY MEETING.
MINERS' WELFARE HALL, SHOTTS
SUNDAY, 9th AUGUST. At 7.30 p.m.

Speakers:—
WILLIAM PEARSON (President, Lanarkshire Miners' Union).
WILLIAM LAUCHLAN (Lanarkshire Organiser, C.P.).

This campaign is for increased production and this reduced consumption. The Communist Party calls this VICTORY!

If memory serves me right, this same William Pearson, at the outbreak of war, addressed a May Day Demonstration in the public par, surrounded by children who carried banners: "WHY NEXT THEY WILL CONSCRIPT GOD!" Hitler had not then invaded the Soviet Union and the Stalin pact was respected by the Communists therefore!

At that demonstration the same Mr. Pearson was criticised because he advocated decreased production. His policy then was decreased production and increased consumption. He was NOT interested in Britain's war against Hitlerism.

Why the contrast now? Again easily explained. Russia has been forced by Hitler to enter the war. Would it not be sound logic for Mr. Pearson to go down the pit and produce the coal he did not want produced before Russia entered the war and that would help to produce tanks for Russia? Would it not be equally sound logic if some of the Second Front talkers became dereserved—some of the men who dodged the workshop until the choice was between the workshop and the army—and faced the risk of the battlefield? Those who want the Second Front should "GO TO IT" themselves.

The Communist Party asks the uneducated people, in the C.P. leaders' estimation, to work on after a fatal accident. I agree with that only on one condition, that being all wages earned and all profits made that day go to the dependents.

The Communist Party obtained influence among the miners by saying that the "Communists," unlike the old leaders, wanted better conditions for the miners. Then why is their idol, called Willie Gallacher, silent in the House of Commons to-day? Again, Russia has entered the war.

The Communist Party leaflet asks us to remember the mining village of Lidice in Czechoslovakia. I say remember when the Communist Party caused the pits to be idle for a week at Calderhead, which resulted in the bairns in Shotts starving. Altered days now. "COMMUNISTS" ARE ON PRODUCTION COMMITTEES—under Capitalism!—Yours sincerely,

JAMES M. RODGER.

THE PRESENT SITUATION

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

It is not easy to find many bright features in the situation of to-day. Bad news from Russia; a serious shipping position; a crisis in India; mess, muddle and extravagance in the administration at home; further evidence of Parliamentary tyranny and imbecility; an increase in vice and crime; and a belated, but rapidly growing disillusionment among the people who, though at last becoming disgusted with their political leaders, seem to be unable to provide an intelligent answer to the question "Whom shall we put in their place?" often inclining towards Communism as though it were their only hope.

About a year ago some organs of the Daily Press were howling for my internment because I dared to suggest that Russia might not win and that it would be better for everyone if we negotiated before her military position deteriorated still further. Now, however, they are themselves beginning to hint at the possibility of a Soviet collapse.

What will happen in India cannot be foreseen. One thing, however, is quite certain and that is that we have more than enough on hand already without starting a new "war" anywhere and the Government's action in arresting the Indian leaders provides yet another forcible reminder of the old saying that those whom the gods would destroy they first drive mad. I do not myself agree with all of Mahatma Gandhi's ideas but he is unquestionably a great and a good man and therefore one with whom it should be unnecessary for decent people to get into a fight. Quite apart from the trouble in India itself which is likely to be extremely serious, our professed claim to be fighting for freedom and democracy will be further discredited throughout the entire world and I shall be surprised if very strong feeling, by no means helpful to the Government's war effort, is not aroused among many of those Socialists in Britain who have not lost their heads or sacrificed their principles.

The recent Parliamentary debate on Regulation 18B, while it provided a few good speeches from the handful of members who are not blind to the importance of maintaining civil rights and liberties even in war-time, revealed the vast majority of M.P.'s as government yes-men who are as indifferent to the maintenance of freedom, justice and democracy in their own country as they are apparently concerned about them in Poland. There was a repetition of the usual clap-trap about preferring to keep a hundred innocent people in prison rather than risk the release of half-a-dozen who might render some assistance to the enemy. It has apparently never occurred to these muddle-headed watchdogs for the nation's safety that, whatever may have been the case on the Continent, there has never existed in this country a political group so pro-German as to desire to betray the country in the event of invasion; while the only really dangerous helpers of the enemy, i.e., spies or agents do not advertise themselves by criticism of the government and the war and do not come under Regulation 18B at all!

Although not normally one of the most unintelligent or most unprincipled members of the House of Commons, one of the worst speeches in the debate was provided by Mr. Pritt who hinted at the desirability of the imprisonment of those who oppose the Second Front. It may safely be assumed that Mr. Pritt does not possess the military knowledge necessary to enable him to decide whether the exceedingly risky venture of a Second Front has a reasonable chance of success. Yet so frantic has he been rendered by the danger to his idol that he would not only risk the lives of his fellow-countrymen in what may be a useless gamble but he would imprison those who do not support him in sending them to probable death!

It becomes more and more apparent that, whatever the military results of the war, the victory of Nazism is already complete in the minds of many of our politicians.

Reference has already been made to the growing disillusionment about the war and about the government which is becoming apparent among our people. This disillusionment is most obvious in districts where food difficulties are beginning to appear. Early in the war some of my friends said that sense would only enter the minds of the British people when they began to feel the pinch of want. I always hoped that my fellow-countrymen would not be quite such fools, but it is beginning to look as though my friends were right!

Even where there is dissatisfaction, however, there seems to be, as yet, little inclination to turn in what is obviously the right direction for better leadership. There is often an acquiescence in the idea that another member of the Cabinet "old gang" might be given a trial in place of Mr. Churchill. What use, however, would that be? Even the anti-government politicians who promise a more vigorous and efficient prosecution of the war are not likely to get us very far. Granted that inefficiency is rampant, even the most efficient superman could hardly get our army to Berlin after the way in which their predecessors' blunders have queered the pitch, especially if Russia should be put out of action or severely crippled.

The leaders to whom sensible people would do well to turn are obviously the small group who from the first have adopted a bold and critical attitude towards this war—men like Lloyd-George, McGovern, Maxton, Rhys Davies and Stokes. They may not, all of them, be men who have never made a mistake and are beyond even minor criticism, but which of us is? Anyhow they have shown ability to profit by experience where others have learned nothing; moral courage where others have gone with the crowd; and vision and imagination where others have been totally blind.

So much for the dark features of the situation. Is there anything on the other side?

Tragic as is the exhibition that a large section of the British nation has made of itself in accepting wrong leadership and swallowing poisonous propaganda, there is still an element of really fine material which can both lead and learn.

There is also evidence that in spite of the success of their armies the German people are as sick of war as we are. Neutral observers report that there is no enthusiasm for the war but the Germans fight on because the foolish threats of punishment uttered by many of our politicians and the memory of the way in which they were betrayed over President Wilson's Fourteen Points at the end of the last war, make them feel that if they are to avoid another peace even more harsh than Versailles, they have no alternative but to secure complete victory. The suggestion of a negotiated peace which would give them—and us—deliverance from further slaughter without humiliation and without loss of protective power, would make an appeal of such tremendous strength that it is doubtful if Hitler would dare to reject the proposal even if he wished to do so. One may hope that at this late hour the silly objection that a negotiated peace, now, might mean danger of another war later on is at last discredited. Even if there were another war later on and all the opportunities of preventing that catastrophe which peace would surely bring, were neglected; in the name of reason who has most to gain by a respite at the present time? Is it Hitler?

I may perhaps conclude this survey of the present situation with the words I would have used recently in the House of Lords had not the members come to the somewhat strange conclusion that the results of the war; the competence of our political leaders; and the adequacy of the help we receive from our major allies have no direct bearing on the maintenance of the unity and solidarity of the Empire.

'In the past we have followed blind guides and as a result have fallen into the ditch. We shall certainly not climb out of the ditch by trying to deceive ourselves into believing that the bottom is the high-road to victory.

At this time of crisis, we need at the head of affairs, not merely able men, but good men. I would even go so far as to say that we need men who are, to use the fine old-fashioned phrase, "men of God." I do not wish to be uncharitable, but I doubt if even their most ardent supporters could describe the majority of the members of the present Cabinet as "men of God"; yet unless we can have as leaders men whose vision is clearer than mere human vision; men whose strength is greater than mere human strength; men whose integrity and uprightness of character are greater than can be based on a mere human standard of ethics, it will not be a case of seeing what we can do for the more adequate promotion of the unity and solidarity of the Empire, but a case of watching the Empire crumble and collapse. If that should happen, the eternal truth will once more be vindicated that those who take the sword will perish by the sword, no matter how lofty their motives. You cannot count on achieving right aims by evil methods; least of all by the method of war which not only kills bodies but corrupts minds as well. If this war had been the wonderful crusade that it is supposed to be, its general effect on the character of the nation would have been purifying and uplifting. It has not been purifying and uplifting and it is no use to pretend that it has. The spirit of hatred and revenge increases; vice and crime, corruption and falsehood, are increasing. State tyranny and injustice are increasing, even in those countries which, by the method of war, are seeking to remove tyranny and injustice from other lands. "Turn back, O man, forswear thy foolish ways" would be a good motto for many to take to heart.'

LIVERPOOL: "CHRISTIANITY CALLING"

The Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., presided in Hope Street Unitarian Church Hall on Wednesday, July 22, when the Rev. A. D. Belden, D.D., delivered an address on "Christianity Calling."

Mr. Spencer said the purpose of the movement was to present to the world the challenge of a vital Christianity.

The Rev. A. D. Belden said:—

"We are very proud, in our movement, to include Mr. Spencer in our number. It makes us feel we have one deep and live root in your City."

Dr. Belden said that "Christianity Calling" was essentially and emphatically a movement of unofficial Christianity. They sprang into being as a protest against the churches' official utterance on the subject of the war. It took a World War to produce a Social Conscience in the Christian churches, and when the war was over, that conscience went to sleep. It was no new thing for business men to take the world out of their hearts, in order to stuff it into their pockets.

Hamilton Anti-Parliamentarian War Objectors

The following report is reproduced from the columns of "The Hamilton Advertiser", for Saturday, August1, 1942:—

CIVIL DEFENCE DUTIES.

Hamilton Man's Failure to Apply for Registration.

An interesting trial, the first of its kind in the district, took place before Sheriff Brown at Hamilton on Monday, the accused being charged with having failed to make application to be registered under the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Registration) Order, 1941. He was David Gibson Brown (21), miner, now residing at 22 Abbotsford Road, Hamilton, and on the date of the alleged offence, September 14 last, at 103 Albert Buildings, Earnock. The Procurator Fiscal (Mr. J. C. Patterson) conducted the case for the prosecution, and Mr. Guy Aldred, Glasgow, appeared for the defence.

Preliminary objections to the relevancy of the complaint were stated by Mr. Aldred. These were of a legal nature with one exception, which was that the prosecution was contrary to the law of Scotland in respect that it raised a question of civil liberty which could not be adjudged by a court of summary jurisdiction. The Sheriff repelled the objections.

The Town Clerk (Mr. William Crawford) gave formal evidence regarding the provisions of the Order. In reply to Mr. Aldred, witness said he thought that registration was a condition precedent to any appeal, and quoted from an official notice that "after registration application may be made for exemption from enrolment or for release from duties."

A Conscientious Objection.

A member of the Ministry of Labour's staff at Hamilton said the accused presented himself at the appointed place of registration on September 14. He did not apply for registration, stating that he had a conscientious objection to anything in connection with war. Mr. Aldred—He didn't say he had conscientious objections to registering? Witness—No, he did not; only to anything connected with war. Sheriff—Is it your evidence that, for the reason he stated, he refused to make application to be registered." Witness—Yes.

Mr. W. G. Frame, Fire Guard Staff Officer, said that among the applications he found an unsigned form in the name of the accused. He regarded that as a failure to make application for registration as required by the notive given in terms of the Order. In reply to Mr. Aldred, witness said he considered that the accused was in the same category as a man who had failed to report at the Exchange.

Police evidence was given that, when seen by two officers, cautioned and charged, the accused replied: "That's right. I called at the Exchange that day and told them I was not going to register. I am still of the same mind."

No witnesses were called for the defence.

Now Willing To Register.

Addressing the Court, Mr. Aldred submitted that the accused did make application for registration, otherwise there was no sense in his going to the Exchange. When he saw the application form, however, he thought that by signing it he would be enrolling for war work, to which he had a conscientious objection.

The Sheriff asked whether, if his failure to comply with the requirement had been due to a misunderstanding, the accused would register now.

Mr. Aldred replied that he thought if the accused understood he could go before a Hardship Committee he would register.

The Sheriff informed him, however, that he must register unconditionally.

Accused, it was stated, could state the grounds of his objection, and it would be for the committee to decide whether it was one which could be sustained or not.

After explaining the position to him, Mr. Aldred informed the Court that Brown was now willing to register.

The Sheriff found the charge proved, and—in view of accused's attitude now—continued the case until Monday for sentence.

The Court dealt in a similar way with a complaint in the same terms against John Gibson Brown, 102 Albert Buildings, Earnock.

The Glasgow "Evening Citizen" for Monday, July 27, publishes a good report of the case. The hearings and opening sentence were as follows:—

GUY ALDRED IS MINER'S "COUNSEL."

Mr. Guy Aldred, well-known Glasgow political figure, conducted the defence of a miner, David Gibson Brown, 22 Abbotsford Road, Burnbank, who was charged at Hamilton Sheriff Court to-day. . . .

The Hamilton Advertiser for Saturday, August 8, mentions that the Brown cases were called again at the Sheriff Court on Monday, August 3. The Fiscal reported that the accused had made the necessary application and Sheriff Substitute Brown said that he did not think it was essential in the public interest to impose any penalty on the accused. He dismissed them with an admonition.

Our comrades have appealed as Conscientious Objectors. If it is necessary, in due course, they will make their stand, as they view civil defence as a phase of war activity.

We wish to express our personal appreciation of the courtesy shown towards us in connection with this matter by Mr. J. C. Patterson, Procurator Fiscal of Hamilton. He presented his case with scrupulous care and courtesy. He has shown a similar care in the case of our comrade, Leigh Fisher, whose cases will be reported fully next month. Sheriff Substitute Brown ,also, betrayed great regard for fairness and accuracy in the way in which he presided over the proceedings. We hold that it is a public duty to attack prosecutors and judges whenever they coerce or bully prisoners. or accused persons. We also believe that it is true democracy to applaud judges and prosecutors whenever they reveal respect for the laws of evidence and the principles of jurisprudence. Considering that we are living during a period of war crisis, and that these are cases of war opposition, the impartiality and fairness of these proceedings should be recorded. Such conduct contributes to final human well-being and the growth of principles of equity and liberty upon which the commonwealth of human well-being will be founded in the future.

UNITED STATES HUMANISTS

We have been compelled to hold Our Letter Box over for a month. The following letter from the Rev. Charles F. Potter, of the First Humanist Society of New York, calls for immediate publication :—

Hotel Ansonia,
Broadway at 73rd St.,
New York City, June 30, 1942.

Dear Mr. Aldred,

I am a little disturbed by the misinformation conveyed on page 124, Vol. III, June 1942 issue of "The Word," about the Humanist Movement in U.S.A. Speaking as founder of the First Humanist Society of New York, a member of the Board of the American Humanist Society, and as one identified with the movement here many years, also as the author of books and pamphlets on the subject, I find my hackles rising at the implications that Humanism is identified with Pacifism and Socialism. There are humanists who are pacifistic and/or socialistic, but there are others who are not.

William Floyd, the editor of "The Arbitrator," is a good friend of mine and a supporter of our Society, but that paper is not "the organ of the Humanist Movement." The quarterly called "The Humanist," published by the American Humanist Society, and edited by Rev. Edwin H. Wilson of 1201 Union Street, Schenectady, New York, is recognised as the official organ. "The Arbitrator" has one page devoted to Humanism, edited by Mr. Wakefield, a member of my Society, but the rest of the paper is largely devoted to the cause of Socialism and Pacifism. Mr. Floyd is interested in these fields as well as in Humanism, but he has been careful frequently to state that not all Humanists agree with him.

Likewise, there are Unitarian pacifists, but many Unitarians here who are not. I speak as a life-member of the American Unitarian Association. Your list of U.S. Humanists is incomplete. Nearly 100 Unitarian ministers have lately swung to Humanism. And "The Word" cannot be obtained "in all these centers." I saw it to-day for the first time!

Please do not consider this a hostile letter. I much appreciate your free advertisement of the movement. I am only trying to set you right. I crave your friendship and co-operation toward a better world!

Fraternally yours,

CHARLES FRANCIS POTTER.

Every Humanist Center ought to circulate The Word. We shall be glad to give full publicity to the activity of each and every local of the Humanist Movement in the United States.

DR. JOHN HEWETSON

On Saturday, July 25, last, John Christopher Hewetson, M.D., aged 29, medical practitioner, of Willow Road, Hampstead, London, N.W., was charged at the North London Police Court with refusing to submit to medical examination under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act.

Mr. Lane Mitchell, counsel for the Ministry of Labour and National Service, said Dr. Hewetson failed to register under the Act. He wrote a letter to the chairman of the London Tribunal for conscientious objectors stating that while he was ready to co-operate with the State in all matters affecting the welfare of the State he could not recognise its right to introduce military or industrial conscription. Neither could he recognise the right or fitness of any man or men to pass judgment on the conscience of another. He was registered provisionally as a conscientious objector, but he did not attend before the local tribunal and his name was ordered to be struck off the register.

Mr. Addis, solicitor defending, said Dr. Hewetson had offered all along the line to do voluntary unpaid work in a medical capacity but he held the conviction that the principle of compulsion was wrong. He did not appear before the tribunal because he felt that it would be submitting to compulsion.

Dr. Hewetson is connected with "War Commentary." We confess that we do not understand the defence put forward on his behalf or the point of engaging a solicitor under such circumstances. Surely he might have put his case before the Tribunal if he was willing to do unpaid medical work under war conditions. It was not unreasonable to appear before a Tribunal and say so?

We can understand Dr. Hewetson refusing to do anything. We can understand his refusal to recognise the Tribunal. That is consistent with a complete Anarchist Anti-war attitude. But the solicitor's plea and the letter offering to do unpaid medical work are totally inconsistent with such an attitude. Whatever the result, he would have lost no status, and would have been better advised, to have appeared before the Tribunal and to have stated his position clearly, especially after the Ministry of Labour provisionally registered him. Heretodox opinion demands of its upholder a consistency of expression in words and conduct. Anarchism is not a rabid philosophy of denunciation, but a wisdom of thought and living. It uses words to promote culture and to develop a harmony of mind and conduct.

War Commentary, in its issue for August, published a very unsatisfactory account of this case. It refers to Dr. Hewetson as a member of its Editorial Board and is indignant with Reynolds' News for stating that he "was willing to co-operate with the State." That is precisely what his letter and defence amounted to. War Commentary complains :—

This statement is, of course, entirely unfounded. Comrade Hewetson is one of the best militants of the Anarchist movement in this country, and has been a regular contributor to "War Commentary" for the past two years.

This is no reply. The statement was founded on Dr. Hewetson's own defence. His association with our contemporary proves nothing. Are not some Anarchists engaged on airplane manufacture? Do they not spend their holidays urging syndicalism? Is this Anti-Militarist Militancy? Our contemporary may think so. We do not.

THE DUKE of BEDFORD
HIS HOUSE OF LORDS' STAND

The Duke of Bedford's interrupted speech in the House of Lords on Tuesday, July 21, was reported widely in the press throughout Great Britain and Ireland. Some of the headlines were sensational. We select:

The " Daily Sketch ", London:—

PACIFIST DUKE SILENCED BY PEER OF 82.

The " News Chronicle " report said:—

A speech by the pacifist Duke of Bedford in which he attacked Mr. Churchill was critically received.

The " Western Mail " stated:—

The Duke of Bedford, whose views have previously offended Members of the House of Lords. . . .

The " Aberdeen Press and Journal " said:—

The Duke of Bedford, whose unpopular views have previously offended members of the House of Lords, to-day appalled their lordships when he wanted to . . .

The " Daily Mail " gave a picture of the scene. We excerpt:—

The pacifist Duke of Bedford was the centre of a strange scene in the House of Lords last night.

His views, which included an attack on the Prime Minister and on American arms firms, so annoyed the House . . .

Other papers, like the " Manchester Guardian ", and " The Scotsman ", Edinburgh, reported the occurrence in these terms:—

The Duke of Bedford (who is a pacifist) surprised the House of Lords last night by launching an attack on the Prime Minister. . . .

The " Leicester Mail " said:—

In the House of Lords, the Duke of Bedford was stopped when making a peace speech. He said we should have negotiated peace with Hitler when the first soldier was killed. . . .

This was not buffoonery. It was an attempt to use the august chamber as the platform for a point of view that is familiar to all who know anything of the activities of a zealous few. When a nation is fighting a war of survival, to talk peace is not only a waste of time. It is thoroughly unpatriotic and highly dangerous.

The News Review, London, for July 30, under the heading Duke's Tirade, published extracts from his interrupted speech, sandwiched between pen-pictures of its effect and reception. We extract our contemporary's description :—

In the tranquil atmosphere of the House of Lords their lordships were listening peacefully to the second readings of a number of Bills. Viscount Elibank droned a few well-turned phrases about the unity and importance of Empire and Britain's noble legislators nodded accord.

Suddenly came a stir and a flutter. From his red plush seat the gaunt, angular figure of the wealthy Duke of Bedford was seen to rise. Their lordships sat up, for the pacifist Duke is rarely pacific when he airs his views.

The Duke was in good form. Expressing amazement that their lordships should sleep so peacefully in a " cloud cuckoo land " of complete unreality, he claimed to see the end of the Empire through the war, declared that blame rested upon the shoulders of one man—Winston Churchill . . .

Would-be peace negotiator Bedford warned his brother peers that if they had any real regard for the future of the Empire they should place no undue reliance on the United States, describing American armament firms as " selfish."

Peering into the Premier's past, his Grace sneered. . . .

Forgetting that their lordships were debating Empire, Bedford switched over to the Continent of Europe. Said he: . . .

Hopes of a second front stung the Duke to the quick: " Politicians who send an Expeditionary Force to the Continent—our last hope perhaps—inadequately supplied, are guilty of something very like murder, and I would say, if I believed in capital punishment—which I do not—that they would richly deserve to be hanged."

Lumbering to his feet, Joseph Albert Pease, 1st Baron Gainford (82), " Father of the House," took the only course open, moved: . . .

Fifteen years had passed since this formula had been put to their lordships. It is the only way they can silence one of their number. Even so, peers were not happy about voting the Duke down, in spite of his unpalatable remarks. Viscount Bennett suggested that he should put down a motion on the conduct of the war, as his attack on the Prime Minister and America was far removed from the unity of the Empire under discussion.

His Grace sat down, and tranquility once more reigned in the Upper Chamber.

The time will come when the Duke of Bedford's courageous stand will be recalled by every citizen of the world to his eternal honour.

PEACE AIMS GROUP
RHYS DAVIES' GREAT ACTIVITY

The Parliamentary Peace Aims Group composed of about 20 Labour Members of the Lords and Commons who do not see eye to eye with the official attitude on War and Peace is the largest compact body in Parliament with a mind of its own. Requests are now being received by members to address meetings all over the country. Recently Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P., and Mr. R. R. Stokes, M.P., addressed four successful gatherings on the subject " What Are We Fighting For? " in Llanelly, Pontyberem, Tumble and Swansea. Mr. Davies spoke in his native tongue and Mr. Stokes in English.

It is becoming obvious that there is a growing number of people in every part of these islands who are tired of the shibboleths of our rulers; there is a definite antagonism to the foul propaganda sent forth by the Ministry of Information.

At one of the meetings mentioned above a bright young thing asked Mr. Davies why, if he felt so deeply against War he did not ask the workers to stop manufacturing munitions. The Parliamentarian, however, who is too old a hand to be caught, told the inquirer that the duty of an M.P. is not to break the law but to amend it.

Rhys Davies, as Chairman of the group, addressed a very successful gathering at Pwllheli, North Wales, recently, when he advocated a change in attitude towards this War. He thought it would be an excellent move for peace if Hitler, Mussolini, Churchill, Roosevelt and other associates vacated their places forthwith and made room for others who are not soaked in hatred of the foreigner to bring humanity back to the ways of peace once again. In any case, he was not personally going to be a silent witness of the destruction of the best in the civilisation of his own country and Europe in order to gratify the lust for human blood, that insatiable racial hatred and the reclamation of rubber, oil and tin investments in foreign parts which animated the majority of our people at the moment.

He remembered the Tories enjoying the emergence of Hitler because forsooth they thought that at last that " evil man " would be able to set a sanitary cordon across the Continent to prevent the spread of Bolshevism westward. He liked the policy of the eminent statesman Burke who told his constituents at Bristol about a century ago that he preferred being a pillar than a weathercock in politics.

Mr. Davies challenged the supporters of the War to answer the pertinent question which he put thus: supposing Stalin is compelled to retreat back to the Urals and his army though intact becomes impotent through lack of food and munitions, what then? The difficulty we were faced with in this country at the moment was that those in authority still held the view that some day we would " Hang out the washing on the Siegfried line " which was a fatalistic line to take. They seemed incapable of projecting their minds to any to-morrow; they were certain that " all would be well in the end," because God is on our side!

Mr. Davies told his audience that during the first year of the present War he received only a dozen requests to proclaim his views in public. During the second year the number increased to 28; and when September 3, 1942, arrives, he will have addressed 104 public meetings advocating something better than the " last drop of blood " stunt.

JOHN WESLEY ON THE CHRISTIAN NATION

You may well say (but not in the ancient sense) " See how THESE CHRISTIANS love one another! " These Christian Kingdoms that are tearing out each others bowels, desolating one another with fire and sword! These Christian armies, that are sending each other by thousands, by ten thousands, quick into hell! These Christian nations that are all on fire with intestine broils, party against party, faction against faction! These Christian cities, where deceit and fraud, oppression and wrong, yea, robbery and murder, go not out of their streets! These Christian families torn asunder with envy, jealously, anger, domestic jars, without number, without end! Yea, what is most dreadful, worst to be lamented of all, these Christian churches!—churches (" tell it not in Gath," but, alas, how can we hide it, either from Jews, Turks, or Pagans?) that bear the name of Christ, the Prince of Peace, and wage continual war with each other! that convert sinners by burning them alive! that are " drunk with the blood of the saints "!—Does this praise belong only to " Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth "? Nay, verily; but the Reformed churches (so called) have fairly learned to tread in her steps. . . .

Who follows after ONLY the " things that make for peace " and things wherewith one may edify another? O God! how long?

—From " On The Sermon on the Mount."

THE GREAT MONEY ILLUSION

BY

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

[The following essay has been revised by the Duke of Bedford from a long letter published by him in "Forward," Glasgow, for November 5, 1932. It occupied the front page and carried two sub-headings: "HOW THE BANKERS TRICK THE NATION" and "THE MANUFACTURE OF 'CREDITS.'" At that time, Thomas Johnston was the editor of "Forward." An editorial introduction explained that the Marquis of Tavistock, as the Duke was then, "has done much writing and speaking on financial questions." To recall how the unemployed workers were exploited by the Communist Party careerists at that time in hunger marches, and to reflect on the part being played by the Communist Party to-day in alliance with Toryism and militarism, is to feel much sympathy with the concluding suggestion of the Duke concerning hunger marchers. The letter was dated from Cairnsmore, Newton Stewart, October 27, 1932. This ten-year-old advice merits consideration to-day when Thomas Johnston is serving the cause of High Finance as a War Cabinet Minister. The body of the essay is rewritten.—Ed.]

One of Mr. Johnston's recent articles on Finance suggests that it is about time people woke up to—and ended—a scandal of exploitation far more monstrous and incredible than the fortunes of the ordinary war profiteer.

It is estimated that about eight thousand million pounds were raised to pay for the war. Although actual figures are carefully kept secret for fear of the scandal if they were revealed, it is fairly safe to assume that only about two thousand millions were honestly subscribed by citizens of the country out of their savings and earnings. They have a perfect right to repayment of both principal and interest, but no one else has a ghost of a right to either.

HOW THEY "MAKE" MONEY.

Are people never going to get it into their thick heads that when banks make loans, either to individuals or to countries, they do not lend their deposits? They have the right to create the money they are going to lend at interest simply by writing down the figures of the loan in their books. The mere entering of the figures brings the money—"cheque" money—into existence, and entitles the banks to interest. At the cost of a few drops of ink and the fraction of a clerk's wages they are allowed to make themselves a present of the right to demand hundreds, thousands, and even millions of pounds from hard-working people. It sounds incredible, does it not? But it is true. The backing that gives value to the money created by a bank loan is not any wealth the bank holds, or has created; it is the wealth in goods and capacity to produce wealth in goods of the borrower, be the borrower an individual or a country. At present we are paying the interest on something like 6 thousand million pounds to banks merely for writing down money figures pricing our taxable value as a nation!

Perhaps you may ask how it is that such a swindle could possibly be allowed and could continue to escape detection? These are the reasons. All the ordinary citizens of the country are grossly ignorant about finance and so are the politicians. They know next to nothing about the way money is created and destroyed. Poor people think of money as consisting of coin and notes. As they have not bank accounts they are not interested in "cheque" money. They don't know that nearly nine-tenths of all the money there is, is cheque money; they can't see how cheque money can affect their lives, as they don't sign cheques.

Banks perform two functions. They create and destroy money. (Hardly anyone knows this or takes in what it means). Banks also take care of people's money and lend money; everyone knows this. Therefore the ordinary citizen assumes that when banks lend money they lend the money (i.e., their deposits) that people have entrusted to their care. The ordinary citizen knows that he cannot make money to lend to people at interest: if he tried, he would be put in gaol. Therefore it never occurs to him that banks should exercise so important a privilege, and naturally financiers do everything in their power to encourage the ordinary citizen to go on thinking that they lend their deposits, and prevent him from finding out how they get their money for lending.

There are various nice little bits of camouflage that help to keep the cat securely in the bag.

If anyone happened to notice that the amount of money a bank was lending was much greater than the total amount of money that people had deposited in its care he might grow suspicious. Banking practice however prevents this difficulty from arising, because, although banks do not lend their deposits, every bank loan in due course creates a new deposit. If a bank lends the sum of £100 to A it creates new money for the purpose, but as soon as A draws out this new money by writing a cheque for £100 in favour of B, the deposits of B's bank are increased by £100 as soon as he pays the cheque into his account.

Banks have another dodge which is very helpful to the hush-hush policy. The Joint-Stock Banks usually do not create for lending (by book entry) more than 9 times the amount of their cash reserves. If some unpleasantly inquisitive person starts telling the ordinary citizen that banks can create money out of nothing to lend at interest, the banker says to the ordinary citizen "What rubbish! Don't you know that bank loans are strictly limited by their cash reserves?" The ordinary citizen doesn't quite know what "cash reserves" are, but supposes them to be all cash, and the same thing as deposits (as a matter of fact they are neither); but anyhow "limiting loans by cash reserves" sounds very honest and safe, and he concludes that the banks are quite in the right after all, and that the unpleasantly inquisitive person has been talking through his hat.

But let us get at the actual truth. "Cash reserves" consist of coin and notes, i.e., real cash in the bank, but they also include things that are not real cash at all, namely, cheques drawn on other banks that have not yet been cleared, and any claims the bank may have on the Central Bank. A cheque for £100 drawn on the Bank of England gives a Joint Stock Bank receiving it the right to create, for lending, up to £900 or £1000 of new cheque money.

Deposits are not the same thing as cash reserves because, as we have already seen, deposits include much "cheque" money other than cheques drawn on the Bank of England and cheques drawn on other commercial banks and not yet cleared. People are sometimes puzzled by the fact that a person who has obtained a loan from a bank can often, if he wishes, draw out the whole or part of his loan in coin and notes. Surely this means that banks must lend anyhow deposits of paper and coin money? Even in this case, however, the loan of deposits is apparent rather than real. Jones may deposit 100 £1 notes in the bank and about the same time Smith may obtain a loan of £100 from the same bank and ask for the money out in notes. The bank may then allow him the use of Jones' notes, but does this mean that they have lent him Jones' deposit? In spite of appearances, no. The bank will make no alteration in Jones' account because they have let Smith have the use of his notes. They will not ask him if he minds his notes being lent to Smith and they will still consider themselves liable to let him draw out his deposit of £100 if he wants to! How will this be possible when they have let Smith have the notes? Well, either they will hope that Jones, though he deposited the money in note form, will be considerate enough to draw it out in "cheque" money form; or, if he insists on having notes they will try and let him have the use of someone else's notes, hoping that the someone else, if he wants to withdraw his deposit, will be content to do it in cheque money!

If all the borrowers and depositors came at once and asked for the full amount of their deposits and loans out in coin and notes the banks could only meet the request of a very few of them. The amount of coin and notes they could find to give to a government to which they had made a loan would indeed be often so tiny a fraction it would be hardly worth while for the government to take it! Banks, therefore, work on the assumption that most of these to whom they lend will be content to use cheque money which they create in the way that has been described and will never need coin or notes. Cheque money, of course, is just as good as any other kind of money for buying things. The evil lies, not in the fact that there is far more cheque money in existence than coin and note money; not in the fact that banks create money—for someone has got to do it; and not in the fact that ordinary bankers are "dishonest," for they are doing what law and custom allows them. It lies in the fact that money is created, not as a public service, but as part of a moneylender's business; in the fact that the methods by which money is created are inadequate and sometimes undesirable; and in the fact that these methods often give the banks far too much power and, in the case of government loans, a quite disproportionate return for services rendered.

I have infinite sympathy for hunger-marchers, and yet I am going to say what sounds a rather cruel thing. If they (and their friends) would use their heads more, and their legs less, they would find deliverance sooner. I hope I may have indicated how and why.

ANGLICAN PACIFISM

From time to time, the Peace News carries advertisements of the meetings and services held at the Church of the Holy Cross in Saint Pancras with Saint Jude, the Vicar of which is the Rev. R. H. Le Messurier, B.A.

The weekly leaflet of this church contains the usual orthodox, somewhat High Church announcements, except for two most important items: the tone of the prayers and the Vicar's message to his congregation.

In his weekly leaflets for August 2 and 9, our comrade Le Messurier invites his parishioners to:—

Pray for: An early ending of the war; The victory of love over hatred; The revival of true Christianity.

The Rev. R. H. Le Messurier's letter for August 2 reads:—

My Dear People,—Sir Edward Gray said in 1914, "All over Europe the lamps are going out. We shall not see them rekindled in our time." No, indeed. And, in fact, those same lamps will never be rekindled. They were human inventions which illuminated only small patches in the all-engulfing darkness of human sin. The world was living by artificial light. What lay outside the feeble rays didn't exist. The eternal realities—God and His eternal kingdom—seemed so unreal that those who spoke about them were hailed as dreamers who fell asleep, instead of being sufficiently awake to switch on the latest, most scientific, most up-to-date gadgets, which sparkled and were reflected in the glittering, golden, this-world paradise that man seemed to have created by his own unaided efforts.

But underneath this brilliant facade, hidden still in darkness, were the down-trodden peoples, crying to the God whom their betters felt too secure to bother about. Whole races of blacks, yellows and browns were deprived of their birth-right as God's children. Only a few candles were grudgingly given to these "lesser breeds without the law" in that empire which automatically seemed to spread "wider still and wider." And still the lamps of Europe went on burning securely. The awful lessons of history, the tales of other empires which had crashed because they were built on some form of slave-labour,—these were conveniently forgotten. There could be no such darkness on this new empire, for on it the sun never set. And even if it did, there were still plenty of human inventions to provide artificial light. The white man need never fear that he would stumble in the darkness. He could make all the light he needed. Like the Jews who had faced our Lord in anger because He told them they were in bondage. Britons never never would be slaves.

Of course, the British were no worse than the other European Herrenvolk. Naturally, they were the best. Let other nations try to put out any English lights, and, "by jingo!" there'd be trouble.

Ah! those grand spacious Victorian days and nights, when gas replaced lamps and in turn gave way to the splendour of electric light, when even a candle in a poor man's cottage window seemed to give more light than the myriads of giant stars, and when the secrets of the universe stood revealed in the white light of the new and powerful arc-lamps of scientific progress! How safe they were! How secure! The searchlights of the navy swung far and wide to overcome the surrounding darkness. "Glory to man in the highest, for man is the measure of things." And the light which gleamed from a stricken God on the cross, seemed but a firefly that had accidently fluttered into a huge, scintillating drawing-room. The truth of the God-man was but a glow-worm compared with the dazzling brightness of scientific truth.

Yes. But do we yet see that, without the Light of the world, we are but moths whirling madly in our "danse-de-nuit," imprisoned within the lamp-glass which we have made? I wonder.

Addressing "My dear People," on August 9, comrade Le Messurier writes, in part:—

"The pattern of the war, of the world, of life almost, changes with kaleidoscopic swiftness. On and on rushes the river of human affairs, twisting and turning, fretting and foaming, yet never seeming to get anywhere. Old familiar landmarks have disappeared. We are carried along with strange and fear-evoking scenes—whither? To what sea does the river run?

I sometimes think that, from the standpoint of the holy angels, this world must look like a travelling zoo. Man has built his own cages, poised everything on the top of a steep hill, climbed inside, and set the whole contraption rolling down wherever it likes to go. Not content with that, he is busy with mutual murder inside the cages, so that there will be as few left as possible before the final crash.

Have you ever seen a herd of cattle being brought to the slaughter-house. They go quietly along, not knowing what awaits them. An early victim gives a cry of pain. None of the others take any notice. The cows chew their last cud, lick their calves, and go docilely to their end.

Surely we humans have at least a divine spark of imagination. . . .

Must the blindness, the madness, the sub-human docility persist? Must the war-insanity continue? Must another few million of our men be slain? Must tens of thousands of our women and children be given over to suffering and starvation, disease and death? Must the world find new sites for new war-memorials? Must another unknown soldier provide a sentimental cult to help us escape from realism? Incidentally, I wonder who he will be. . . . Perhaps the unknown will be a woman next time.

And a weeping Christ still says, "If thou hadst only known . . . but now . . ."

Which is bold Christian speech. It is a pity that more clerics do not understand that there can be no compromise between Jesus and Caesar.

IN TIME OF WAR

My heart doth grieve for Humankind,
Oh, why are men so meek and blind?
Why do they hate without a cause,
And set aside all Christian laws
To maim and kill, and ask not why,
And yet be proud to dare and die?

Are they but sheep? Where is their sense?
That listen to mob eloquence,
And open-mouthed believe the tale
That war and murder must prevail,
Or they will be but slaves to those
Who have been chosen as their foes?

Slaves! Do they forget the years
Of hunger, misery, and tears,
From slum to unemployed exchange—
No further did their footsteps range,
And who was then the enemy?
Some hunnish fiend beyond the sea?

'Tis still the men who bled ye white
Who tell ye now that ye must fight.
And kill men whom ye never knew—
Men who suffered just as you—
For world-wide the master class
Have kept enslaved the suffering mass.

And when the war is won—and lost,
Will these same despots pay the cost?
By God, they won't! They'll rob ye still,
And chain ye fast to mine and mill,
Or have ye walk the streets again,
Each step to stound with hunger's pain.

Oh! must it ever be the same,
Fooled always in the bloody game,
Or will the light of reason shine
To smash for ay their base design,
Shine like the dawn of burnished gold,
To light a world of joy untold?

NINTH SYMPHONY

By Lady DUNN

Music lovers are doubly blest—in that they have the teachings of the "Sermon on the Mount" not only in Our Lord's beautiful words—but also expressed and embodied in the noble music of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."

At such a time as this — and when Beethoven's music is being brought to us all, for our consolation and cheer, by concert and broadcast nearly every day—it may not come amiss to remember anew the story of the writing of this great symphony.

"In the summer of 1823—Beethoven, now aging rapidly in ill health—morose and suspicious (as are most totally deaf people)—was living in semi retirement near and sometimes in Vienna.

That great music loving but fickle city had gone quite "mad" over Italian opera—and the great Beethoven was neglected and by many almost forgotten.

Beethoven himself, always a great lover of noble literature — had read, and been deeply stirred by Schiller's poem the "Ode to Joy" in which Schiller proclaimed his belief, not only in the "Brotherhood of Man" but still further that all living creatures, even to the lowliest a worm creeping in the darkness—MUST, at some time feel and acknowledge a Heavenly Father's love.

These words came to Beethoven's mind—at first frequently and then almost incessantly—and he decided to write a great symphony (his ninth) around this theme.

But with this decision came the question "How to make the symphony GREAT enough for such a mighty thought?"

For some time this troubled Beethoven—then came the solution.

He decided to take every musical instrument then known and used in an orchestra—and to add to this a great choir—the voices of men and women—young men and maidens — to unite thus all the known music of the world—and then UNITED to take it, as it were to the very throne of God Himself—as a thank offering.

Surely, this thought and work of Beethoven can be considered a miracle?

For here we have a composer to whom the direst calamity that could befall a musician had happened—complete deafness, an affliction which he hated and resented.

He was alone—for he had never gained his heart's desire, some beautiful and loving woman who would care for him sufficiently to be his wife— and—he was ill.

We might well have expected from him at this period—some dismal dirge—or some "Symphony pathetique" full of SELF PITY such as Tschaikowsky wrote—instead—we get this "ODE TO JOY!" perhaps the greatest outpouring in music of love, joy, and gratitude to a Heavenly Father—since the day when the "Morning stars sang together—and the Sons of God shouted for joy!"

The great symphony was begun in November and finished in February—for weeks Beethoven was as one bereft—he could neither eat, drink, or sleep—sometimes during long walks by day or even under the stars by night—he shouted out the great themes which almost tormented him by their beauty.

Then it was finished—and after a good deal of trouble which he should mercifully have been spared — it was played at the Statts Theatre in Vienna for the first time on May 7th, 1824.

A fortunate audience crowded the theatre—and Beethoven himself stood by the conductor and directed the performance.

The Viennese realized at once that they were listening to a masterpiece—and all their old love and admiration of the Master returned—at the conclusion they stood and cheered as seldom has any Viennese audience.

And He? the great Master!

He stood—a small bowed figure with white hair—his back turned to the audience—turning over the leaves of the score—tired and discouraged as he well might be—for he had heard not one note of his own mighty work—neither did he hear or was he conscious of the applause of the audience.

Then a young girl (Caroline Unger who had sung the alto solo) came swiftly across the platform with parted lips and moist eyes—she took the deaf Master gently by the shoulder and turned him round so that he could SEE what he could not hear—the raptuous applause.

The audience then sensed — many perhaps for the first time—the cruel fate which had overtaken this great man.

They rose as one—many of them in tears—and they cheered and cheered—waving scarves and throwing flowers—

And he stood—bowing—

A smile now round his grim mouth—for now that he saw the applause—surely he FELT it—flooding round him — passing through his weary soul—refreshing as summer rain — the love and gratitude of the world to whom he had given for all time—such a wonderful—such a stupendous gift — the NINTH SYMPHONY.

THE AUGUST DAYS OF "COMMUNIST" DIPLOMACY

AUGUST, 1939: Stalin's Agreement with Nazi Germany

Ribbentrop, German Foreign Minister, has come to Moscow. He signs on August 23, 1939, the Pact of Friendship, freeing Germany from all fear of attack by Russia. Molotov and Stalin stand behind him. This pact was broken, without warning, at dawn, on Sunday, June 22, 1941, when Hitler invaded the Soviet Union, without troubling to make a formal declaration of war. Stalin faithfully kept the pact to that date.

The Ribbentrop pact was defended by the "Communist" Parties throughout the world as a pact of peace until Hitler invaded the Soviet Union. In support of this pact the "Communists" organised People's Peace Conventions. Nevertheless, the pact was a pact for war and not a pact for peace. Whatever may be the deeper social and economic causes of the Second World War, the 1939 Moscow agreement freed Germany for war and so made the present terrible clash inevitable. Our sympathy with the common people of the Soviet, our condemnation of the German invasion of the Soviet Union, must not blind us to the criminal folly of a pact that was designed for war, not peace, and was never intended to emancipate the workers of the world from war and oppression.

On August 13, 1942, Winston Churchill reaches Moscow for a 4 days' Anti-Nazi Conference with Stalin at the Kremlin.

"THE INFERNAL TWINS."

In "Collier's Weekly"—the well-known U.S.A. journal published in Springfield, Ohio—for July 3, 1937, Vol. 100, No. 1, Winston Churchill published a striking article, indicting the dictatorships of the world, and defending democracy. "Collier's Weekly." is one of the most widely read journals in the English language and has editorial offices in Park Avenue, New York, and Covent Garden, London.

Churchill deals very thoroughly, although his facts are not completely accurate, with Spain. In its contents, our contemporary lists the article as follows:—

ARTICLES
WINSTON CHURCHILL
The Infernal Twins. Two unpleasant religions—Fascism and Communism.

The article carried the following editorial introduction set out in black type:—

What makes the Spanish civil war so inhumanly bitter? Not the Spaniards. Behind this quarrel stand two opposed and godless religions — Fascism and Communism. Both are enemies of democracy. Strip them of their externals and you can't tell them apart. Mr. Churchill reveals the essential character of these unlovely twins.

The author concurred in this description of his study. We cannot believe that the philosophy and principles defined in this essay were dictated by mere opportunism. Since this 1937 essay is of great import to every citizen of the world to-day may we ask the publishers and the author to reissue it, unaltered? It is one of the Prime Minister's most exhaustive, useful, and sincere pieces of political comment. His "Communist" and Labour admirers, and his Tory supporters, cannot object to his guidance.

CREATE THE REAL SECOND FRONT NOW

WHY BLUNDER ON?

Some Expert Opinions Considered

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government)

[The following essay was published by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, March 19.—Ed.]

Commenting on the most recent bombing of Cologne "Observer" in "Peace News" (June 16, 1942) remarks that whilst the photographs of the damaged city show that the cathedral escaped major damage, the report of 20,000 killed, although improbable, is not impossible. "But" the writer adds:—

"We may suppose, that for the Germans, the raid was a good deal worse than the worst of the London blitzes. Whether the effect on German morale will be different remains to be seen. IF THE GERMAN PEOPLE ARE AS DISCOURAGED AS THEY ARE REPUTED TO BE, THIS IS SURELY THE MOMENT TO OFFER THEM A TOLERABLE FUTURE."

An offer of peace on specified terms tolerable to the German people? Or, a threat of another war front on the continent of Europe? These are the vital questions which the British people, especially, have the responsibility to seriously consider before it is too late. For, although in the Treaty of Alliance between the British and Russian Governments the contracting parties go no further than mutually to undertake to afford one another military and other assistance of all kinds in the war against Germany, a Second Front is so confidently assumed on the basis of statements by responsible Ministers that J. L. Garvin could say last Sunday, that:—

"The news that a Second Front in Europe this year is assured by Britian and America has had a magic action of encouragement to Russia."

—"Sunday Express," June 14/42.

No friend of the Russian people could be otherwise than fervently willing to give them encouragement in this terrible ordeal through which they are passing. A Second Front in Europe may be — doubtless it is — the sort of encouragement the people of Russia are wanting. Can it be given?

Will a Second Front in Europe help Russia or increase its peril? Even considered merely as war strategy for achievement of complete military victory, a Second European war front could be, at best a hazardous gamble, which if it failed might lead to irretrievable disaster, not only for us but for the people of Russia and their socialist way of life too. In this connection it would be well, for all of us on whom lies responsibility for decision, to remember the case of China.

There was a time, even after we had done so much to build up Japan as a great military power, when we could have helped Chinese defence by withholding aid and patronage from Japan. Now it is evident that the British-American Asiatic War Front has put China in greater danger of defeat than it was after more than four years of Japan's most revolting and atrocious form of aggressive warfare.

To the "Yorkshire Post" last Monday (June 15th) its special correspondent in Washington sent a message which consisted of a most exhaustive examination of the Second Front proposition. Military specialists of America, states the Post's correspondent:—

"have no illusions on the matter. (That is the second front). They realise that a second front means a total offensive, and that means a life and death onslaught comparable to the titanic Russian campaign."

If the invasion were by way of Norway

"Possession would still have our armies gazing across the waters of the Skagerrack, which are wider than the English Channel. Mussolini's boot and the Adriatic Aegean Littoral can be reached at present only by way of 14,000 mile life-lines round Africa."

Of France as the only "natural doorstep to Hitler's European fortress," the "Post's" correspondent states that American experts believe it would need the initial use of half a million men with another million men or more troops immediately available for a "follow-through." "ANYTHING LESS COULD NOT BE CALLED A SECOND FRONT."

Then follows in the "Post's" Correspondent's message from Washington this revealing passage:—

"The grimmest part of a coastal landing is the helplessness of invading forces at the point of debarking from ship to shore. In 1916 enfilading machine-gun and artillery fire inflicted losses exceeding 50 per cent. on some of the British and Australian units which stormed Gallipoli. TO-DAY THERE ARE TWO NEW FACTORS TO BE RECKONED WITH — DIVE BOMBERS AND ARMOURED LAND FORCES."

After careful survey of all suggested plans for a Second Front in Europe against Germany the "Post's" Washington correspondent transmitting American expert military opinion reduced the possible feasible plans to two. One is to take "the natural doorstep" entrance to Hitler's European fortress, before mentioned. The other is to go through Spain to France with a quarter of a million, sending at the same time another quarter of a million by convoy to steam past Gibraltar and land on the Riviera.

Of these two carefully selected plans the "Post's" Washington Correspondent sums up as follows in the final passage of his message:—

"According to either Channel or Riviera plans, our initial Army must be augmented by a B.E.F. and an A.E.F. of 2,000,000 to 4,000,000 men. But its initial success is held dependent on gun-power and air-tank preponderance to enable re-conquest of France and the seizure of Rhine bridgeheads in an unchecked sweep. Advocates of the plan estimate the Nazi garrisons in France 500,000 to 1,000,000 men. Berlin could provide reinforcements only by stripping the Eastern Front, which would give Stalin's generals the chance they have been waiting for to swing in a mortal blow."

"BUT THE CONSERVATIVE U.S. EXPERTS BELIEVE THAT THE CONDITIONS ARE NOT RIPE, AS YET, FOR OPENING A SECOND EUROPEAN FRONT."

The day before the "Post's" Special Correspondent sent his exhaustive message from Washington, Garvin in the "Sunday Express" made this further admission of the stupendous difficulty of the Second Front war strategy.

"The shipping shortage is the bottleneck," said Mr. Garvin.

"It is the one remaining danger which the Allies will have to overcome BEFORE THEIR OTHER CAPACITIES FOR TOTAL VICTORY CAN BE EXERTED WITH DECISIVE EFFECT IN ALL QUARTERS OF THE GLOBE.

"During these five months and more of 1942, more allied ships have been sunk than have been built. More enemy submarines have been built than have been sunk. Their destructiveness has been worst on the other side of the Atlantic and manpower and munitions are now piling up in the United States faster than maritime tonnage can be made available for carrying them overseas."

The question put so courageously by the Duke of Bedford — "Why Blunder On?" is more desperately urgent now than ever it was. Dr. Goebbel's propaganda appeals to the German people for their patient endurance proves its importance and urgency. Exultant expectation of militarist victory because Cologne, Essen and other German towns have been devastated past all previous records is a deadly illusion. War takes sudden and surprising turns. It may be our turn next.

Think of the uncertainty of Libya, concerning which the "Yorkshire Post's" Air Correspondent on Tuesday last made the following fitting comment:—

"It does not matter for the immediate future if Cologne is flattened by bombing provided there is a pause for it to recover afterwards. But it does matter if landing grounds in Libya are lost to the enemy."

Surely now that, judging by Dr. Goebbels's changed tone in war propaganda, the German people are feeling what war means (as we also shall when our severest time of trial comes)— is the time for an offer of peace on specified terms tolerable to the German people.

British Empire in the Far East has gone. Even the system of blocked credit transactions in foreign trade — a German invention which more than anything created the rivalry between British and German commercial power which was the real main cause of the war — is now supported by a special committee of London Chamber of Commerce and the "Yorkshire Observer" tells its readers the glad news under mighty-sized headlines—"World Economy and Commonsense."

Why blunder on? Why not make the attempt, by the offer of a peace tolerable to Germans, to create a Second Front where it will do most good —in Germany itself?

A PEOPLE'S RUNNYMEDE

The signing of the Magna Carta was an important event in the development of England's social life. So important indeed was this historical charter that it is recorded in most history books as one of the really important milestones in the forward march of the Briton, towards Freedom and Liberty.

Magna Carta, we learn from history books, sealed the death warrant of tyranny and suppression, stamped the hall-mark of Freedom upon King John and was instrumental in making England a country well worth living in and fighting for.

But it has been left to Mr. Robert J. Scrutton in the 20th Century to reveal the corruption and falsification of the common law and the resultant legal network of Statutory Law which to-day, over-rides and nullifies the claims for common humanity which were made in the old Magna Carta. I quote one example at random from the chapter on Common Law which is summarised:—

"The ancient constitutional rights and liberties of the citizen were disregarded or violated:—

1. That he shall not be dispossessed or impaired in the enjoyment of his property or the exercise of his trade or in any way socially destroyed.
2. That he shall have safety and security to buy and to sell without any unjust exactions or implement.
3. That he shall not become strained to any unconscientious act.

The money power through their combines and boards:—

1. Dispossessed men and deprived them of their trades and their right to earn a living.
2. Subjected traders to unjust marketing conditions both as to wares and as to services they had to offer for the general good, and
3. Constrained men by economic fear and force to exploit their fellow men."

And these statements are adequately borne out and justified by factual details, all of which are clearly given.

"A People's Runnymede" however, is more than an interesting and instructive analysis of Law. The Author is no armchair critic. He is a man out to settle practical difficulties in a practical fashion. His opening chapters, written in a racy fascinating style, clarify vividly the post-war politicians' endeavours to maintain for vested interests a crazy economic system. One feels that these politicians with their so terribly profound statements, are comic actors in a pantomime world, while you, the reader, have been taken backstage by the author and with him see clearly how ludicrous are the antics of those pantomime politicians and how completely disconnected they are from the pulsing blood and flesh which is the real community—the people.

You, the reader, are brought up against reality in its most practical aspects and you find too that the author has an answer to the problems of to-day. Indeed he has a good many answers to the problems of to-day and all are worthwhile contributions to progressive thought and progressive activity. Mr. Scrutton is not desirous of attempting to change circumstances by forming or continuing sectarian organisations with a blindly loyal membership. His is a call to the people; the people who suffer and cause suffering one to another. And it is a call that you too cannot afford to ignore.

MIDDLETON MURRY'S "CHRISTOCRACY"

By MAURICE CRANSTON

[Last month we published a review of this work from the pen of the Rev. F. H. Amphlett Micklewight, M.A. The present review is written from a somewhat different angle.—Ed.]

"Christocracy" (Andrew Dakers, 6s., sold by Strickland Press), in spite of its forbidding title, is not just another essay in clericalist polemics. It is a valuable work of analytical and constructive political thought by Mr. John Middleton Murry.

Mr. Murry is a pacifist and a Christian; his title "Christocracy" derives from his belief that a good human society is one in which Christian principles are practised and in which Jesus is worshipped as Lord. But Mr. Murry sees that his country is not ready to accept either Christ or Peace, and has written this book on a level which he calls "sub-Christian," and which is also, incidentally, sub-Pacifist. This does not mean that the book is in any sense of the word disingenuous, but simply that Mr. Murry, having "no policy as a pure pacifist," is anxious to prevail upon his combatant countrymen not to forget, in the process of war, the values for which they are fighting. For Mr. Murry believes that Britain does stand for certain values, pre-eminently for tolerance and liberty, and that she has a historical mission to maintain those values in a world of ascendant totalitarian power.

Now, Mr. Murry was one of the very first political writers to discern the true nature of totalitarianism in the modern world. He was able to make his conclusions known in a series of broadcast talks some three years ago, with the result that rude remarks were made about him in the House of Lords. But few people seem to have grasped his point. The clue to totalitarianism, he reiterates again in this book, is the phenomenon of mass unemployment. Capitalism is by its nature unable to cure unemployment; only the intervention of the state can relieve it. Hitler acted in Germany and ended unemployment by turning the nation into one vast army. He was able to realise this sinister purpose because of Britain's lack of imagination and generosity. The temper of weary hopelessness and the feeling that the only escape from despair lay in a mysticism of destruction were created in the German people by the steadfast refusal of their victors to succour them. Mr. Murry says that Germany could do no other than choose Hitler in 1933 since the only alternative solution to her unemployment problem was Peace-Socialism, which would assuredly have been put down as "Communism" by Anglo-French intervention. At that time Britain had but lately rejected the creative solution for her own unemployment problem, when at the 1931 Election a blind and stupid fear for the safety of private possessions had brought to power a specifically anti-Socialist "National" Government in this country. The force of inertia had driven Britain to seek a solution to the unemployment problem along the familiar (capitalist) ways, wherein there was no solution to be found. Germany sought the solution of War Socialism. And here Mr. Murry detects the origin of the present conflict. The war, he says, is not the struggle it is popularly made out to be, but simply the means by which Europe has chosen to solve its unemployment problem. He writes:—

"Rather than advance into the unknown new world, the gates of which would have been opened by a peaceful and constructive solution of unemployment, the nations of Europe chose total war. . . . In yet plainer terms, this war is a vast evasion of justice to the disinherited of the modern world. Peace would have meant doing justice to them; and, even though war was known to be more utterly debased, more fraught with indiscriminate mechanical horror, than it had ever been before, it was not found to be too great a price to pay to avoid doing justice to them. Better the horror of this war than the justice of peace."

Mr. Murry proceeds from his diagnosis of the underlying causes of the war to an examination of the strategical situation in which the belligerent nations find themselves. He believes a total Allied victory to be improbable and undesirable—undesirable because a "peace" that involved the military occupation of Germany and Japan by Allied forces for an indefinite time would compel Britain and America to remain on a totalitarian war-footing themselves and to treat Germany and Japan as permanent captive nations. The sole justification for the war, he considers, is the defence of the British tradition of freedom and tolerance. And the perpetuation of this tradition depends upon Britain limiting herself to a strictly defensive war.

For this reason he is pleased at the absence of a Second Front. He would consider such an adventure fantastic. He thinks the Soviet Union should be left to its fate. He has no affection for Stalin, and seems to consider him worse, if anything, than Hitler. Russia, he says, is quite as great a sinner as Germany in the cardinal matter of unlimited brutality to the individual person in the name of the deified state. This, I think, is true; but would suggest to Mr. Murry that the Soviet Union has more to its credit, albeit very little less to its discredit, than Nazi Germany. Mr. Murry concludes that Britain's purpose should be not to destroy either Nazism or Communism by force of arms, but only to prevent them from destroying her own free policy.

It may well be asked why Mr. Murry, as a pacifist, advocates a defensive strategy instead of an immediate armistice: the reason, evidently, is that he despairs of persuading his countrymen to stop the war, and therefore urges upon them a policy which would involve a minimum of fighting and bloodshed.

The defence of the British tradition is not, of course, all that Mr. Murry asks for. He wants it to develop into something approximating to a Christian society, or what he calls Christocracy. How is this to be done? First of all by educating the young people of this country, particularly those in the Forces, into citizens worthy of the British tradition, and also by providing a concrete image of the new society to serve as a focus for their education. He says:—

"The only idea they can be given, which will save them from degeneration into an instrument of pure destruction, is the idea of a truly co-operative society—a society which is a veritable community. That transfer and transmutation of the spurious commodity of war into the positive community of peace should be going on now, by the awakening of social imagination in the men who compose our idle army. . . . Peace means the struggle to create by peaceful means a society wherein every man's talent is used at once for his own self-fulfilment and for the good of the common weal."

What is the substance of Mr. Murry's Christocracy? Its purpose would be to give economic security to all its citizens, to provide a system of genuine equality of educational opportunity, to see that the talents of every member should be unfolded in work for which he had an authentic vocation. To achieve this end it would necessarily demand decentralisation of industrial, and presumably of political, organisation. It would need the machine, but not the life-destroying monotony of the machine-minder's job. There would have to be a breaking down of the cleavage between the urbanised and rural population, and a general levelling of incomes between agricultural, industrial and professional workers. The key to it all would be the simple joy of its members in truly creative labour. It would seek to realise what Mr. Murry calls "community," or the dynamic sense of being members of one another in society.

The principles of Christocracy seem to me to be wholly sound, in so far as they do not differ from the principles of true Socialism. But I would quarrel with many of its details. Mr. Murry's genius as a historical critic resides in his exceptional ability to enter into the essential nature of his subject; this insight is unique, and it is not accompanied by an equal gift for constructive planning. I do not see why it should be. Planners are twopence a dozen. But the result, so far as Mr. Murry is concerned, is that his proposals too often emerge after an overstrenuous mental gestation and suffer an early demise under his own critical contemplation.

Hence, while the critical sections of this book are packed with profound thought, Mr. Murry's programme is not, I am afraid, substantially different from Mr. Aldous Huxley's testament in bourgeois sweet-reasonableness, "Ends and Means." Certainly, Mr. Murry has a far more realistic grasp of the political and moral condition of our time; for Mr. Murry's understanding is rooted in gruelling experience, Mr. Huxley's in telescopic observation from a comfortable distance. (Significant that Mr. Murry should have responded positively to the challenge of the war by becoming editor of "Peace News" and accepting the responsibility of leadership in the pacifist movement, while Mr. Huxley should be far from the maddening war in that scrap-heap of capitalist culture, Hollywood).

My own objection to Mr. Murry's programme is that, in his fear of the State, he has advocated the maintenance of capitalism, subject to certain restrictions on profits and abuses. He is also quite emphatic about the master-man relationship (or, as Marx called it, the exploiter-wage slave relationship) being natural and good. I believe that capitalism cannot, by its very nature, be an element of a good society. And since Mr. Murry himself has proved that the present crisis in civilisation is due to the inherent contradictions of the capitalist system, I do not see how he is going to transcend it (or even cure such evils as unemployment) with Socialism. A society cannot ultimately be both competitive and co-operative, although it may usefully be so incidentally. In an article published in November, 1935, Mr. Murry wrote: ". . . we are convinced that only when communal ownership of the means of production (i.e., Socialism) has been established will the human being be enabled to be an individual. Not that communal ownership of the means of production by itself will ensure the complete individuality of the individual: but without that it is impossible." I agree with this earlier declaration of Mr. Murry. Perhaps it is right to say that the master-man relation is "natural"; assuredly there will always have to be leadership and discipline, but should it not be the leadership of the proven best and not of the wealthiest; and should there not be a system of checks on leaders and the participation of workers in the counsels of industrial organisation?

At the root of it all, the crucial issue facing all who seek to create a better society is this: how are we to ensure both liberty and order? It is a tremendous problem, and Mr. Murry's book states its implication with remarkable clarity, even if it does not provide a wholly adequate solution.

NATIONAL PRAYER AND INDIA

Our Comrade, the Rev. R. H. Le Messurier, B.A., continues to express his views with fearlessness in the weekly letter of the Church of the Holy Cross in Saint Pancras with Saint Jude. In his letter for August 30, Comrade Le Messurier deals with the National Day of Prayer and also the situation in India in these bold terms:—

It is good that a nation should realise its dependence upon God. And it is a gain that the confident and even presumptuous assumptions that God is on the side of the Allied Nations which stained the first national days of prayer are no longer made so unthinkingly. Yet I confess that I can see no real sign of the revolutionary penitence such as God can bless in our nation.

When I read that in India one town was fined £7500, another £3750 and a village £2250; that the death penalty is imposed for cutting a telegraph wire; that meetings of Indians are ruthlessly broken up by police and troops who open fire on all and sundry; that military officers over a certain rank can take life in defence of property without having to render account; that a new flogging order has been enacted (in the past this often meant flogging without trial); and when I recall that the people of India had no choice whether or not they should be at war with the Axis; I can see little difference between the spirit which inflicts such things and that which prevails in occupied countries in Europe. Of course there are differences in administration, but it is the same spirit working in both continents.

The point surely is that if we condemn such things in others and do them ourselves, how can we approach the throne of grace and expect a blessing? Much more do we justify the condemnation of Gandhi when he said, "I see no difference between the Fascist or Nazi Powers and the Allies. All are exploiters, all resort to ruthlessness to the extent required to compass their end." "There," states an English editor, "Gandhi touches the quick of our national morality."

And if God gives the Allies military victory, is such a policy of repression the only new order that we can offer the world? Yet nothing else is offered, so far; and God is not mocked.

Few of our readers are members of the Anglican church. Most of them are Freethinkers or Socialists opposed to the Churches. Some belong to the Unitarian congregation, or to the Society of Friends. Those who are Anglicans and live in the North-west district of London, should attend the Church of the Holy Cross and so strengthen the splendid stand made by the Rev. R. H. Le Messurier for pacifism and social justice. Like the late Conrad Noel, the Socialist Vicar of Thaxted, our comrade Le Messurier uses creeds, sacraments, ceremonial, even the Mass, to express heretical thinking and to carry on pacifist and social revolutionary propaganda from within the Church of England. It is as though John Ball has been reincarnated in our day and generation.

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

The Secretary of the Peace Committee of the Warwickshire Monthly Meeting, writing from 8 Dr. Johnson Passage, Bull Street, Birmingham, 4, has asked us to publish the message issued by the Society of Friends, at a meeting of the London Yearly Meeting, held in York:

The whole world is drawn into common suffering. Is there no way out of its evils but by waging war yet more ruthlessly? War is evil and wrong; military victory will not bring true peace. Cannot our common suffering make us aware of our common brotherhood? Let us turn from the terrible deeds we do to one another and seek one another's forgiveness. The way of friendship can overcome evil. We see it perfectly in Jesus Christ. Its cost was the Cross. The loyal spirit which faced the Cross showed us the triumphant power of God. For us as children of a common Father it is time to follow His lead.

THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

Its Jurisdiction, Constitution and Procedure

By CHARLES L. NORDON, LL.B.

[Last month we published an essay by Mr. Nordon on "The World Court." We now publish a further memorandum which Mr. Nordon has circulated in official circles, in the hope that its theme may be thought worthy of development and presentation as an integral part of a constitution for post-war International Relations. Criticism, especially Socialist criticism, is invited.—Ed.]

Leaders of Public Opinion upon whom rest the duty and responsibility for preserving the higher order of life which we term "civilisation," are beginning to turn their attention to such alternatives to War as may be possible for the future settlement of International Disputes and for the Judicial Trial of actual and potential "disturbers of the Peace." The International Court of Justice seems in the opinion of many to open a field worthy of further study.

Just as the Statute Law and the Common Law of our own Country would lead to violence and anarchy unless Law Courts were established to adjudicate on disputes arising therefrom, so "Treaties," "Alliances," and "Charters," if interpretation and application are to be left to those who think they have the most powerful armed Forces.

Lord Halifax, then our Foreign Secretary, said on 15th February, 1939:—

"There is no European Government which has not proclaimed its will for Peace or has not stigmatised War as a fatal method of settling International Disputes."

but no one attempted to answer Hitler when, in his Reichstag speech of 28th April, 1939, he said (later events show with what degree of sincerity):—

"Would Mr. Roosevelt tell me how a New World Court of Law should be constituted?"

In the following pages, severely crystallised, but with the view that its publication may stimulate public thought, discussion and, above all, collaboration in its perfection, is set forth the outline of a Plan for the establishment of The International Court of Justice, which may be found more categorical and practical than the mere generalisations on the theme which have appeared from time to time.

JURISDICTION OF THE TRIBUNAL.

1. All claims by one Government in relation to the territorial administration or acts of another Government, and all complaints against the public acts, threats or conduct of individuals capable of endangering the lives, liberty or property of their own or of other peoples, shall be adjudicated by the Award of The International Court of Justice.

2. The proceedings of The International Court shall take the form of either (a) Articles of Arbitration (the bilateral submission of documents and arguments on a defined International Dispute). (b) Articles of Claim (Petition by one Government claiming relief against the acts or omissions of another), or (c) Articles of Impeachment (the charge against an individual of endangering conduct).

3. Articles of Arbitration or claim may be presented only by Governments duly constituted "de facto" or "de jure." Articles of Impeachment may be presented either by Governments or by the accredited representatives of not less than 25 per cent. of the adult population of a Nation.

CONSTITUTION OF THE TRIBUNAL.

4. Each other Nation shall in the first instance provisionally nominate two, and the Great Powers four, members of proved qualifications, high moral character and judicial competence, with a deputy for each member to act in case of inability of his principal.

5. The names, qualifications and biographical careers of the provisional nominees shall be circulated amongst all nominated members for internal deliberation.

6. The nominated members shall hold meetings for confirmatory election by secret ballot at which one adverse vote in four will disqualify a nominated member for confirmation.

7. Each Nation, one or more of whose nominated members should fail to be confirmed, may submit fresh nominees for confirmatory election as before. If a second nomination should again be refused confirmation, then a third nomination shall take place, but this time on open voting and the reasons for any objection to confirmation must be stated in writing by the objectors and voted upon by the already confirmed members. Any Nation whose third nomination has been refused confirmation, must wait three months before nominating again, and so on at successive intervals of three months until confirmation of the quota of nominated members.

8. Each nominating Nation may nominate as before successors to such of their nominees as shall die, become unfit to act, or resign.

PROCEDURE.

9. On lodging Articles of Claim or Articles of Impeachment, copies shall be simultaneously furnished to the Government or individual against whom redress is sought, together with copies of all documents on which reliance is placed. The respondent Government or individual shall lodge answer and supporting documents within the time limited by the tribunal.

10. After consideration of such written arguments and documents as shall be lodged on both sides within the prescribed time the Court shall publish notice of the date fixed for hearing and the proceedings shall continue from day to day until concluded, notwithstanding the failure to attend of any Government or individual cited.

11. Without restricting the judicial powers of the Court, its Awards may take one or more of the following forms:—

(a) Revision of Territorial Administration.

(b) That a Plebiscite or Referendum be held in any affected territory.

(c) Pecuniary compensation.

(d) Decree of outlawry.

12. Before entering upon the consideration of any case, each member of the Court shall take a solemn and consecrated oath that he has no personal interest in it and that he has not privately discussed and will not discuss its subject with any statesman or agent of any party to it. The penalty for breach of any such oath shall be the public dismissal of the guilty member and such other penalty as the Tribunal may prescribe.

13. Proceedings of the Court shall be conducted and their judgments and reasons pronounced in public and published in the principal newspapers of every country and repeated at intervals of seven days until obeyed and by such other methods of publication as the Tribunal or any party may think fit.

14. The Court shall from time to time make and publish rules for procedure, venue, language and sittings, and for the appointment of standing committees, registrars and other officers necessary for its due and prompt efficiency.

A. D. SCHROEDER

At 8 a.m. on Wednesday, August 26th, Mr. A. D. Schroeder, Resident American Representative in Britain of the International Bible Students Association (Jehovah's witnesses) was deported following the failure of his appeal to the Home Secretary, Mr. Herbert Morrison.

When the Central Board for Conscientious Objectors met three days later, the following resolution was passed nem. con.:—

"The Central Board for Conscientious Objectors sends its greetings to the International Bible Students' Association and particularly to the British section, recording its grave concern at the recent action of the Home Secretary in deporting Mr. Schroeder after he had made known his conscientious objection to compulsory service.

"The C.B.C.O. acknowledges with appreciation the faithful testimony to conviction borne by more than 400 men and women witnesses who have been or are now undergoing imprisonment for conscience sake in this country and assures the I.B.S.A. of its continued determination to maintain the right of conscientious objection to compulsory military and industrial service."

To this message the Association sent a reply of appreciation and thanks.

We are entirely opposed to the theology and teachings of the Jehovah Witnesses. We deem their entire propaganda one of superstition. But we do protest against this deportation. If America and Britain have so much in common as democracies, they should share a common regard for conscience. Conscientious objection to war should be no bar to the full enjoyment of citizenship rights in America of a Britisher, or in Britain of an American born citizen. We would have full citizenship rights established throughout the dominions of both Britain and the United States, and no deportation for opinions, or for any reason except that of criminal jurisdiction such as exists in each country for its own nationals. The Schroeder deportation is a scandal.

We are not complaining at his physical treatment. Every courtesy was shown to him. But the deportation was wrong in principle and contrary to the traditions of freedom established by the struggles of our forefathers.

PITY THE EDITOR

The increasing popularity of "The Word" has caused a large number of comrades to send increasing collections of MSS. It is impossible to publish them all. Our correspondence is very heavy and it is beyond our powers to write to every comrade. The Strickland Press staff is far too small to cope with all the work on hand. In addition to these difficulties, war-time conditions incline a number of comrades to turn to us for advice and assistance. This occupies a great deal of time. The working-day is very long and the working week consists of 7 days. And there are no holidays. We ask comrades to bear these facts in mind. Send your MSS., but keep duplicates. We cannot guarantee return. Write: we will answer if possible. But draw no unfriendly conclusion if your MS. is not used immediately, or if our reply is delayed. This office is a Citizens' Advice Bureau as well as an editorial office. We cannot beat the time machine. So, comrades, pity the editor, and make your pity a lively, understanding sympathy. We cannot work miracles.

SALVAGE

I asked myself—Where's the Wisdom gone
That the gods of our race have given?
Enough pure gold from the well of Truth,
To make this earth into Heaven.
Have they been too wise, or too obscure
When they have had their say?
Or have our minds been fashioned
From the poorest and basest of clay?

From the poorest and basest of clay, by God!
For what did I see this morn?
But the works of Plato and Bernard Shaw,
Battered and tattered and torn,
Lying mixed up in a salvage pile
Of nauseating smell,
To make a case for a cartridge
That would blow some poor devil to Hell!

THE PEOPLE'S COMMON LAW PARLIAMENT

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

This number of "The Word" contains a review of Mr. Robert Scrutton's book, "A People's Runnymede." His organisation, the People's Common Law Parliament, which I believe has the support of Admiral Creagh, who was mentioned in the September "Word", is interesting and important for two reasons. In the first place it seeks to re-establish the sane and just principles of the old Common Law of the country. I must confess that until Mr. Scrutton explained the position to me, I did not myself realise how important the old Common Law is, nor was I aware of the extent to which its benefits had been neutralized by the (often very inferior) Statute Laws enacted by Parliament.

The other reason why Mr. Scrutton's work promises to yield valuable results is that, with one exception, it seems to be the only real attempt which is being made at the present time to teach the electorate how to organize themselves for the direction and control of their Parliamentary representatives and thus exercise the functions of true democracy. Britain to-day is a democracy only in name. The people do not rule. They are dragooned by a bureaucracy of irresponsible Government officials and party politicians, behind whom are concealed the still more irresponsible financiers and Big Business interests.

I have said before, and I say it again now with even greater emphasis, that there is no hope for this country until the people stop trusting to their politicians to save them and wake up to the fact that they have got to save themselves. They will certainly not be delivered from danger from enemies without until they take steps to curb the folly and restrain the tyranny of politicians within.

Men and women, however, who are dissatisfied with the present state of affairs, too often ask hopelessly and rather helplessly, "What can we do?" The People's Common Law Parliament suggests an answer and a method whereby purposeless grumbling can be translated into effective action.

The other organization already active in the exercise of the functions of true democracy and in compelling M.P.s. to do their duty as representatives elected to carry out the orders of their constituents, is the Old Age Pensions Movement (Head office "Westmead", Southport Road, Southport). This energetic body has, by its large membership and numerous branches, compelled a reluctant and hostile Government to make concessions to the principles of ordinary humanity and common justice. The little paper which the Old Age Pensions Movement publishes is really most refreshing reading, with its sound appreciation of many important financial issues and even sounder grasp of the proper function and average character of an M.P. and knowledge of the right way of handling him. No illusions here! The average M.P. is recognised for what he is—no friend of the people, but a visionless, time-serving tool of a party machine; always trying to assume the functions of an independent delegate when he is really only a servant; arrogant or indifferent in the presence of a few protesting critics, but a coward when confronted by many.

It might seem at first sight somewhat strange that a pioneer movement in intelligent democratic thought and action should be recruited from men and women in the evening-time of life, who have reached an age not usually associated with a ready acceptance of fresh truth and new ideas. The explanation seems to lie in the fact that Old Age Pensioners are among the worst and most constant sufferers from the defects in the present economic system. Suffering has sharpened their wits and first-hand experience of those who have had the power to redress their grievances but would not do so, has opened their eyes.

Mr. Scrutton tells me that the mental reactions of his P.C.L.P. members are very similar to those of the Old Age Pensioners. When, in their organised demand for the redress of some grievance, individual, local, national or international, or in their insistance on some reform, they are brought into direct touch with their Member of Parliament and come to realise the full extent of his incapacity, obstinacy, or indolence, they begin to get mad —but it is a madness which leads to sanity!

The tiny minority of good M.P.s., on the other hand, are naturally much encouraged by the new interest and support which they find they are receiving from their constituents and, in some cases, may even be emboldened to stand up to the Party Whips.

UNITED STATES HUMANISM

Last month we published a letter from the Rev. Charles F. Potter, of New York, correcting some errors in our references to the Humanist movement in the June issue of The Word. We have received two more letters on the same subject.

The Rev. Edwin H. Wilson, Treasurer of the American Humanist Association and Editor of The Humanist, the quarterly magazine, published by the American Humanist Association, at 1201 Union Street, Schenectady, New York, writes:—

Schenectady, N.Y.,
July 28, 1942.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Your interest in the Humanist Movement in the United States is a welcome one. Several matters of inaccuracy appearing in your issue for June, 1942, are understandable, but require correction. I trust that you will publish the following.

1. "The Arbitrator" is not the official organ of the Humanist movement. It contains a very fine page of quotations from Humanists by Sherman Wakefield and the personal views of the veteran iconoclast, William Floyd, with occasional items by others. But it remains essentially Mr. Floyd's personal publication and while giving useful service to the humanist movement links it closely to Pacifism, whereas the Humanist movement is not primarily or essentially Pacifistic. Some Pacifists are humanists, but far from all Humanists are Pacifists. It is an error to identify the movement with particularistic reforms.

As near to an official organ of the Humanist movement as there is, is "The Humanist."Membership in the A.H.A. is $2.00 or more a year including a subscription to the Quarterly. Subscriptions are $1.00. Foreign and Canadian, $1.25. Single copies, 25 cents.

2. You have things reversed in listing ten or a dozen Unitarian Churches as "Humanist" churches. These happen to be churches with men as ministers who call themselves humanists and who were willing to have Sherman Wakefield list them as humanists in a Directory. But these churches, as Unitarian Churches, stand for religious liberty for all, theist or humanist and are improperly listed in any humanist directory. Were all the ministers who are members of the American Humanist Association—including Unitarian, Universalist and a few Methodist, Congregational and even Episcopalian ministers—to be listed, there would be at least 100. But the American Humanist Association does not publish names and is against representing the humanist movement as a new sect or cult. So far only two specifically Humanist societies have survived—that led for some years by the able Charles Francis Potter in New York, and a new one led by the poet-minister Hugh Robert Orr in San Francisco.

As far as its appearance in the liberal churches in America is concerned it must be recalled that it was theists in the mid-west who raised the cry of "ethics to the front!" and established a creedless basis of fellowship within which "even the hypothetical atheist" might feel at home. Nor should the American Ethical Culture Societies be forgotten; they are essentially humanistic and part of the wider movement. Empirical theists, also, are tangential to the movement and should receive humanist sympathy and co-operation. They need to stand together against Neo-Calvinism (Barth, Nebuhr, etc.).

3. It would be a key-hole view of humanism to see only the men who lead churches or ethical societies or humanist fellowships. Humanism actually pervades our western civilisation as the brave hope of the future. It is found implicit among all the naturalistic and pragmatic philosophers; men such as John Dewey, M. C. Otto, Roy Wood Sellars represent the philosophic movement. It is found also among progressive educators where the Dewey influence is manifest. It is the working basis of scientists who study science in the manner of Bacon "in order that human life may be enhanced." This is coming to overt recognition in a movement of Scientific Humanists in this country. Among them are Laurence Frank, Oliver Reiser, E. C. Tracy, Arthur Morgan, Albert Einstein.

Mortimer Adler, champion of a New-Thomism, asserted in his attack on American Professors that they are all "Positivists." Although he was not willing to concede the warm term "Humanism" to them, and Jacques Maritain has endeavoured to purloin the term and link it inappropriately with Catholic doctrine. Adler was essentially right in designating the major philosophic trend among American professors as "Positivism." If we take that term as equivalent to "Humanism," they are not Comtian positivists, but closer to what the Scientific Humanist represents. Humanism is the next step for religious liberals, freethinkers, rationalists, world-planners, educators who seek a unifying and emancipating ethics.

4. To sum up, Humanism is really a world-wide movement found wherever the new world view produced by science is accepted as the background for an ethics in which the fulfilment of human life and respect for human life is the centre and goal. The points at which this outlook breaks through the crust of the old supernaturalism, the old class lines, are innumerable. Let's not try to reduce it to a petty sectarian manifestation, but watch for and encourage all of its expressions, seeking at all times to unify the movement and awaken it to a consciousness of common aims and values. To this end we publish our quarterly and invite all types of Humanists to help keep the movement critical and creative. The goal is a world humanism embraced by all men of good will, regardless of their several private dogmas. A positive humanistic ethics need negate no theological faith, but can transcend or deepen all and serve as a highway to unity and co-operation among people of diverse views. That portion of men in our movement whose work seems to be chiefly a negation of the old supernaturalism may well weigh their work in a more co-operative and affirmative direction. I invite you to examine copies of "The Humanist" and grant in advance permission to reprint any of its articles, giving due acknowledgment.

Sincerely,

EDWIN H. WILSON.

Under date, July 29, Mr. Sherman D. Wakefield, Associate Editor of The Arbitrator, writes to the same effect from 114 East 31st Street, New York City. After protesting against the errors to which reference has been made, Mr. Wakefield points out that there are approximately one hundred ministers and groups in the United States entitled to be described as Humanist.

RESPONSE IS URGENT.

Begging is a distasteful business. But we are engaged in a total struggle against total war, for the service and salvation of all humanity. Will you help? We are facing a heavy deficit on our press—recently we installed a bigger press to do the work more quickly—and we owe over £1,500 on our pamphlet and paper production; notwithstanding the long hours put in by the small group who work all the time at the press, and so keep expenses low. Please help at once if you want our paper and booklets to continue to appear. Response is urgent.

DR. JOHN HEWETSON.

Last month we dealt with the case of Dr. John Hewetson. He was sentenced to six months' imprisonment at Hampstead on July 25. His case was taken up by Dr. Charles Brook and Rhys Davies, M.P., both unknown to him. It was learned that the Central War Medical Committee had considered his case, since he refused to register as a C.O., and had recommended the normal procedure. Following further protest, the Home Office placed Dr. Hewetson's case before the Appelate Tribunal. He was released on September 12, after having agreed to take full time work in hospital or institution.

NORMAN LEVERITT

Many comrades have written to us concerning the interesting letter published in The Word for August, from the pen of our Spalding comrade, Norman Leveritt, who is a member of the United Socialist Movement.

On Tuesday, August 18, our comrade was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for his determined conscientious stand. We reproduce the very full report that appeared in the Spalding Free Press, for Monday, August 24 :—

SPALDING CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR

Refused to do Civil Defence Work and Submit to N.F.S. Medical Examination.

Completely Opposed to War.

A Spalding conscientious objector, Norman Leveritt (19), of 4 Eley Folly, Hawthorn Bank, was sent to prison for six months at Spalding Petty Sessions, on Tuesday, for failing to comply with a condition of his registration that he should undertake full-time civil defence work, on or about June 11.

Leveritt, formerly a postman, first agreed to do civil defence work when he was registered as a conscientious objector, but, after a post in A.R.P. had been found for him at Crewe, he declined. Next, he refused to submit himself for medical examination for the N.F.S., and had bluntly expressed his intention of doing nothing whatever.

He was not legally represented, and pleaded not guilty.

The magistrates were: Mr. W. F. Howard (Chairman); Aldermen Sir John Gleed, R. Riddington; Messrs. C. R. Thompson, H. N. Shaw, R. S. Donington, J. W. Beba and F. Husband-Clutton.

Mr. Cecil Crust, prosecuting for the Ministry of Labour, explained at the outset that the penalty was imprisonment of a term not exceeding 12 months, or a fine of £50, or both. The Bench were bound to consider any reasonable excuse by defendant for his failure to comply with the regulation.

Order of Tribunal.

"This boy," said Mr. Crust, "was born on December 14, 1922. On September 17th, 1941, he made application to the local Tribunal as a conscientious objector, and on November 3rd he went before the North Midlands Tribunal, where he was ordered to undertake work in full-time civil defence. On November 25th he was sent the appropriate forms stating that he was registered as a conscientious objector on condition that until the end of the present emergency he undertook full-time civil defence work. While he himself was responsible for complying with the order, every effort would be made by the local employment exchange to assist him in obtaining work specified by the tribunal. If he desired that assistance he should call at the Spalding Labour Exchange as soon as possible in order that the necessary particulars could be registered and his name available for any vacancy which arose."

Declined Appointment at Crewe.

Mr. Crust said there would not have been the slightest objection if defendant had obtained civil defence work locally; he had the opportunity. The matter went on for six weeks from November 3, and so far as was known no attempt was made by defendant to obtain the necessary work. On January 8th he was accepted for full-time A.R.P. employment with the Crewe Corporation. He stated that he was perfectly willing to do first-aid work, perfectly willing to go to Crewe, perfectly willing to do what he was ordered to do.

"But on January 13th," said Mr. Crust, "having received the travelling warrant to Crewe he sent it back and declined to enter into any employment of any description."

"He says it was his conscience," added Mr. Crust, "but the Bench may wonder at a person with a conscience who makes a promise to undertake civil defence work and then turns round and says he will not do it."

On January 21st defendant was told he would be called for a medical examination for the National Fire Service, but he would not even go for that. Writing on February 4th that he declined to go, he stated: "As a Pacifist I can have nothing to do with this whatsoever." On June 11th he was interviewed by two officers of the Labour Exchange—Mr. Keen and Mr. Carter—and signed a document on which he had answered questions.

Absolute Refusal.

"The position is that this boy absolutely refuses to do anything in the national interest," said Mr. Crust "and in view of the letters which have been written and the attitude he has taken up I ask the Bench to seriously consider whether any fine would be adequate."

Mr. Crust went through a volume of correspondence dating from September 20th, 1941, when defendant made application to the local tribunal as a conscientious objector, and setting out the grounds on which he alleged he should not enter combatant service. There was a further letter stating that he had received the document registering him as a conscientious objector on the condition that he took up full-time civil defence work, and giving the information that he had been told at the Labour Exchange to carry on with his present occupation until he heard further. The letter was dated December 31, and in it defendant said he had called at the Labour Exchange that day and still no vacancy had been found for him.

Opposition as a Pacifist.

Mr. Crust came to the letter which defendant wrote on January 14th declining the employment at Crewe stating:

"After long consideration I have decided to decline employment in Civil Defence. I do so because of my complete opposition to the war, in which as a Pacifist I can have no part whatever."

Defendant was sent a letter from Regional Office pointing out the condition of his registration, and he was interviewed. He stated he quite understood what his position was. On February 14 he returned papers, declining to submit for medical examination for the N.F.S. and again stating that he could have nothing to do with the war.

He wrote to Regional Officer reiterating that he could not undertake Civil Defence work. He had tried to reconcile himself to it, but as a Pacifist he found he could not do it. The cause of his refusal to take up civil defence or enter the N.F.S. was that his "inner convictions" were against participation in the war in any way. He had not appealed because at the time he appeared before the Tribunal he thought he could do civil defence work, and it was only after the time for appealing had passed that he came to the conclusion that he could not do so.

In a letter three and a half months later, defendant stated that he still had not secured employment, and added: "And I have not the slightest intention of doing so."

When interviewed by the officers on June 11th, defendant had no statement to make but answered certain questions they asked.

George Louis Sands, an officer at the local Labour Exchange, gave evidence that on September 6th last year Leveritt registered as a conscientious objector.

Interviews with Employment Officers.

John Evelyn Arthur Carter, an employment officer at the local Exchange, confirmed the opening remarks made by Mr. Crust. Referring to an interview on November 27th, witness told defendant that he was expected to fulfil civil defence duties, and Leveritt said he was prepared to undertake first-aid work. He agreed to take an appointment at Manchester. This was not obtained and when interviewed again on December 17 he agreed to go to Crewe but asked that he should be allowed to remain at Spalding until after Christmas as he was a postman. The rate of pay at Crewe was 70s. for a 72-hour week. Defendant was requested to travel to Crewe on January 13 ready for work the next day. Then came the letter from him saying he would have nothing to do with it.

There were further interviews in which defendant said he quite understood his position.

"Not Ashamed of Recanting."

Leveritt did not go into the witness box, but read a long written statement.

"I have a reasonable excuse for not complying with the register," he said, "I have a conscientious objection to fulfilling these conditions, and I am well aware that very few courts have accepted that view. The prosecution has placed stress on my recantations at various times. I see very little to be ashamed of in that. Perhaps the Bench may think that I am in good company in that, and I may mention Archbishop Cranmer . . ."

The Chairman: "We are dealing with your case now."

Leveritt, continuing, said he registered as a conscientious objector because he was against war on humanitarian and ethical grounds. At that time he had no objection to doing civil defence work. Although he was allowed three weeks to make an appeal and it was not until the time limit had elapsed that his views underwent a change. In addition to his general humanitarian and ethical views, which had not diminished, he had also developed political reasons against the war, which made him take his stand as an out-and-out conscientious objector and an anti-militarist.

He viewed the war as an Imperialist war, as a capitalists' war in the truest sense, with its outcome from economic rivalry between the various Imperialist groups, Anglo-American powers on the one hand, and the totalitarians, Germany, Italy and Japan, on the other. It was not a fight for freedom at all, but for jealous interests.

He was not there to prove to the court that his views were correct, although he thought they were. No one with such views could take part in civil defence which, he contended, was part of the war machine. When he appeared before the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal at Lincoln they agreed that he held sincere views, and removed his name from the military register, and he asked the Bench to uphold those views.

Mr. Crust's reply to defendant's statement was that what he had said was nothing to do with the case.

In reply to the Chairman Leveritt said he was not working at present. He had been at the Post Office since 1936 but they had released him to go on civil defence work.

The Chairman told defendant that they had carefully considered his case, and he must go to prison for six months. They could not find that he had given any reasonable excuse for refusing to do full-time civil defence work.

Norman Leveritt's case must be reheard by the Tribunal. He is entitled to total exemption, since it must be clear to every intelligent person, militarist or otherwise, that he is a genuine absolutist objector, who knows where he stands, and has thought out his position thoroughly. He never ought to have suffered a day's imprisonment.

PERSECUTING C.Os.

Dear Sir,—When the compulsory military service was introduced on the eve of the war the promise was given that the persecution of conscientious objectors which took place in the last war would not be renewed, and I wish to acknowledge that as a whole objectors have now been treated more liberally.

There have been some exceptions, however. Despite pledges to the contrary, "cat-and-mouse" treatment has recurred. May I draw attention to the two severest cases?

Gerald Henderson, of West Hartlepool, is a religious objector. He was refused exemption by the Tribunals, arrested and taken into the Army. He has been court-martialled five times and has served sentences of 28 days' detention and 4 months', 6 months' and 7 months' imprisonment. He is now serving a sentence of 15 months' imprisonment. Yet the Appellate Tribunal still declines to acknowledge that he is a sincere objector.

The second case, Stanley Hilton, of Rochdale, is also a religious objector. He has been court-martialled three times, has served sentences of one year's imprisonment and 2 years' detention (commuted to seven months) and is now serving a third sentence of two years' imprisonment.

Have not these boys proved their sincerity? It is of no benefit to the Army to keep on sending them back to prison and it is a bit of a blot on the administration of the conscience clause of the National Service Acts.

Sincerely yours,
FENNER BROCKWAY,
Chairman, C.B.C.O.

TWICE COURT MARTIALLED

PETER McKELLAR

Our comrade, Peter McKellar, of 38 South Annandale Street, Glasgow, will have been court-martialled for the second time before these lines are in print.

Then aged 22, a glazier by trade, he registered as a conscientious objector on December 26, 1939. His case was heard on April 23, 1940, by the Glasgow Tribunal, consisting of Sir A. C. Black, K.C., Sir Robert Bruce, J.P., LL.D., and Mr. (now Sir) R. Bryce Walker, C.B.E., etc.

McKellar told the Tribunal that his father was killed in the great war. He would not butcher nor yet would he be butchered. It was enough that this had happened to his father. The Tribunal sympathised with him. He replied that he wanted justice as an anti-militarist, not sympathy.

McKellar lodged an appeal but he did not attend before the Appellate Tribunal on July 19, 1940. His appeal was dismissed. McKellar appeared before the Medical Board on August 9, 1940, and submitted to medical examination. He refused to report to the ——— Training Regiment at D—— and was arrested by the Civil Power and handed over on March 5, 1942.

At D—— on March 8, 1942, he refused to put on the military uniform, and was court-martialled.

The summary of the evidence was taken down and signed on March 9, 1942, by Captain J. M. Ritchie R.A., Adjutant ——— Training Regiment R.A., McKellar being referred to as No. 1140582, Gunner McKellar.

No. 967441 L/Sgt. Holliday A., ——— Training Regiment R.A., stated:—On 7/3/42 I was detailed by B.S.M. Hannaway to proceed to C.M.P. Headquarters, 20 Huntly Gardens, Glasgow. There I was handed A.F.O. 1618 in respect of the accused. I proceeded to Maryhill Barracks, Glasgow, where the accused was handed over to me. I returned with him to D—— and placed him in close arrest

No. 938189 Bdr. Catling R., ——— Training Regiment R.A., stated:—I produce enlistment notice (N.S. 12A) in respect of No. 1140582 Gunner McKellar P. On 27/2/42 a letter, dated 26/2/42, was received from Gunner McKellar, stating that he was a Conscientious Objector and returning his Enlistment Notice. This notice was sent back to him from this office on 28/2/42, together with a slip for Army Form B 204A. On 4/3/42 a further letter was received from Gunner McKellar again stating that he was a Conscientious Objector and again returning his Enlistment Notice.

No. 1026473 B.S.M. Hannaway J. W., ——— Training Regiment R.A., stated:—On 8/3/42, acting under instructions from my Battery Commander, I went to the clothing store in company with 2/Lieut. R. C. Smith, R.A., with a view to getting the accused clothed up. On reaching the clothing store I ordered the accused to take off his coat and waistcoat to try on his Battle Dress, but he refused to do so, saying "I am a Conscientious Objector." Mr. Smith explained the seriousness of his act and he replied "I understand perfectly." Mr. Smith then ordered him to put on his Battle Dress and he again refused. Mr. Smith then ordered me to put him under close arrest. I did so.

2/Lieut. R. C. Smith, R.A. (155350), ——— Training Regiment R.A., stated:—On 8/3/42, in company with B.S.M. Hannaway I went to the Clothing Store with a view to getting the accused fitted with uniform. When ordered to put on his Battle Dress he refused, saying "I refuse to put on uniform. I am a Conscientious Objector." I was at this time wearing my uniform with the appropriate badges of rank. I warned him of the seriousness of his refusal, but he persisted in this, saying "I refuse to put on uniform." I gave him a direct order to put on his uniform but he still refused. I then ordered B.S.M. Hannaway to place him in the Guard Room under close arrest.

The Court Martial took place at D—— on March 31 and McKellar was senteneed to 91 days' imprisonment with hard labour at Barlinnie Prison, Glasgow. He lodged an appeal to the Appellate Tribunal on April 5, and his application was endorsed by the Under Secretary of State for War on April 13. His case was not heard, however, until after he had served his sentence. He was returned to D—— and treated with every consideration pending his appeal being heard.

The Appeal Tribunal registered McKellar as a conscientious objector, but recommended him for non-combatant service. He was ordered to report to a N.C.C. Corps in Wales but refused to go. He was arrested and conveyed to Wales, on August 28. He was placed in detention and now (as we go to press) awaits a second court martial. Yet his name, under the National Service Acts, 1931-1941, is inscribed on the roll of conscientious objectors. Surely these proceedings are farcical. McKellar is recognised as a conscientious objector and ought to be treated as such.

NEWCASTLE OBJECTORS
The Stand of the Morleys

We have drawn attention in these columns to the Socialist and Pacifist records of our comrades Morley of Newcastle. We have given the history of comrade John Morley in detail, and also reported the cases of his sons, Robert and Alan. Portraits have been published of all these comrades. At the wish of our many Newcastle comrades we again direct attention to their witness against war. In Newcastle there is much local concern about the repeated prosecution of this family and a Morley Defence Committee has been organised. The Secretary is Mr. E. Archbold, of 2 Hartford Road, Gosforth, Newcastle-on-Tyne. All wishing to help should communicate with this committee at once and the workers ought to raise the struggles of the Morleys in every part of the country. They are not only witnessing against war. They are upholding traditions of conscience and democracy.

This is the position of John Morley and his two sons, as recorded already in this journal.

JOHN MORLEY—aged 57 years—Imprisoned twice during the last war as a Conscientious Objector. Outstanding worker in cause of peace all his life. Has already been imprisoned twice during this war.

ALAN MORLEY—aged 21 years—Has just been released from Durham Prison, having suffered twelve months' hard labour. Is liable to further imprisonment.

ROBERT MORLEY—aged 25 years—Imprisoned twice during this war as a Conscientious Objector. As we go to press, has been summoned to appear on 15th September, 1942, before the Newcastle City Police Court on a charge of not submitting to medical examination for Military Service. He is liable to a further twelve months' imprisonment.

Fuller details concerning our comrades make interesting reading.

JOHN MORLEY. During last war imprisoned 112 days Wormwood Scrubs and twelve months Newcastle Prison as Conscientious Objector to War.

In May, 1941, was fined at Newcastle-on-Tyne City Police Court £50 and £5 5s. costs for refusing (on conscientious grounds) to make firewatching arrangements at his business premises. On refusal to pay, unsuccessful attempts made to distrain at home and business premises. Ultimately on 1st July 1941, committed to Durham Prison for three months.

Shortly after release from prison the tenancy of his business premises were terminated by the landlord, and he was compelled to find alternative business accommodation "around the corner."

John again was pressed to comply with Firewatching Order. He refused and on 1st May, 1942, for the second time he was committed to Durham Prison for three months—no option of a fine being given.

British Law says: "No person shall be punished twice for the one offence." John Morley's offence is that he cannot conscientiously co-operate in this war measure. He has already, during this war, suffered two terms of imprisonment for this one offence. Technically, John Morley is guilty of continuous offence. This question was discussed fully during last war. Everyone recognises that, in cases of conscience, one offence is committed.

Two court appearances.

ROBERT MORLEY. On 20th December, 1940, arrested on warrant at work for not registering, and remanded in custody until 27th December, when he appeared at Moot Hall Police Court, Newcastle, on two charges; failing to register and failing to appear for medical examination. Fined £2 each charge and £12 4s. 9d. costs, and ordered to be detained in custody until taken by police for medical examination. On 8th January, 1941, refused medical examination and was released, having been held in custody for twenty consecutive days.

24th January, 1941. Summoned to Moot Hall Police Court, and on 5th February, 1941, arrested on warrant at work; sentenced to 56 days' imprisonment and committed to Durham Prison same day.

21st March, 1942. Minister of Labour—under Section 5 (7) of National Services (Armed Forces) Act, 1939—provisionally registered him in the Register of Conscientious Objectors, and referred his case to local tribunal.

12th May, 1942. Newcastle Tribunal considered his case in his absence—put on Military Register.

29th June, 1942. Summoned for medical examination, but did not comply.

As we go to press, Robert has been summoned to appear at Newcastle City Police Court on Tuesday, 15th September, 1942, to answer a charge of refusing medical examination, and is liable to another term of imprisonment.

This will be his fourth court appearance on pacifist grounds.

ALAN MORLEY. On pacifist grounds refrained from registering and failed to submit to medical examination for military service.

Arrested under warrant at work on 3rd November, 1941, and appeared at Newcastle Police Court same day. Remanded in custody one week—bail being refused despite surety for any amount. On 10th November, 1941, same court fined him £5 and ordered to be taken before Medical Board. Refused to submit, and on 11th November, 1941, sentenced to 12 months' hard labour and one month in default of fine. Committed that day to Durham Prison. On 30th November, 1941, transferred to Wakefield Prison. Later, because of his refusal on conscientious grounds to undertake war work in prison, was deprived of certain prison privileges, including loss of bed for seven nights, loss of one week's remission of sentence and re-transferred to Durham Prison. Released from prison 20th July, 1942, and since then has followed his normal occupation in the motor body and coach building trade.

Within three weeks of discharge from prison, pressure brought to bear upon him by National Service Officers, apparently to direct him to work deemed more helpful to the war effort. His non-compliance on conscientious grounds resulted in Statutory Summons to appear for interview at Local Labour Exchange on 2nd September, 1942. He refused to do so and is liable to further punishment.

Three court appearances.

A study of the foregoing facts must convince any normal person that the Morleys are sincere in their pacifist belief. If the Minister of Labour and National Service hopes, by the application of further punishment, to make them abandon their faith, he is alone in that delusion.

We ask the Minister of Labour, and also the Minister of Home Security, to relieve the Morleys from all further persecution. We ask the Socialist and Labour movement to respect the stands made by these Socialist Comrades for conscience and to insist on their principles being respected.

SONNET IN WAR-TIME.

'Tis wrong to sing with an embittered heart
Because we live in Time's most hideous hour,
Why let the hateful ugliness devour
Our sacred beauty. Ours the noble art
Of teaching men to play a worthy part,
And live for love of life, and all things good,
And build a Heaven of Joy and Brotherhood,
That Greed and Selfishness will never thwart.

So let us sing of gentler things, and fair,
And prove to those who are both deaf and blind,
That he who hath a sweet and lovely mind,
And knoweth false from true, breathes sweeter air
Than he who hath no mind to call his own,
And kneeleth meekly at a tyrant's throne.

Glasgow Anarchist C.O.

HIGH COURT APPEAL.

The "Scottish Daily Express" for Wednesday, September 23, published a report of the case of our Anarchist comrade, Edward Shaw. The report is not worded exactly as we would like, and too much emphasis is placed on Shaw's proletarian style, whereas his legal courage and forthrightness should be considered, but it tells the story of his stand and is a contribution to the records of the C.O. struggle and of the Anarchist Movement. It is also an expression of democracy. For these reasons we reproduce it without alteration:—

WORKMAN DEBATES WITH 3 JUDGES

Tousle-headed Edward Shaw, 36-year-old sheet metal worker, 173 Dalmarnock Road, Glasgow, pleaded his own case in a Clydeside accent before the Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Cooper, and two other judges at the Justiciary Appeal Court in Edinburgh yesterday.

His opponent was Mr. J. S. C. Reid, the Lord Advocate, chief legal officer of the Crown in Scotland.

Shaw, who appealed against a decision of Sheriff McDonald of Glasgow that he should be detained in Barlinnie Prison for a period not exceeding seven days so that he might be medically examined under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, lost his appeal.

But Lord Cooper paid him the compliment of saying that he had "presented his case with cogency and force."

"ILLEGAL" TERMS

Shaw's argument was that the Ministry of Labour's summons to him to appear for his medical examination was illegal because in a previous letter telling him that he would be called they used the term "without qualification" in describing his removal from the roll of conscientious objectors.

He pointed out, and the three judges agreed, that this term had been abolished from the National Service Act by an amending schedule in 1941.

He maintained that the use of this term by the Ministry in an official document sent to him might prejudice his future life.

"I am the only tradesman in Glasgow among the sheet metal workers who has been called up," he said. "The Ministry of Labour don't know my trade. I am now 36, and according the the schedule of reserved occupations I should not be called until January next year.

"It's me who is upholding the Act of Parliament, not the Ministry," he said. "They should be in the dock here, not me."

NO EXPENSES

Lord Cooper and his fellow judges in dismissing the appeol, told Shaw that though the letter from the Ministry might have been wrong, the actual notice summoning him for medical examination was quite legal.

Shaw appealed to Lord Cooper to "make the expenses as light as possible as I am only a working man."

The Lord Advocate, however, said the Crown would make no claim for expenses.

Shaw then asked the Lord Justice Clerk if it would be "all right if I surrendered myself in Glasgow."

"I have my return ticket in my pocket," he said, "and it would be much more helpful to me if I surrendered there than if I were pinched here in Edinburgh."

The judges agreed to this course.

"BLOODY BAYONETS"

Reviewed by LESLIE ROGERS

"BLOODY BAYONETS," The Complete Guide to Bayonet Fighting. By Squadron Leader R. A. Lidstone, R.A.F.V.R. Sketches by L/Cpl. M. C. Clifford. Published by Gale and Polden. 2/-.

"Bloody Bayonets" is the apt title of this spirited and instructive little book on bayonet fighting. The cover design shows a very grim, even ferocious-looking soldier advancing with fixed bayonet. A background of vermilion gives a touch of realism to the title.

"Bayonet fighting is a bloody business," writes Squadron Leader Lidstone. The chief characteristics of ability to win are confidence, cool-headedness and experience. The soldier "learns how to attack in mass formation, and the offensive spirit, so essential to this form of fighting, is instilled into him."

"Trepidation is the bayonet-fighter's worst enemy, whereas the man imbued with a veritable 'Bayonet Spirit' will terrify his opponent by his ferocious onslaught and will overcome him by fear before striking a blow. The 'Bayonet Spirit,' combined with a sound training in the scientific use of the weapon, must be inspired in every man who may be called upon to use a rifle and bayonet." Bayonet fighting should be encouraged as a recreation.

The author deals thoroughly with the various strokes and parries, and adds a useful tip to beginners that merely to tap weapons with an opponent "will neither frighten nor annoy him."

In a section given to Close-up Fighting, he writes "To use the point in a Close-up is impossible. In a fight with sharp weapons, butt strokes and tripping would normally take the place of thrusts, although kicking, the use of the knee and other unsportsmanlike tricks would not be out of place." "The butt," he goes on to say, "can sometimes be used to great advantage. . . . Nevertheless, the butt seldom deals a fatal blow and consequently must be followed by a bayonet thrust." Instruction is given as to how the opponent's face may be smashed by a right butt stroke or by driving the butt, end on, straight into his face. Tripping may also be employed, "but it must be realised that further action will be necessary when your man is thrown." The Right Ankle Trip is assisted by forcing the butt into your opponent's stomach. The bringing of the knee into an opponent's fork "with as hearty a jab as you can" is also recommended.

In the section entitled "The Kill," Squadron Leader Lidstone refers to the opponent who has been tripped or who has fallen. He says "you must thrust before he has time to recover himself. You must kill, and kill quickly." He then explains the withdrawal of the bayonet after the kill. "To withdraw, place your left foot on the body, slipping your left hand along the barrel towards the hilt of the bayonet. Then withdraw by pulling with both hands in the direction of the butt and pushing with the left foot."

In a struggle for a rifle, if the opponent refuses to let go "you must resort to kicking, jabbing with your knee or heel, punching, etc." Having disarmed your opponent, "without pausing, deliver the death stroke."

A high degree of realism is given to the book by the sketches of L/Cpl. Clifford. In keeping with the title, he does not spare his readers blood. Figure 12 shows a bayonet being thrust into the bare throat of the opponent, and rather more than a mere trickle of blood is in evidence. Figure 24, entitled "Kill (following ankle trip)," pictures the enemy on the ground, one hand held up, apparently as a plea for mercy, whilst his opponent is standing over him, his bayonet ready for delivering the "death stroke."

Any doubt as to whether mercy was shown is dispelled by Figure 25, entitled "Withdraw (following ankle trip)," which concludes the episode and shows the enemy on the ground with half the bayonet driven into his stomach from which blood is gushing. His opponent, with bestial ferocity, has placed his foot on the dying man's stomach and is freeing his weapon by violent tugging and pushing.

Reference should, perhaps, also be made to Figure 30, entitled "Kill (following disarm)." This illustration shows the disarmed man lying on the ground; one hand is raised in agony and the other grasps the blade of a bayonet which is being driven in an upward direction into the pit of his stomach.

The book may have been published with a desire to make us into a nation of bayonet fighters. It is frank and lacks hypocrisy. Whether it will enjoy a wide popularity now that the inculcation of blood-lust has been officially suspended, remains to be seen.

Some readers may think that even if "Bloody Bayonets" does not directly encourage the sadism latent in individuals, it does encourage conditions in which that latent sadism will manifest itself. Be that as it may, it would be a good thing if the book were placed in the hands of our religious leaders and army chaplains—they might find it somewhat difficult to reconcile the "veritable bayonet spirit" with the spirit of God within each one of us.

THE WORLD OF WAR AND RUMOUR

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

As the plight of Stalingrad grows daily more desperate, it is well to consider what the position will be if the city should at length fall.

The daily newspapers are the Government-censored channels of war propaganda, so presumably a person may quote their opinions without being charged with having an undue desire to spread despondency and alarm. Some well-known organs of the daily Press have, in the past, stated quite plainly that if Stalingrad should be captured and if the Axis should gain control of the Caucasus, the military strength of Russia will, at the very least, be crippled and the chance of a decisive victory for the Allies will disappear. In the past, too, the opinion was expressed that if we lost Singapore, we might never again be able to recapture that stronghold from the Japanese or the remainder of our possessions in the Far East.

Now although the time is probably at hand when the expression of such opinions will no longer be a feature of the newspapers as it will not harmonise with whatever fresh "victory" carrot it is considered expedient to dangle before the British donkey's nose; seeing that no new factor has appeared in the war situation to deprive these opinions of validity, it will be wise to remind ourselves of their most undoubted reasonableness.

If the Soviet Government, in addition to losing so much land valuable for food production and so many towns important for the manufacture of armaments, should also have its communications with the main source of its oil supply cut both by water and by rail, it certainly does look as though its war effort would be crippled. Indeed if, as recent news indicates, the Soviet is going to be partly dependent for its food supplies on wheat sent from Canada by sea, sooner or later the Russian Government might be compelled to surrender completely.

If Britain has failed to achieve a decisive victory when a Continental ally with immense resources in men and materials was still at the height of her military strength, it seems hardly likely, to say the least of it, that she will be able to do so when, for that ally, another is substituted who is already in serious difficulties through shortage of certain essential war materials; who has, with inadequate shipping, to transport both men and equipment by long and dangerous sea routes, to fight an enemy with an excellent rail and transport system at his rear; and whose armament firms and politicians have, even in the opinion of the newspapers of their own country, not a very savoury reputation either for honesty or for efficiency.

With regard to the Far East, the Japanese appear, for physical reasons alone, to be superior to European soldiers in warfare under the peculiar and exacting conditions of the tropics, and, supplied as she now is, with oil, rubber and essential minerals, it is difficult to see what reasonable chance exists of turning Japan out of the innumerable positions in which she is now strongly entrenched.

It is also an unfortunate, if humiliating, fact that in almost every major engagement of this war Germans and Japanese have proved their superiority over the Forces of the Allies. There sems no obvious reason why in the future the Axis Forces should cease to continue to prove themselves better led and better equipped and, in modern mechanised warfare, inferiority of equipment, alone, makes the sending into battle of troops or airmen a useless and unjustifiable sacrifice of life.

On September the 16th the "Daily Mail" concluded its leading article with these words "Only when the United States gets fully into its stride will the balance turn against the Axis." That time has not yet come. President Roosevelt tells us that America has reached little more than half her possible war production. . . . The battle of production is by no means won. We shall hold our own through the coming winter only if we work to the limit of our power and to the peak of our efficiency." Nothing very cheerful here, especially in view of America's difficulties with a shortage of rubber, steel and other raw materials! No mention of "victory" at all and even "holding our own" is conditional!

Incidentally, Mr. Donald Nelson, the head of American war production, is reported to have said recently that the U.S.A. is nearing the peak of production. If this be the case the peak of American war production would appear to be about half of President Roosevelt's theoretical estimate.

According to a report, also in the "Daily Mail," Mr. E. Brown, the Minister of Education, in a recent spech addressed to a gathering of Liberals, if slightly more optimistic, was certainly anything but convincing. Mr. Brown is said to have declared that "everything" pointed to a coming change and to the assumption of the offensive by the Allies "until, at an appalling cost in blood, tears, toil and sweat" (but not the blood, etc., of Mr. Brown and his Cabinet colleagues it would seem), "victory is achieved." What the "everything" pointing to the assumption of the offensive by the Allies may be, is not very clear. Possibly Mr. Brown was referring to the disasters at Dieppe and Tobruk, but, while further offensives of this kind certainly seem to promise an appalling sacrifice in blood, toil, tears and sweat, the ensuing victory is not obvious! The plain fact is that we have had more than enough blah of this description and that is the long and short of it.

There is a persistent rumour at the present time that if Hitler should succeed in crippling Russian resistance, he will make another peace offer. I am not myself entirely confident that this will happen, as Hitler some time ago declared that he had made his last peace offer and, during the past few months, we have heard rumours of peace offers all of which have failed to materialise.

Assuming, however, that another offer of a negotiated peace is going to be made by Germany it is of the utmost importance that we should consider in advance the opportunity that such an important event would provide.

In the past more than one peace offer has been made, officially or unofficially, and haughtily rejected by our politicians who have shown themselves more concerned with saving their faces and keeping their jobs than with the true welfare of the country. In every case subsequent events have proved the rejection of the peace offer to have been a tragic blunder. The military position of Britain and her Allies has become worse—sometimes much worse—; for which reason the sacrifice of the lives both of Servicemen and civilians which has occurred after the rejection of the peace proposal has been a useless and unavailing sacrifice.

If another offer of a negotiated peace should be rejected by our Government, the latter will prove themselves worse enemies of Britain than Hitler himself. This is not an exaggerated opinion of an extreme pacifist or defeatest. It is a perfectly obvious fact.

If the opinions quoted earlier in this article from the Government's Press propaganda agents relative to the Allies' position in the event of a collapse of Russian resistance, are correct, then, if Stalingrad falls, the only alternatives that would remain for us would be a negotiated peace or the worst of all evils —defeat.

Hitler, by offering us a chance for a negotiated peace, would be offering us certain escape from the risk of defeat, whether his word can be trusted or not; for a negotiated peace of course assumes that we are left in full possession of our defence Forces until such time as we may see fit to reduce them as part of a general plan for world disarmament. The Government, on the other hand, if it rejected the offer of a negotiated peace, would be exposing the country to further, and perhaps greater, risk of defeat.

Hitler again, by suggesting a negotiated peace, would be giving us the chance of immediate deliverance from further war casualties. The Government, on the other hand, if it refused to negotiate, would be condemning us to suffer still further casualties. These, moreover, would be useless casualties for, if victory were no longer within reach, the best that could be hoped for would be a negotiated peace, i.e., the very thing that Hitler was offering us before the casualties had been sustained.

Lastly, even from the most pessimistic and militarist standpoint which assumes the likelihood of another war, it should now be obvious to anyone outside a lunatic asylum that the Allies have far more to gain than the Axis from a period of respite. Hitler would be offering us such an advantage. The Government, on the other hand, if they again refused to negotiate, would be denying us a badly-needed opportunity for recovery and for profiting from past mistakes.

Recently I had the opportunity, rare in these days, of getting some firsthand information about the position on the Continent from an Englishman who has been living in France and, for a short time, in a neutral country, ever since the beginning of the war.

My informant is an intelligent man whose sympathies are more with the Left than with the Right, but who is very impartial in his general outlook. He has no very strong prejudices or feelings in regard either to Continental or Home politics. He has, I believe, given minor officials of our own Government much the same information as he gave me, desiring if possible to be helpful, while regretting the ignorance and lack of imagination common in official circles.

He told me that, apart from a few fire-eating officers of the old school, there is practically no hatred for the Germans, either among Frenchmen living in France, or among those engaged in work in Germany. There is, indeed, some inclination to co-operate and there is also evidence that when the two races have social contacts each influences the other. This is interesting and important, as it suggests that even if peace were concluded without a German defeat, the bad features in the Nazi system would tend gradually to disappear as the result of the influence exercised upon Germans by people not of German nationality. There are more ways of killing a cat than choking it with cream and an iceberg which resists the demolition efforts of a company of men armed with axes may dissolve slowly but surely under the permeating rays of the sun.

I was not very surprised to learn that Britain is by no means popular in the occupied countries, "perfidious Albion" being the prevailing sentiment. In France there is not the slightest inclination to regard Britain as a potential deliverer and the people have a profound aversion to taking further part in war for any reason or in defence of any cause. Communism is strong among the working-class who look forward to the day when they will will be able to turn out political opponents of their own race, rather than to the day when they will be rid of the Germans.

Although he naturally and rightly called the practice "brutal," my informant said that the killing of hostages by order of German officers was not the indiscriminate and wholesale practice that our propaganda has led us to believe. Probably only a few persons were actually put to death and these, he learned from a French source, were carefully selected from among those who the Germans felt confident had been concerned in acts of violence against soldiers or officials, or were engaged in planning such acts of violence.

The food situation is fair in Occupied France, very bad in the unoccupied part of the country; although the shortage does not amount to actual starvation.

My informant learned from various sources (including a person who had been interned in Germany) that the German people have a great and freely-expressed longing for the end of the war, though this longing is not usually accompanied by opposition to Hitler. They are distressed by the casualties suffered in the Russian campaign. Hatred for the British people is markedly absent among them, the ugly sentiment of hatred for the people of the other side being, unfortunately, more common over here. Differences in propaganda may be responsible, for German propaganda seems to concentrate its attack on British politicians, financiers and Jews; while over here the people are subjected to a good deal of the indiscriminating poison of Vansittartism.

I learned that it is unlikely that the German Government would offer any objection if, in order to ascertain whether the peoples of the occupied countries would prefer a negotiated peace now, or a continuation of the war in the hope that the Allies might drive out the German invaders, some responsible neutral statesman, such as Dr. Salazar of Portugal, were invited to conduct an impartial and unhampered enquiry—a course of action which surely has much to recommend it.

Since writing the above I have had the accuracy of much of my informant's description of the general feeling in Europe confirmed from an independent source to which even the most orthodox supporters of the war might be expected to pay attention.

POLLITT IS PRO-FASCIST!

C.P. Speaker's View.

The September issue of "The Word" was published on Thursday, August 27. Its effect was felt almost immediately.

On Sunday, August 30, the local branch of the C.P. at Kingston held a public meeting in the Market Square to call for "National Unity." The speaker stressed the need for complete unity of the people with their Government, and warned his audience against the disruptive elements who attempted to sabotage such unity. He described these elements variously as "Fifth Column," "Trotskyite," "Pro-Nazi," "Pro-Fascist," etc.

When question time came a questioner explained how he had read the C.P. pamphlet on "Hitler's Agents in Britain," and then proceeded to quote the following extracts from "The Word":—

"It is not too late. Take up the struggle now. Repudiate the surrender to Churchill Government of every victory won by the Labour movement in the course of its long and glorious history.

"End the coalition of Labour with those who have brought the people of Britain to the verge of disaster.

"The workers of Britain cannot afford to trust their destinies to such leaders in peace or war."

Did the speaker think that these statements were written by a pro-fascist agent of Hitler in Britain? asked the questioner.

The C.P. speaker, with a light in his eyes, and an enthusiasm that was remarkable, expounded for five minutes on the subject; he definitely agreed that the writer of such statements must be a pro-fascist, and he showed what an excellent example it was of what a pro-nazi agent could say. When he had finished, the questioner pointed out that the extract he had read out came from Harry Pollitt's pamphlet "The War and the Labour Movement" published in June, 1940!!!

At that, the speaker nearly had a fit!!! Even the peculiar brand of Marxist dialectics used by the Comical Party were of no avail to extricate him from his dilemma. Out of his own mouth, this C.P.er had condemned his own Gauleiter as a "pro-fascist," and the crowd were quick to see the point.

ROBERT TAYLOR

"The Literary Guide," London, for July, published the following notice of our "life" of Robert Taylor, under the heading "Items of Interest":—

Readers of this journal who are interested in the history of the Freethought Movement, when the struggle for freedom of thought and freedom of speech was more perilous than it is to-day, will glean useful information from a pamphlet just published entitled "The Devil's Chaplain," being the story of the Rev. Robert Taylor, who fought very gallantly against ecclesiastical persecution. It is sympathetically compiled by Mr. Guy A. Aldred, and a copy may be procured from the Strickland Press, 101 George Street, Glasgow. The price, including postage, is fivepence.

Robert Taylor continued his Rotunda addresses until heart trouble compelled him to retire from the platform. He married a wealthy woman, and spent the last ten years of his life travelling with her through Europe and America, finally settling at Jersey. He is said to have repudiated his Deism, and to have returned to the Established Church after his marriage. The conversion stories are answered generally in our biography. No details are given. We have traced the following four references to this alleged conversion:—

"Annual Register," September 1844, p. 273.—"Ultimately he renounced his errors and returned to the doctrines of the Established Church."

"John Bull," Saturday, October 12th, 1884.—"He renounced or professed to renounce his deistical principles.—D. White." (Quoted by "Notes and Queries").

"Gentleman's Magazine," Vol. XXII., Second Series, p. 550, November, 1844.—"Though some disparity of years existed between Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, they lived happily. He renounced his errors and returned to the doctrines of the Established Church, and latterly practised as surgeon at Tours."

"Notes and Queries," Vol. XXII, June 1877, p. 497.—"Taylor seems to have been insane as to religion, but to have died as a convert to the Christian religion.—Charles Cooks."

More light on these statements will be welcomed. Concerning the second-mentioned of these journals, it is interesting to note the appended reference penned by Carlile in "The Lion" for February 1, 1828:—

"The "John Bull" is no more an indication of the political principles of its proprietary, than it would be, if, with the same principles, it were avowedly in the hands of the proprietor of this journal. It was a successful hit at the bigotry and prejudices of the worst part of the community, at a peculiar moment, on the return and trial of the late queen; and, onward, this misnomer, has trod its dirty path. That it has struck successfully at some parts of the cantings of the day, we grant; but only at such parts as were opposed to the interests of the long-established cantings, from which it draws its foul support."

The character of this "John Bull" seems to have anticipated that of the "John Bull" edited and established during the first world war by the late Horatio Bottomley.

Pacifism Criticised

Dear Comrade,—Although I have a big sympathy with pacifists — more so the Political brand — I am afraid few are living up to facts and appear to miss the real point.

Had the war been purely an Imperialist one, then I would agree that it matters not who became our "boss"—Churchill, Hitler or Roosevelt, BUT surely it is clear that with the introduction of Nazism and Fascism, the whole position IS changed. To me I do not blame Germany more than Italy—both are a curse to the future of the world's masses—both are out to keep the Workers down. The chances of ever gaining our hopes of Socialism, should the Fascists win are gone for hundreds of years, but even though our system or our Government are not what WE want, still, if we win we can still HOPE to carry on the struggle and I think that is worth while.

It should NEVER be forgotten that Fascism started in ITALY and was cop'ed by Hitler. Its very teaching is ROMAN CATHOLIC which is totalitarian in itself and the greatest curse the WORLD has ever had to face, and if Pacifists are prepared to humble themselves to the Church, the Catholics may, if successful allow them to carry on as serfs to the Church, but it is time you used your efforts, in my opinion to enlighten the small minority of pacifists to the FACTS. Poor Spain is a good example—I shall NEVER forgive this Country for the farce of Non-Intervention—a sort of Pacifism. Now they are not only under the heel of the gangsters, like Franco and Mussolini, but worse still under the curse of the Catholic Church, a position that could very easily come to us. It looks very strange to me that we never hear of any Atrocities commited by Italians. I wonder why?

It is all very well people like Bedford and Middleton Murry suggesting that there is no difference between the system of Italy, Germany and Russia. The answer is, IF there is no difference WHY has the Capitalist World been so hostile to Russia all these years? Why have they helped Germany to be in a position to attack Russia and IF the system is not all that we desire, I will not pick her to pieces in the middle of a terrible war, but will help her all I can, remembering that the young people of Russia are a new generation and do not deserve the crime forced on them. We can then try to improve on the system that at least stopped man exploiting man and which put "the cat amongst the capitalist pigeons." I am alive to the need of fighting Fascism here at home too, but we dare not let the cruel swines in, a Country that can profess friendship one week and attack the same friends the next for no reason but greed, or a country that can take out hundreds of innocent people and shoot them for nothing at all, need wiping out. I wonder if BEDFORD would be so sympathetic to Germany if some of the shot ones in France and many other Countries, the old Poland, Portugal, etc., had been "some of my friends and other perfectly innocent and patriotic people." They were patriotic.

I have no time for British Imperialism, but it is no use just changing from British Imperialism to German or Japanese Imperialism. Christian Pacifism is a myth to me. What is the difference to Christian Pacifism and ordinary Pacifism—why the Christian? It's time the people refused to be led by well-paid Parsons and Priests, but started to think for themselves.

I recommend ALL to read "The Pope and the Italian Jackal" by Jos. McCabe. 6d., The Thinkers Forum.

Sincerely and fraternally

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Guy,—"The Word," September number, cheers one up.

It is good to know that Unitarians are not all repeating the parrot phrases of the war-mongers. Bottomley, Cole, Micklewright, Sidney Spencer speak for a goodly number of Unitarians who do not bow down to the Churchill idol. F. W. Jowett, who worked in a warehouse with my uncle over sixty years ago, is as vigorous and unanswerable as ever.

If we had the machinery of propaganda of this self-elected Government we should sweep the whole lot out of power and mischief.—Fraternally yours,

RICHARD LEE.

Coventry, 2/9/42.

[Comrade Richard Lee's essays will be resumed next month.—Ed.]

Dear Friends,—I have recently read Part I of "Socialism and Parliament" which you kindly sent to me some time ago, and have now started on Part II which you supplied to my order recently. I must express my admiration for the way in which Guy Aldred has presented the wealth of material in the books, which certainly provide plenty of food for thought. I am reminded of remarks I have heard from Tory and Capitalist acquaintances to the effect that it would be a good thing if "Socialist" M.P.'s had to take charge of the government, as they would then have responsibility on their shoulders with a consequent cooling down of their wild ideas. Too true, alas, as "Socialism and Parliament" shows.—Yours sincerely,

STANLEY H. ELLISDON.

Ilford, 6/8/42.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I was in Glasgow on Sunday last. I really went to attend an Anarchist meeting; I only know a very little about politics, but I have no faith in the round table. A friend took me to your rooms to hear you. I am not sorry he did. I thought you were very good, and enjoyed every minute of your address.

You gave me the impression of having a razor-like mind, and I am surprised that your reward has been much less worthy of your labour than it ought to be.

I understand that when the war is over you will continue to preach non-violence and to advocate the round table for the solution of the workers' problems and their struggle for a square deal. Don't you think a little more extreme measure would help them?

We all know the forces that are against us, and in my opinion, negotiations in the class struggle will serve no purpose, and give us no results. It is impossible to beat human nature, when a man (of working class origin) reaches the top of the political tree, and begins to live on the best of the land (as I believe is every man's birth-right) then the trouble begins. The old school tie gets him in a corner and quietly says to him, "Play ball, or else." He naturally does not wish to come back among the small fry, and so the small fry tumble back to where they belong, and get nowhere. So human nature being what it is, don't you think a little elimination of the temptation, and then the round table, would take us to our goal much quicker.

The best of luck, Mr. Aldred.—Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM HALL.

Hamilton, 14/6/42.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have been amazed at your record of service to Truth. Even though I have struggled through years of reading and mind searching to the stage when I can understand and accept your present belief, it is refreshing to learn that there is a person who has analysed so completely the various "Dogmas" held out to us to accept. I was filled with a certain amount of satisfaction that you with your wonderful record and years of persecution should express so clearly what I had more vaguely believed.

For years now I have "endorsed" the views of Douglas, on the economic side, and Orage and others too have helped me to a clearer picture of what SHOULD be and as to the HOW to achieve it. I now see that it does need a REVOLUTION of thought to end the Power and Domination of the Church over the freedom of the individual through the Marriage ceremony, the subjection of woman to man because of this. When I see more clearly how STALINISM has destroyed to date any real progress, I then accept your analysis.

I am afraid that I find much discouragement and ridicule from those around me, but that is no surprise to you.—Yours sincerely,

A. E. GARRISON.

Rotherham.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thank you very, very much for all the splendid literature in "The Word." As we go from tragedy to tragedy in this most foul and outrageous of all wars, it is a comfort to read of the noble ideals of some of our fellow-men. How exquisitely sweet and tender are the thoughts of Lady Dunn!

I was looking through Charles Dickens' "A Child's History of England" and came across the following extract in Chap. 21, "England under Henry the Fifth":—

"War is a dreadful thing; and it is appalling to know how the English were obliged next morning to kill those prisoners mortally wounded, who yet writhed in agony upon the ground, how the dead upon the French side were stripped by their own countrymen and countrywomen, and afterwards buried in great pits, how the dead upon the English side were piled up in a great barn, and how their bodies and the barn were all burned together. It is in such things, and in many more, much too horrible to relate, that the real desolation and wickedness of war consist. Nothing can make war otherwise than horrible."

Then follows:—

"But the dark side of it was little thought of and soon forgotten; and it cast no shade of trouble on the English people, except on those who had lost friends or relations in the fight. They welcomed their King home with shouts of rejoicing and plunged into the water to bear him ashore on their shoulders, and flocked out in crowds to welcome him in every town through which he passed, and hung rich carpets and tapestries out of the windows, and strewed the streets with flowers, and made the fountains run with wine, as the great field of Agincourt had run with blood."

After over 500 years have passed, with all the increase of knowledge, war is still being waged more cruelly than ever, with the support of the Christian churches, and sad to say, most of the people seem just as stupid and thoughtless. When will they realise that true Peace can only come from the heart and mind of each one of us.

With all good wishes.—Yours sincerely,

(Mrs.) ALICE GOODRICK.

Clifton, 11/8/42.

Dear Comrade,—Your paper is like a breath of fresh air, after reading the utter tripe that is presented to us daily disguised as news. I cannot make up my mind whether the people who call themselves journalists are fools or knaves. When one sees such statements as "Congress must remove the pistol from the Government's head before negotiations can start", knowing that Gandhi's struggle will be non-violent, and also realising the Government has behind it all the armed might of the army, navy and air force, one is inclined to believe that the newspaper men must be knaves.

Our political leaders seem to be trying the same game in India as they played with the prime minister of Burma. They did succeed in putting him away, but they still lost Burma. History—!

Yours in unity,

GORDON BAXTER.

Wragby, 8/8/42.

Dear Comrade,—Since reading "The Word" and your published works I have come to look upon you as the most fearless and honourable fighter in the annals of the British working class movement. May you have the health and strength to continue your noble work.

Yours fraternally,

J. H. CHARLES.

Stoke-on-Trent, August 3.

Dear Sir,—I wish to thank you for sending me your excellent paper, which I enjoy very much. I think you are making a fine stand for sanity.

I am a Rationalist and object to all this madness on Rationalist grounds but I respect all people who are prepared to do and to suffer for their opinions.

I take off my hat to the "Heretics" and "cranks" and most of all to the absolutists.

You have my best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

O. E. FOX.

Rock Ferry, August 16.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have now been taking "The Word" since last September, and have enjoyed your forthright and unequivocal articles immensely. "The Word" is to be congratulated on the fine manner in which it is linking up the different approaches to anti-militarism and socialism. The Duke of Bedford's speech in the House of Lords was a magnificent blow for the pacifist cause. A friend once said to me that a man's Christian conviction is to be tested by what he is ready to give up for it. The Duke has shown himself willing to give up one great prize for which most men crave—popularity. His ideas on finance I find most lucid, but I should like to learn a great deal more about the Social Credit system before I feel competent to criticise him.

To be perfectly frank, your own articles, excellent as they are, are to me marred by an over-dogmatic attitude. You write sometimes as if there could be no possible doubt of the correctness of your statements. For example, you say " . . . for the simple reason, that no disciple of Jesus is entitled to employ the sword." For my part I heartily agree with you, but certainly the Archbishop of Canterbury and Reinbold Niebuhr would dissent emphatically with your judgment. Still, Mr. Aldred, one can overlook one fly in the ointment if the rest is as pure as the contents of "The Word."

With best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

A. ALMOND.

Leyburn, June 15.

Dear Guy Aldred,—After blindly supporting this war for democracy, I have come to the conclusion that it is, in fact, a lot of bloody nonsense. Murder and destruction to no purpose, and every day, an increasing toll of misery and suffering. An Anarchist, whom at first I thought utterly mad, has convinced me finally that Anarchism is the only solution. I would be glad, therefore, if you could let me know of any Anarchists round about Manchester.

Yours sincerely,

(Miss) SYLVIA GREEN.

Prestbury, June 15.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I have been a subscriber of "The Word" since the beginning of the year and have been most heartened and helped by the various outspoken articles and the general high tone of your paper.

My very best wishes for the continuation of the good work you are doing for the Cause and Faith called Pacifism.

Yours fraternally,

WILL BARNES.

Winscombe, June 14.

Dear Friend,—I have just finished reading your booklet this morning "Why Jesus Wept" and find in it many things with which I am in perfect agreement only I do not call myself an Atheist.

I believe there is no such thing as Christianity apart from the practical application of the ethics of Jesus and that Creed and Dogma which is the stock-in-trade of the orthodox so-called Christian Church has neither part nor lot in that application.

Priestcraft has always in every Faith interpreted "religion" in terms of formality and ritual. Jesus interpreted religion in the love and service of That which he called Father (and taught men to do the same) and our neighbours as ourselves. In this way he "fulfilled the law." As Paul explains, Love worketh no ill to his neighbour therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.

Others may call me an Atheist. I don't know, it depends very much on their interpretation of the term. The orthodox Church could truthfully call me a heretic as they called Jesus but Jesus was no Atheist in my interpretation of the word as he always recognised and depended upon "Something" that he recognised as the source of his being, and he found that "Something" within himself.

"Of myself I can do nothing."

"It is the Father in me that doeth the works."

Leo Tolstoy accepted the same view. I have read practically all of Leo Tolstoy's religious works and I value them very much indeed.

I left the orthodox Church more than 30 years ago, not because I had discarded religion but I found that the teaching of Jesus did not harmonise with the preachers of orthodoxy.

I am attached to no organisation whatsoever, but use my pen where I get the opportunity of doing so, in the interest of Peace and Goodwill to men.

I was a C.O. in the last war and my son is so in this one but is serving in the R.A.M.C. on the decision of the Tribunal.

I marvel at the Duke of Bedford's maiden speech in the House of Lords and I heartily agree with every word of it.

I shall close now with kindest regards.

Yours faithfully,

FRANCIS BELL.

PEACE AIMS GROUP

HOW R. J. DAVIES, M.P., SEES THINGS

During the parliamentary recess, our comrade, Rhys J. Davies, M.P., Chairman of the Labour Party Peace Aims Group, was active in various parts of the country. On Saturday, August 15, he addressed a conference of Labour delegates covering the whole of the Westhaughton Parliamentary Division, at the Labour Institute, Westhoughton, on Saturday. Mrs. Rhys Davies, Mr. F. J. Kettle (agent) and several County and District Councillors were present. Mr. R. Robinson, of Hindley, presided.

The meeting was reported well in the "Bolton Journal" for Saturday, August 22; and also in the "Wigan Observer," for the same date.

In reviewing the present situation, Mr. Davies said that a Coalition Government never rested easily on the shoulders of Labour, especially when Labour was in the minority. It was almost imperative in that case that Labour became subservient to Tory policy, and that was the root of the present political difficulties in home affairs. Labour had always been an agitative and propaganda body because it was a minority aspiring to become the Government with an absolute majority; the Conservatives on the other hand stood in the main for the old order of society, and it could be conjectured therefore, as a consequence, that the role of Parliament itself was difficult though we were at war. The Conservatives promised the country a good time when peace returned; Labour wanted an earnest of the New Jerusalem here and now, and the conflict between those two policies was becoming acute.

The war had thrown up many new problems, such as the tragedy of missing soldiers, about whom the relatives were naturally very anxious; workmen's compensation cases in Government factories; imprisonment and fines for absenteeism; pay and allowances for men in the Forces; old age and widows' pensions, women directed to work away from home; and the removal of railings.

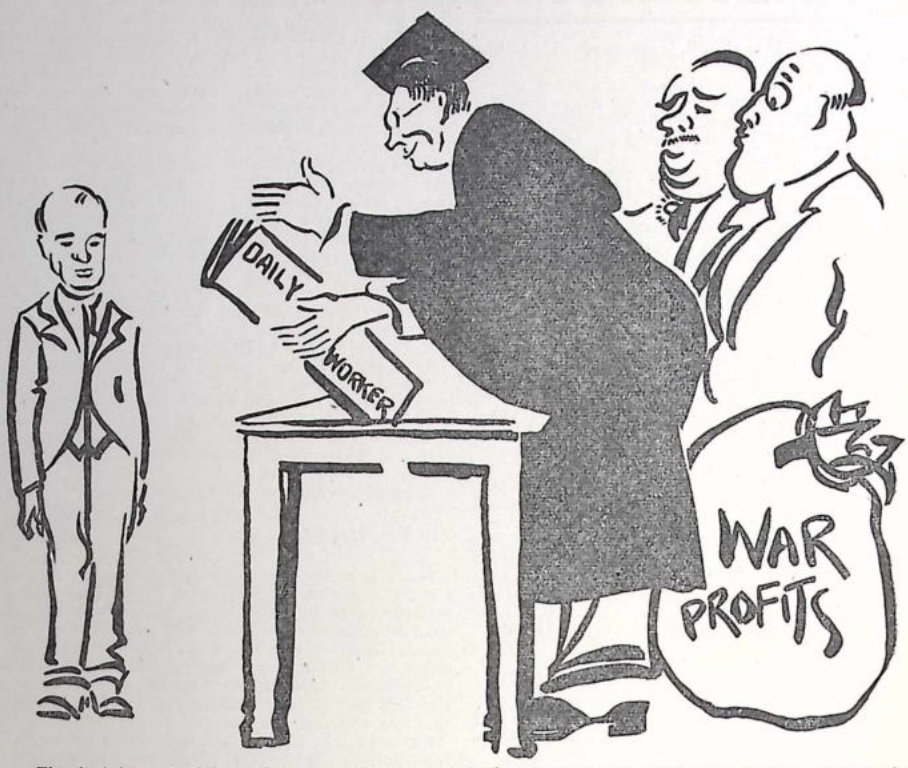
No Racial Hatred.

He had conducted a very successful campaign throughout the constituency recently, and was very pleased with the reception he got. Indeed, he was informed that some of those who had come to curse remained to bless. In short, he challenged anybody to prove that he stood for peace at any price; he was rather opposed to war at any cost. In any case he was not going to be a silent witness to the destruction of the best in the civilisation of our own country and Europe, and he declined to join in the spirit of revenge, racial hatred and the lust for human blood which had developed in the present conflict. He rested on the policy of the famous statesman Burke, who told his Bristol constituents about a century ago that he preferred to be a pillar rather than a weathercock in politics. The statesmen, in spite of their loud protestations about "evil men," would meet round the table some day. The issues coming before the Peace Conference would be those that gave rise to Hitlerism and the conflict itself, which were economic, financial and territorial.

Mr. Davies felt certain that the imprisonment of the Indian leaders was a mistake. Hitler and Mussolini and Stalin, too, were imprisoned by the democracies; that was why they became martyrs in the first instance and then the heroes of their peoples. The same would apply to Gandhi and his followers in due course.

In conclusion, Mr. Davies said that he and a few of his Labour colleagues in Parliament were doing their best to prove that war as a means of settling international disputes was futile. In any case, what they were doing was following Labour's traditional role in international affairs.

A PRIZE FOR A GOOD BOY



The bad boy, Pollitt, having duly repented of playing truant with Peace Conventions, and having promised to be a good boy and not to worry the nice kind capitalists any more for the duration and after, receives a prize from Mr. Schoolmaster Morrison.

AGE OF LIES.

R. J. Davies Exposes War Propaganda.

R. J. Davies addressed a meeting of the Horwich Brotherhood, on Sunday, September 5th. He spoke on the text, "And this is the condemnation, that Light is come into the world, and men love the darkness rather than Light."

The meeting was reported in the "Bolton Journal," for September 12.

This age, he said, would be known in history as the age of the black-out, both mentally and physically. As in the case of individuals, so it was with nations on occasions; they preferred false-hood to truth; it was much more palatable. The science of propaganda through the Press and the radio, and the assumption of government power over it all, had made that much more possible than in olden days. The struggle of the truth to live was always heavy in peace time, but when war raged the difficulties were multiplied a thousand fold.

Telling falsehoods in war-time had developed into a fine art, and what was worse than a direct lie was deliberately hiding the truth.

If they scrutinized closely the recent propaganda of Germany and our own country, they would become real cynics and decline to believe anything. For instance our airmen hit every target when they bombed Germany, but the Germans always struck our hospitals, churches, schools and ordinary buildings.

When the Germans issued their propaganda one would almost conclude there was hardly a factory or gasometer standing in our country; the Luftwaffe had devastated the lot.

A Difference in Terms.

Another instance of how the truth was twisted was in the use of words to describe events. When the Germans conquered Poland and Czechoslovakia that was "aggression", when the Russians entered Latvia, Esthonia, Lithuania, Bessarabia, and the Polish Ukraine, we called that "annexation", but when we entered Egypt, Iran and Iraq, that was "campaigning."

In Germany, as in every other belligerent country, they would almost certainly find the very same words being used the other way round. "Light" was truth, and the contest between light and darkness was the same throughout the ages; there was nothing new under he sun in that connection.

Hitler and his associates would have it that every Jew was a traitor whilst in time of war, there were many Britons on the other hand who would have it that every German was a devil. They knew in their own hearts, of course, that all that was wrong, but they liked superficially to believe those things. The simple fact was, of course, that no race or nation was composed exclusively of demons; the good and the bad, light and darkness, were struggling for supremacy in all people alike. Indeed, the same struggle proceeded in every individual, too.

Fighting for Freedom.

Every nation going into battle was "fighting for freedom and religion", and those who said those things knew full well that when the statesmen reached the conference table at the end of the conflict, not a single reference would then be made to those great ideals. Statesmen told them that the world after the war would be such a pleasant place to live in, when they must know that the contrary would be the case. They must know, too, that they might not be in power to affect the situation one way or the other. History told them that it was seldom a nation to war, was left in power to make the peace. They, themselves, had already had one change of Government since the war began. When that change took place, the Germans felt sure that our moral was cracking. On the other hand, when a German General was dismissed or a Minister of the Reich handed in his portfolio, then some of our propagandists were certain that the Nazi system was beginning to crumble! And so the falsehood proceeded.

Finally, the common folk everywhere must not allow themselves to be deceived by false propaganda; they must learn to distinguish between the truth and the lie; between light and darkness, and to that end they must be educated to think correctly. In any case, war and truth could never blend.

The Labour Pacifist Fellowship seeks to associate those members of the Labour Party and its affiliated organisations whose convictions preclude their endorsement of War and who endeavour in consistency with their Socialist Faith to encourage elements of social and international sanity essential to constructive Peace; to safeguard and improve the well-being of the working class; and to seek the achievement of a Socialist Commonwealth.

The Fellowship holds that modern war endangers those high principles for which this war is allegedly waged, involves incalculable destruction, waste and misery, perverts the capacity for creative effort and stimulates perilous, impulsive, cynical or reactionary tendencies.

The Fellowship desires to work with other Labour Party comrades in loyal service to common purposes that will secure peace, justice and dignity for mankind.

All individual and affiliated members of the Labour Party who are Pacifists are invited to join the above fellowship.

IN WAR TIME.

To-night I look upon the sky,
Pale blue, with white clouds sailing by,
The trees are green, the air is still,
The purple heather crowns the hill,
The waters run so quiet and clear,
And now and then my listening ear
Is charmed by one lone wild bird's song,
That sings so clear the woods among,
Oh, perfect world, and perfect night!
My heart is swollen with delight.

Then comes the whir of aeroplane,
To change my joy to grief and pain,
A world at war, hearts filled with hate,
Blood, sin and shame in every state,
Guns, bombs, and bayonets, fire and death,
A curse in every human breath,
Oh! World of beauty, World of love,
When will mankind deserving prove
Of all thy bounties, all thy joy,
And, thankful for thy mercies die?

CREECH JONES, M.P.

Member for the Colonies!

CHAMPION OF THE NATIVE WORKER

Readers of these columns are familiar with the courage and forthrightness with which our comrade, A. Creech Jones, M.P. for Shipley, has addressed himself to questions of conscience, civil liberty at home and in the colonies, and, above all, rights of the native worker. His speech on conscience describing his experiences as a war-resister during the Great War of 1914-1918, made in the House of Commons on May 18, 1939, and his defence before his first Court Martial, have been reproduced. Also his great speech on conditions in the Copper Belt, made in the House of Commons on April 10, 1941, and his concluding powerful cross-talk with the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. We have reprinted an essay written by Creech Jones on the subject of Civil Liberties in the Colonies some years ago, and also outlined his career since 1916. In our comrade, the cause of liberty has a fearless champion, and the native worker an able defender and advocate. We feel that his stand should receive the support of public understanding and appreciation. Parliamentarians do not seem too willing to assist in this matter. It becomes necessary, therefore, from time to time, to direct attention to questionings and speeches in our Anti-Parliamentarian columns. Creech Jones makes full use of the House of Commons as a sounding board. It is no part of our argument against parliamentarism and careerism to refuse to second his efforts. Hence the present incomplete and arbitrary survey.

On July 16, 1941, Creech Jones asked what was the composition and terms of reference of the Committee on Colonial post-war Reconstruction, set up in the Colonial Office under the chairmanship of Lord Hailey; what outside bodies it would consult, etc. The official reply was not very satisfactory, and described the Committee vaguely as a fact-giving body.

On the same day, Creech Jones asked for a statement on the work of the Cocoa Board, on the arrangements for the storage and processing of the cocoa crop in West Africa, and the price being paid to cocoa producers.

The reply was evasive and futuristic.

On August 5, 1941, Creech Jones reverted to the Hailey Committee question and asked for, and obtained, an assurance that the new committee or secretariat would not deal with constitutional problems.

On October 1, 1941, Creech Jones asked that a White Paper be published setting out the development programmes submitted by the respective governments under the Development and Welfare Act. He pressed that Parliament should be given the fullest information.

Six days later, he enquired on what grounds of public policy the Government of Nigeria has enacted legislation prohibiting strikes, and whether it is intended to extend such a prohibition through the Empire.

Mr. Hall, that sorry caricature of a man, a worker turned pseudo-statesman, replied that such legislation had been passed in N. Rhodesia, Hong Kong, Nigeria and the Gold Coast, and was to be passed in Palestine. Strikes and lock-outs were illegal unless the dispute was reported to the Governor. The object of the legislation was to ensure that the war effort was not prejudiced. Such legislation would be enacted wherever the Governor so advises.

What a study in a miner's leader elevated to the Under-Secretaryship of the Colonial Office! The proletarian turned pompous and impressive!

The following day, Creech Jones asked what schemes had been submitted to and recommended by the Comptroller of Development welfare in the West Indies. In reply a full description of the procedure whereby the Comptroller of Development works, was given. Sixty-one concrete schemes, dealing mainly with agriculture and public health had been submitted, of which 15 had been approved.

The next day (October 9), Creech Jones asked whether the Ministry of Food would furnish a statement of the profit and loss on Government sales of West African cocoa.

Major Lloyd George stated that for the year 1939-40 the West African trading account showed a loss of about £263,000. For the 1940-1 crop the Ministry of Food purchased its requirements from the Cocoa Control Board, and made a profit of £382,000 on these purchases and distribution. This profit resulted almost entirely from the policy introduced on 1 March, 1941, by which the Ministry charged an additional £10 per ton to the manufacturer.

On October 14, Creech Jones made a vigorous attack on the Jamaica Defence Regulations. He asked if searching investigation would be made into the administration of Defence Regulations in Jamaica since the war, and what steps were being taken to rectify the injustices committed.

Mr. Hall refused to accept his suggestion that injustices had been committed.

Creech Jones asked if the Jamaica regulations would be amended to the form adopted in Britain after Parliamentary discussion.

Mr. Hall stated that the Jamaican Defence Regulation corresponding to the U.K. regulation 18B had been amended to conform exactly with the U.K. regulation.

At this time, it should be added, the number of persons interned in Jamaica was returned, officially, as 1,055. Of these 1,036 were enemy nationals, 11 British subjects, and 8 Allied or other nationalities.

On November 26, Creech Jones asked what steps had been taken in Kenya to secure decent housing for the African people in Nairobi.

Mr. Hall announced in reply that approval had been given for expenditure of £20,000 from Kenya Government Funds on the construction of houses for African Government employees in Nairobi, and for a loan of £30,000 to the Nairobi Municipal Council for a housing scheme.

On December 9, Creech Jones asked that the conference being arranged by the S. Rhodesian Prime Minister with members of the Legislative Council of N. Rhodesia to discuss amalgamation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland be cancelled, seeing that this action was an interference with the prerogatives of the British Government and calculated to create disaffection in territories for which the House of Commons was responsible.

Behind this question, as all who have studied the matter know, was concern for the well-being of the native.

The Government emphasised its precious assurances.

The following day, Creech Jones pressed for a statement on the proposed conference at Salisbury.

Mr. Hall replied that the Governments of N. Rhodesia and Nyasaland would not be represented at the conference nor in any way committed to its conclusions.

On January 28, 1942, Creech Jones challenged, in the form of a question, the character and quality of the work discharged by the Colonial Services in Malaya during the previous year. Hall expressed complete satisfaction on behalf of the Colonial Office. Creech Jones attacked broadcasters and journalists and asked them to apply their criticisms to the whole problem of colonial policy.

A. CREECH JONES, M.P. TODAY

On February 3, Creech Jones asked to what extent schemes had been submitted under the Colonial Development and Welfare Act; whether they would be considered by the Dufferin Committee, and whether Lord Dufferin could give proper attention to this work, in view of his full-time appointment in the Ministry of Information.

Mr. Hall replied that the time required for this job was about one hour a week.

Creech Jones "Is not that hopelessly inadequate?"

On February 4, Creech Jones asked why recruitment for the African military labour, pioneer and transport corps in East Africa had been suspended.

The reply was that this was to avoid competition from the Forces for the African labour required for increased production for war purposes.

Actually, this question was directed to the matter of the exploitation of the native worker. It was not the mere military question it seemed.

On February 11, Creech Jones asked what progress had been made in implementing the recommendations of the Copperbelt Disturbance Inquiry.

The reply stated that the recommendations in respect of wages and conditions had been put into effect. Domestic science classes for the women had been started in some of the Compounds. The United Missions were sending out a third woman welfare officer. The mine managements were encouraging the making of flower gardens, but have not increased the size of plots. The "Elder" system had been accepted at all the mines. Legislation providing for improved rates of workmen's compensation had been enacted. Every encouragement was being given to workers to bring their wives with them to the mines. As for the extension of opportunities for Africans to take on skilled work this matter was receiving attention.

On March 4, Creech Jones asked for full details about the proposed conscription of African labour in Kenya, and what steps had been taken to secure the most economic use of the African labour available.

In a lengthy reply, it was stated that more labour was needed for Kenya's increased production campaign in the war effort, and that the present shortage was due to a large increase of Africans in employment, and the absorption of 47,000 Africans into the Army. A Committee set up to examine the situation had unanimously recommended compulsory labour for Africans. The proposals had been approved by the Secretary of State. There was an immediate shortage of 22,500 workers for agriculture.

By question, on June 10, Creech Jones secured the names of the members of the Colonial Research Advisary Committee: Lord Hailey (Chairman), Sir Edward Appleton, Professor A. V. Hill, Sir Edward Mellanby and Dr. W. W. C. Topley.

The Labour riots in the Bahamas were discussed on June 17. Sir Archibald Southby asked for information. The official reply was that peace was restored and that the whole question of wages under discussion. Creech Jones asked whether, in view of the continuous opposition of the Legislative Council to progressive labour legislation, consideration could be given to revision of the constitution.

The same day, Creech Jones asked why forced labour had been adopted in the private tin mines of Nigeria.

Mr. Macmillan replied that the regulations were enacted as a measure of great urgency to meet the loss of Far eastern tin supplies. The regulations gave power to regulate the conditions of employment and the provision of more specific safeguards was being taken up.

Creech Jones asked what was to be done in regard to the additional profits and royalties. After other supplementary questions, Creech Jones stated that, in view of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply, he would raise the matter on the adjournment. (June 17.)

On July 1, Creech Jones enquired about the financial assistance given by the Government to the Palestine Citrus Industry. A detailed reply was given concerning the season 1942-43.

On July 22, Creech Jones raised the questions of compulsory labour in Nigeria, and native-grown maize in Kenya.

On the first issue, he asked what Regulations to secure proper labour conditions had been made in Nigeria arising out of the scheme for industrial conscription and whether adequate arrangements for inspection and welfare had been made and labour inspectors appointed?

Mr. Macmillan replied that subsistence and free transport to and from the minefields had been provided; also a reception camp, where free meals were given. Prior medical examination would be carried out. Wages and conditions were the same as for voluntary labour on the mines. Free housing was provided and free medical facilities were available. Further welfare measures were being arranged. An administrative officer had been posted to supervise general welfare. Health conditions were inspected by the medical department.

On the Kenya maize matter, Creech Jones asked for details of the scheme in Kenya for extending control and guaranteed prices to African-grown maize; and how did it compare with guaranteed prices for non-native grown maize?

The reply showed that the price paid for native maize was less than half that paid for non-native maize.

In his questionings, Creech Jones has been backed ably by David Adams, E. Harvey, G. Mather, R. W. Sorensen, and D. L. Lipson, the Independent Conservative. He remains, however, the outstanding, well-informed, vigilant, untiring defender of the native worker in the House of Commons, and in the public life of Great Britain.

COMMUNISM AND INDIA

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Your scarifying strictures on the Communist Party in the—as usual—admirable current number of "The Word" are greatly to the point and richly deserved; and in no matter do these people show their typical party politicians' rascally and unscrupulous mendacity and shameless opportunism than in respect of India, to one of the communities whereof I have the honour to belong, and of whose "freedom" (Communist Party version, naturally, with, doubtless, Stalinist concentration-camps, Ogpu and liquidations all complete) they have the effrontery to pose as champions. In this connection vide Souvarine, Andre Gide, Eugene Lyons, A. N. Chamberlin and Max Eastman, who can by no stretch of imagination be called "hostile" critics, until they saw for themselves what the Proletarian Paradise was like.

A placard has recently appeared about London repeating in aggravated form the pestilent and mendacious twaddle of an earlier one with its "Enlist India's 400,000,000 for Freedom", this time adding that "in spite" ("in spite" if you please, when "out of spite" would better meet the case) of Mr. Gandhi, India's 400,000,000 can still be "won" as Allies in the cause of "freedom" and in the "fight against Fascism," etc., etc., ad lib et nauseam.

Now anyone not utterly ignorant of the evidence that exists or dishonest, or both, knows that such talk is pestilential malignant drivel. To begin with the sheer physical condition of the vast mass of India's population—with its average income of one-twenty-sixth or less of that of England—is such that it would require years of good nourishment plus good living conditions to bring them up to let us say even a C.3. standard. Again, if England with all her vast mass-production facilities has, after the best part of a decade (including the pre-war period of rearmament) not succeeded in yet adequately arming and equipping such armies as she has, how is India with not a minute fraction of those mass-production resources going to do so within any measurable period of time? Meanwhile, Japan, doubtless by private arrangement with the Bosses of the Communist Party will kindly hold her hand until Indians are first fed up to the minimum standard of military fitness, then trained, then equipped, all of which processes might occupy twenty-five years at a conservative estimate! . . . In reality the Communist Party and those who like them want to "enlist India" for this that or the other are India's worst enemies for they want our unhappy country dragged into a War for the furtherance of their own party purposes and ends, not for any problematical good they think or believe may accrue to her therefrom.

Gandiji's attitude is not only utterly right spiritually and morally, it is sheer realistic common-sense as well, for it is for India the only way possible in face of a possible Japanese attack, since she (India) has not and cannot have within any measurable period of time the means or ability suitable from the War-monger's point of view for resisting Japanese or any other aggression.

And why India should submit to be used as a catspaw to pick the Dictatorship of the Proletariat chestnut out of the fire for the Communist Party (and it is certainly not intended for anyone else!) and more than the Freedom and Democracy chestnut—and WHAT a chestnut!—for British Imperialistic and Bib Business Interests is in no manner of way clear to

Yours sincerely and well-wishingly,

KAIKHOSRU SHAPURJI SORABJI.

MESSAGES FROM INDIA.

The following are extracts from the Indian section of three Annual Reports of the Methodist Missionary Society (for the years 1940, 1941 and 1942):—

1940: "The European war has not yet affected our activities in North India, but it has affected OUR THINKING, and when one remembers the horrors which are being perpetrated between nation and nation in Europe one can hardly feel proud of coming from that area. . . . India is thinking; thinking hard. There can be no doubt that these great wars in Europe are an obstacle to the spread of Christianity among the more educated Indians. Yet there are not wanting signs that here and there thoughtful men still turn wistful eyes towards Jesus Christ."

1941: "The very fact of the war is an obstacle to Christian work, for it creates a spiritual problem. For twenty years the country has been nurtured on the doctrine of non-violence, as exemplified by the greatest of its exponents, the Mahatma Gandhi, and the people find it difficult to see the righteousness, or practical utility, of violence even in the most noble cause. That nominally Christian nations should be engaged in a war so bitter is a very serious hindrance to the acceptance of the Christian Message. To this difficulty must be added the increased political strife and bitterness. There can be no question that these powerful factors hinder the coming of the Kingdom of God."

1942: "In Mysore, our workers have been taunted by Hindus, both in public and private, with the accusation: 'It was your CHRISTIAN nations that began the war; why don't some of you people get together and stop it?'"

"SOCIALISM" IN NEW ZEALAND

EX-CONCHIE AS WAR TIME PREMIER

Our comrade, Charles H. Cole, Minister of the High Street Unitarian Church, Portsmouth, sends us an interesting letter that he received from New Zealand dated May 31 last. Here is an excerpt:—

"What amazes and confronts me is that in conservative England you are still allowed to circulate papers like "The Word" . . . in N.Z. under Labour Rule such literature would be regarded as subversive and immediately suppressed. The Social Credit people started a magazine here recently, but because they dared to criticise the Government regarding certain of their financial policies, the paper was suppressed after about three or four issues. . . . Our Labour Prime Minister has said he will shoot or have shot anyone who goes on strike in the future, and should there be any more industrial trouble he will not hesitate to call out the military to deal with it."

Prime Minister Peter Fraser was jailed during 1914-1918 as a conscientious objector, because of his opposition to war.

The Union Record, Auckland, New Zealand, for May 1, 1942, told the story of Fraser's threats to the workers in the following report:—

FRASER THREATENS

ARMY AND STRIKES

POLICE ALREADY USED

"The Government will not flinch in enforcing the law in cases like that at Westfield. Those who took that action were betraying their country and their fellow-workers. Someone here suggested a general strike. If anyone spoke that way in Russia he would be shot. IF CIRCUMSTANCES ARISE THEY WILL BE SHOT HERE TOO. Someone here spoke of the volunteer workers getting free petrol. If there are any repetitions of Westfield they will get more than petrol, THEY WILL GET THE SUPPORT OF THE WHOLE ARMED FORCES OF THE STATE."

Thus the Prime Minister to the Federation of Labour Conference in a vigorous condemnation of the Westfield workers, whose action he attributed to a few trouble-makers.

Both Mr. Fraser and Mr. Webb condemned the Westfield workers for acting precipitately and referred to the repercussions on the war effort. They appealed for co-operation. (Full report appears in "The Standard" on April 9).

Though this report mentions that a delegate asked the Prime Minister why there had been no prosecution of Hellabys, Mr. Fraser made no reference to this point.

There is substance in the Prime Minister's threat. A Wellington incident makes it clear that the forces of the State will be used against workers dissatisfied with the breaking down of their conditions.

A few days before Easter, police visited the Silverstream Convalescent Hospital job late in the afternoon and questioned a number of workers.

As a result, the following motion was passed by the building workers on the job.

"This mass meeting of Building Trade Workers on the Silverstream Convalescent Hospital Job desires to make a vigorous protest against the action of the Police in visiting the above job with a view to obtaining information as to the potential opposition by workers to working during the Easter period. This meeting considers the action to savour of Gestapo methods, and as such, must be condemned in the strongest terms."

INDICTMENT BY SUICIDE

A Review of The C.O. Tribunals

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

"An Oxford graduate, Charles W. Perring, of Kensington, was turned down at the tribunal and, after receiving several medical notices, was summoned to appear at Oxford Police Court on September 15. On the previous day, however, he told his sister that he did not intend to join up or go to prison and would find a way out. Later on the same day he threw himself from the roof of his parents' flat in Kensington and was killed. At the inquest on September 18 a verdict was brought in that Charles Perring took his life while the balance of his mind was disturbed."

A pitiable story and one of the many signs of the spiritual and moral degradation into which the country is drifting under the curse of war.

Charles Perring was brave enough to refuse to join that portion of the herd of conscripted sheep which knows that the war is wrong, but, in spite of that knowledge, allows itself to be driven off to kill, or be killed, at the bidding of the politicians. Yet, though he was brave enough to go so far, he lacked the determination — and who can greatly blame him? — to endure imprisonment under the disgraceful conditions which, one hears from many quarters, are now allowed to prevail. So he took the short way out.

"Charles Perring took his life while the balance of his mind was disturbed." And who was to blame for disturbing the balance of Charles Perring's mind and at whose door does responsibility for his death,and for the agony of his parents and sister, lie? It lies at the door of those miserable fools on, presumably, the Oxford Tribunal and on whatever the Appeal Tribunal may be to which Oxford sends its cases, who, lacking all capacity and not improbably all real desire, to judge questions of conscience fairly, pass sentence upon men wiser and better than themselves.

Some members of Tribunals, I know, endeavour to discharge their duties fairly, but there are very many who do not, as is amply proved by the known character and record of those to whom they have refused exemption and by reports of their manner and conduct. A share of responsibility for Charles Perring's death lies at the door of those war propagandists of the Press and the B.B.C. who, not caring as to whether what they write or say be true or false, for the sake of money, stuff the minds of all men, including members of Tribunals, with a hate-dope destructive of humanity, reason and justice.

A share of responsibility — and a heavy share — lies also with a Parliament and a government who, shedding crocodile tears over the sufferings of Poles whom they betrayed into war by a senseless alliance and promise of military help they were unable to implement, take no effective steps to prevent tyranny and injustice in their own country. Especially contemptible is the share of guilt of those Labour members of the Cabinet whose past utterances on the subject of war and conscription might have been expected to shame even the most hardened consciences into refusing the bait of power and office in a War government. These men, who have turned their backs on the light they once saw, took no effective steps to secure fair play for those who, at the bottom of their hearts, they must surely know are right; nor will they ever dissociate themselves from a government which neglects to provide justice for men and women whose opinions they once themselves professed.

What is the remedy for the abuse arising from the unfit personnel of Tribunals? In a country where propaganda and war hysteria have upset balance and moral sense of the people from top to bottom it is not easy at first to know where to look for justice. (For a description of Britain in the autumn of 1942 I would commend to readers of "The Word" the study of Isaiah and Jeremiah, preferably in Moffat's translation of the Bible, if they wish to be moved at times to laughter and at time to tears by the closeness of the resemblance of the prophets' times to our own!) Seeing, however, that ordinary Tribunals are at present so heavily weighted by prejudice and feeling against the objector, it seems to me that the best way of securing justice and a fairer balance would be a rule that the majority of the members of Appeal Tribunals shall be composed of persons opposed to war but nevertheless known to be of such broad-minded integrity that they would not be too tender-hearted to recognise and turn down any obvious fraud.

WHEN THE WAR IS OVER

What will be the Position of the C.O.?

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

[This article is reprinted from the "C.B.C.O. Bulletin" for October. An account of Rhys Davies' career appeared in our columns for January. There is a record of his war opposition in SOCIALISM AND PARLIAMENT, Pt. II. Comrade Davies started life as a farm servant and spent ten years as a coal miner in the Rhondda Valley. He was Under-Secretary of the Home Department in 1924. —Ed.]

The late Mr. Morgan Jones, M.P., whom I knew intimately, was an absolute pacifist during the last War; and his remarkable career provides the best clue to the attitude of the public towards the Conscientious Objector when war is over and the usual reaction against blood-letting sets in. Every C.O. in the Great War of 1914-18 did not, of course, travel the same path; but it is astonishing the number who became M.P.s, officials and leaders of all kinds of organisations. "Martyrs" became "heroes", as of old, as it were.

Morgan Jones was a Certificated School Teacher in South Wales; he refused to have anything to do with conscription; he defied all authority and found himself in prison for two years. His Teacher's Certificate was cancelled, and he never again followed that profession. The only way of securing a livelihood after imprisonment was to become a colliery labourer, and he followed that occupation underground for the next two years. In due course he was elected as Labour Councillor on to his Local Authority, then a County Councillor, became ultimately an M.P., and later on still parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education, the very authority which had cancelled his Teacher's Certificate. The wheel of Fate turned round completely in his case.

On the other hand, some C.O.s lost their health and went down to their graves as the result of ill-treatment and persecution; others became successful shopkeepers and business men, and not a few made good in the factory and workshop. I have met some who emigrated to Canada and the U.S.A.; I never heard one regretting the action he took in 1914-1918. Indeed, some have proved themselves such implacable opponents of conscription that they are in prison once again for their principles.

THIS TIME.

What is to happen to the much larger number of C.O.s when this War is over? That is, naturally, a very difficult question to answer. There is a law on the Statute Book providing for the return to employment of all those who have been conscripted. That cannot mean much, even to the conscript, especially to those who on return home find that their employers have changed hands or have closed down for good, or that their original form of employment has disappeared for ever. What, then, is to become of C.O.s? Unless history declines to repeat itself, they may find a better niche in the industrial and commercial structure that if they had become conscripts. As a rule, it requires much more personal grit and character to be a C.O. than to become a soldier; that is recognised, even by the soldier himself. It is that grit and courage in affairs that determines a man's fate in society, whether he is a C.O. or a conscript, whether employment is good, or the out-of-works run into several millions.

THE FATEFUL DECISION.

It is seldom that we find a drunkard or a wastrel among C.O.s; they are for the most part men and women of excellent personal character, and they are gnerally honest and reliable in business. Beyond all that, they are much better mentally equipped than the average individual: they must have cultivated the habit of study and have disciplined themselves in many ways before they could arrive at the fateful conclusion to resist the awful power of the State.

That being so, there can be no doubt that the action they take, which is almost universally condemned during war, will stand them in good stead later on in life. It is well to remember in passing that most of the leaders of mankind are those who have suffered for their beliefs. Hitler, Mussolini and even Stalin were all in gaol for these very reasons; they were conscientious objectors to the laws of their respective countries for the time being; they became martyrs first, and then were hailed as heroes. In this connection history repeats itself without exception from age to age.

A DUTY CALLS.

It is common nowadays to say that when the soldiers return to civilian life they will make sure that the world shall be made better. We may be sure that there will be many more C.O.s in proportion to their numbers taking part in that effort, not merely to make "the world fit for heroes" and "safe for Democracy", but to induce mankind to believe that war settles nothing and that as an instrument of national policy it has proved its sheer futility a thousand times or more!

NORMAN LEVERITT

Last month we recorded the police court prosecution of our Spalding United Socialist Movement comrade, Norman Leveritt.

Comrade Leveritt appeared before the North Midland Tribunal at Lincoln, on November 3, 1941.

Leveritt was accompanied at the Tribunal by his uncle, J. R. James, of Hull, who is Socialist, but does not claim to be a Pacifist. Mr. James was, at one time, a Unitarian preacher. He served in the Great War. Mr. James told the Tribunal that he has discussed war with his nephew and could testify: "My nephew's conviction is born of inner wrestling and is deep and sincere."

The official report of the evidence given at this Tribunal, contains the following summary of Leveritt's statements:—

"Not a member of any religious body. All wars are equally alike to him. . . . Boils down to a question of a peaceful solution. . . . common sense and humanitarian grounds. . . . humanity cannot be saved by wars and evil. . . . Sympathetic with I.L.P. . . . Has not done anything in the national effort. Every little thing helps the war and it is difficult to find anything that is not helping the war effort. Is assisting in carrying on the life of the country but is not participating in the war. R.A.M.C. integral part of the Army. . . . would not serve with a civilian ambulance . . . as it would be helping the war effort however minutely."

Leveritt was registered by this Tribunal for full-time A.R.P. duties. The realisation tnat this did not square with his complete war opposition explains his present imprisonment. Under the National Service Acts he is entitled to receive unconditional exemption.

THE PROSPECT OF A TEN YEARS' WAR

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government)

[The following escay was published by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, September 18.—Ed.]

Lord Hankey, who for nearly thirty-five years was Secretary to the British Cabinet, attended all its meetings; and has more direct political knowledge of international relations of Governments (and political leaders who form governments) than anybody else, writing for the "Sunday Times" of September 6th, quoted with approval the opinion of Sir Earl Page that this war would be a ten years' struggle. Speaking in Sydney, Sir Earl Page had said that:—

"he had no reason to alter his opinion that the Axis would win the first four years of the war and the Allies the last six, making a ten year's struggle."

Although I do not know enough of Sir Earl Page to have any idea of the value of his opinion about the probable length of the war, I do know enough of Lord Hankey (after having sat opposite him at Cabinet meetings for nine months) to be quite sure he would not quote Sir Earl Page's opinion approvingly if he did not attach great importance to it.

As to the war being a ten years' war, that I can well believe. Indeed, if it is to end in the promised military victory for the Allies (which means reconquest by military operations of all lost British possessions in the Far East and acceptance of defeat by the Nazi and Fascist governments of Germany, Italy and Japan) then I see no possibility of the war being only a ten years' war. Nor do I see any possibility of the tide of battle turning in favour of the Allies at the end of this, the fourth year of war.

Deeply committed as we seem to be by the determination of all Governments concerned, and their supporting peoples, that the war must be a fight to the finish, it has the outward appearance of unreality to speak of a better way than that which lies through blood and tears to a fighting finish in the dim and distant future.

Yet I believe on the contrary that it is more realistic to think and speak of a better way, than it is to think and speak of fighting this war to a military finish. Because there must be a better way than that which lies through an unimaginable number of years of blood and tears of countless millions of people.

How is that way to be found? On what does the possibility of its opening depend? It is not to be found by giving confidence and trust to Governments and party leaders who think and speak only of an illusory military victory, as if no other way to end the war were thinkable or possible.

The possibility of opening that better way than fighting the war to its military finish depends on the attitude of peoples concerning the war. And this can be changed. Indeed, it is changing now, not here at home as yet, I agree, but in Germany and in Italy, where peoples of aggressive Governments have already suffered bereavements in millions of homes and are facing a second winter with millions of their men-folk freezing in Russia's arctic cold regions, under constant attack from people frantically, and at the cost of any sacrifice, defending their own homeland and their way of life.

That Hitler knows and fears this change of attitude of the German people towards the war is proved by his decision to organise a special army for dealing with internal disorder.

In Italy it is notorious that masses of the population are disillusioned, and that only the strangle-hold of German Nazi forces stationed in Italy prevents serious disturbances in some regions.

On July 20th the "Daily Herald" reported that Dr. Goebbels had opened an intensive propaganda to convince the German people that they will suffer "hell on earth" if the Allies win. Vansittart's infamous book, threatening the whole German people with after-war punishment, has been translated by the Nazis into their own language, to use for their own war propaganda to bolster up the determination of their own people. And it is only to be expected that Wolstencroft's "punish the German people" speech at the recent Trades Congress will be used to similar purposes.

The next step of approach must be taken here at home. There is no promise of it yet, but we do not yet know, from general and widely-shared personal experience, what war in its super-devilish modern form really is.

We have had nothing like what happened to Dusseldorf one day last week, for example. Dusseldorf, when I was there over thirty years ago, was a town similar to Bradford in many ways. Its population was only slightly larger, and it is probably as clean and attractive as ever. The running water through the centre of the town will still be clear, and the people, old and young, strolling through its handsome tree-lined thoroughfares, will be the same kindly and friendly folk as they were then.

How many of us reading that vauntingly display headline in last Saturday's "Daily Herald" (September 12th) realised that this Bradford of ours (for which we are now organising a Civic Society to make Bradford as beautiful as Dusseldorf was made a generation ago), may, with many other towns, have to suffer similar destruction if no better way is found than that leading to a fighting finish!

"100,000 FIRE BOMBS ON DUSSELDORF" screeched the "Herald", and other papers.

"the flares dropped by the earlier planes and fires cause by incendaries illuminated the vast industrial area, with its munition factories, railway network, oil refineries, steel-works and blast-furnaces, better than a moon."

It was not one of the largest-scale raids, explained the "Herald", but one made by a "force running into several hundreds."

"Their work of destruction was concentrated into under one hour."

Can we now appreciate the truths of common humanity, and the beauty of human fellowship, and not have to wait to learn through bitter experience the full horror of their opposites? Germany is learning that lesson now. It will be our turn next.

Let us not forget the widely-quoted words of the American broadcaster:—

"A fate apart from the fate of Nazism is contained in none of our propaganda—and so the German people fight and offer their lives to save their families—and incidentally the Nazis—from total destruction, and they work their hands to the bone to make the guns the Nazis need.

"And the war will go on for a needless number of years because the German people are afraid. . . "

—"The Last Train from Berlin"
by Howard K. Smith.

This is outspoken testimony in favour of finding a better way than the fight to a finish, and moreover the idea is gaining ground, though very slowly, here in Britain. I quote last week's Cavalcade (September 12th):—

"The duration of the war and its outcome depend on a clear definition of objectives, for without definition we really do not know where we are going, and IT MAY TAKE YEARS GETTING TO THE PLACE WHERE THE POWER PRESSURE GROUPS WANT TO GO."

And "the place where the power pressure groups want to go" is no paradise for the people—even for a victorious people.

ADELA CREAGH.

On September 28, Miss A. V. G. Creagh, 22-year-old daughter of Rear-Admiral J. V. Creagh, D.S.O. (retired), of Mycenae-road, Blackheath, S.E., successfully appealed against the decision of a tribunal for conscientious objectors to remove her name from the register. She was granted conditional exemption.

Rear-Admiral J. V. Creagh, D.S.O., made a vigorous statement on behalf of his daughter.

He said in part:—

My daughter wishes to record her Christian faith. She sees that noble ideals cannot now be achieved by people whose actions are ignoble. It is for these convictions of her conscience that she takes her stand.

For the convictions of her conscience my daughter has sacrificed friends, the material pleasures and comforts which are counted of importance by many who have not her views, with a courage worthy of her clan, which has bred fighters for 16 centuries.

As stated in our September issue, Rear-Admiral Creagh commanded destroyers during the last war, and received the D.S.O. in 1918 for his services.

Miss Creagh's full statement, and also the very clear letter addressed to the Tribunal by the Admiral, will be published in a later issue.

JUDGE RICHARDSON.

Our comrade, John Morley, published the following letter in the "Newcastle Daily Journal", for September 30. last:—

JUDGE AND C.Os.

Sir,—The report of Judge Richardson's speech on Conscientious Objectors makes amazing reading. Here is a Judge who is appointed chairman of a tribunal whose duty it is to inquire impartially into a person's statement that he (or she) has a conscientious objection to taking part in war, and to assess as nearly as they can the degree of objection to war which the applicant may sincerely and conscientiously hold.

The whole of this speech exudes the most virulent prejudice against C.Os.

JOHN MORLEY.

"Rosslyn," Highfield Road,
Westerhope.

We endorse comrade Morley's statement. We have a complete record of Richardson's disgraceful performances on the Tribunal. He dishonours his office and his behaviour is an outrage on every principle of jurisprudence. He is without dignity and without balance. The man is suffering from hysteria and ought to be removed from office.

EUGENE DEBS.

F. W. Jowett writes:—

Bradford, September 20, 1942.

My Dear Aldred,—Thanks for copies of story of Debs pamphlet. It is an inspiring pamphlet exceedingly well planned and produced. I hope it will be well received and extensively circulated. You have done good service to the cause for which Debs spent his whole life's effort by preparing and publishing the pamphlet.

Best wishes.

Yours fraternally,

F. W. JOWETT.

Rhys J. Davies, M.P., writes:—

House of Commons, Sept. 26, 1942.

Dear Aldred,—I am delighted that you are publishing that Pamphlet about Debs. It may interest you to know that I was privileged to know his personally. We both spoke on the same platform at a very large meeting in Brooklyn, and I have before me at this moment a splendid photograph of him with his hand-writing as follows:—

"To Rhys Davies, staunch, fearless Leader of the British Workers in the great struggle and inspired evangel of the Coming Day. With the love and appreciation of his Comrade, Eugent V. Debs."

I am so glad that you are giving publicity too to the Labour Pacifist Fellowship.

Kind Wishes.

Yours faithfully,

R. J. DAVIES.

THE EDITOR LOOKS BACK

FLEET STREET, 1902-1907.
Fleet Street as the Editor knew it, in the days of the old horse bus. Here he worked for the National Press Agency and the "Daily Chronicle." Fleet Street then was supposed to be Bohemian, but the Editor revolted at its ignorance, sordidness, and corruption. He honoured spots where Richard Carlile had lived and worked.

THE EDITOR IN JUNE 1906.
Last portrait taken of the Editor as a Parliamentary Socialist Propagandist.

The editor attained his fifty-sixth birthday on the fifth of the present month. Five days later he will celebrate his fortieth anniversary as a public speaker. For he was born on Guy Fawkes Day, 1886, and made his first appearance on the public platform on November 10, 1902, as a Christian Boy Preacher. Excerpts from his Boy Preacher sermons are to be found in the appendices to Part I. of "Dogmas Discarded." The story of his early thought evolution is told in the two parts of that work.

We live in days of danger and uncertainty. Because of this the reader is asked to excuse the editor his birthday indulgence of looking back and recalling some of the milestones. Such musing is a vanity rather than an egotism because it savours of weakness rather than of strength. It is human, all too human. But to recall what one has been, and what one has done or dared or experienced, is a method of examining one's consistency. One stands in judgement at the merciless bar of one's own conscience, which knows all that is to be known. Here there is no excuse. Thus one gathers strength for further battles against that which is false. The frailty of pausing to look back is a sign of growing age and inevitable decline. But if it recreates the power to struggle, it is a weakness calling for forgiveness. The life of an agitator or pioneer has few breaks. Much abuse is suffered and some compensation is merited.

As a Boy Preacher, I developed heresy in prayer. A few of these heresies were published at the time but have not been printed since. The idea has occurred to me, often, of reprinting these forty-year-old prayers, but I have dismissed the thought as foolish. The Channing celebrations revive the idea for the most outstanding prayer embodies his idea of no gallows in the universe. But it goes beyond Channing's thought.

In 1902, my mind was undergoing rapid changes, and my sermons did not agree so much in the logic of their theology as in the logic of their development.

That was forty years ago. I often wonder how many persons who attended the meetings, listened to the sermons, and joined in the prayers, have followed my later activity. How many are in touch with me to-day? I know of one such comrade who writes me from Australia and another who is resident in the United States of America.

The Boy Preacher days ended but I sometimes think that I have followed faithfully the path indicated by my activity of those days. Many things have happened since I repudiated the idea of God and reached the conclusion that the faith once delivered to the saints was a message of uncompromising pacifism and social revolution. My courage may have faltered at times but my ideals have been clear. So have my ideas.

I pick up my cuttings at random, ignoring only the reports of my trials and imprisonments. They are too tiresome to recall at the moment.

I have written against three wars, spoken and written against two wars, completely resisted one war. I was fifteen when I opposed the Boer War. My interest was raised by the treatment meted out to Sir Redvers Buller, whom I regarded as a great and able soldier. But it developed into a fierce opposition against the war itself. This is not difficult to understand for my grandfather, with whom I lived, was an enthusiastic and uncompromising Christian Pacifist. He had a Radical love of justice and encouraged freedom of thought and expression.

In December, 1911, the "Daily Express" made a strenuous effort to secure my incarceration for blasphemy because of the part I played in the Streatham Free Speech fight. I delivered a purely logical attack on prosecution for blasphemy, and said some uncomplimentary things about the policeman as an authority on religion. The entire attack merits reprinting as also my dispute with the Vicar of Streatham at the time.

At one time I was the youngest Socialist speaker in Great Britain. I have reports of meetings I addressed at Ewell under the auspices of the local Social Democratic Federation in 1905. In these days I was active in Clerkenwell, Islington, Southwark, New Cross, Brixton, Clapham, Camberwell, Bethnal Green, and Mile End, in London. Outside London, I spoke in Strood, Gillingham, and Rochester, in Kent. When I decided to leave the parliamentary Socialists in 1906, I was asked to deliver a farewell lecture in Strood, and a local comrade, named Taylor, insisted on taking the photograph of me published in this issue. This was my first photograph as a Socialist and it marked the beginning of my anti-parliamentarian career. For that reason I consider it a picture of interest. Since it is not included in "Dogmas Discarded" I venture to publish it as a feature of this musing. I like this picture because the photographer seems to have caught my spirit of challenge to the world.

In 1925 came the Hyde Park alleged Blasphemy and Sedition prosecution, in which the police authorities were defeated, after repeated court appearances by myself, and remands were made in order, as the magistrate said and the papers reported, "that the police might have expert legal assistance", actually Crown Counsel. This case involved repeated journeys from Glasgow, since I was living in Glasgow at that time and had given up my London domicile the previous year.

It is interesting to recall how this tremendous and unsought spate of publicity came about. I arrived in London from Glasgow on Saturday, February 14, 1925, on a visit of a few days' duration. I had no intention of speaking anywhere. During the previous year I had been involved in the Glasgow Green Free Speech prosecutions. I certainly expected no trouble in London. The following day, Sunday, I naturally went for an afternoon stroll in Hyde Park, to listen to speeches, and to resume acquaintance with the famous forum in which I had spent so many Sundays, year after year, discussing and lecturing. Hyde Park had been my University. I was persuaded to mount a Socialist platform. Within a few minutes, to my amazement, two over-zealous policemen, one in plain clothes, had moved through the meeting and arrested me from the platform. I actually agreed to go with them to save a riot, as the crowd naturally resented their conduct.

I appeared before Mr. Cancellor, who was one of the magistrates at Marlborough Street Court at that time, on Monday. I was remanded on my own recognisances of £20, the magistrate making the remarkable statement that the police would require legal aid to meet my defence. When I appeared in Court again on February 24, further charges of blasphemy were added, the items being served on me in Court. I was handed charges at the meetings I addressed in Hyde Park on the Sundays during the period the case was being continued. The case was continued on March 3 and concluded on March 10, when the magistrate declared that I was innocent of blasphemy, and had said no insulting things

MAGISTRATE SAYS POLICE SHOULD HAVE LEGAL HELP.

The arrest of a speaker in Hyde Park yesterday was followed by his appearance before Mr. Cancellor at Marlborough-street to-day.

Guy Alfred Aldred (38), described as a British subject, whose address was given as about the deity, but had been somewhat insulting about the Union Jack. Actually, the case had fizzled out, after giving me an opportunity of avowing my Atheism and my Socialism, on affirmation, on the witness stand, and in my speech from the dock.

The press throughout the Country made a bigger sensation of this case than of my more serious prosecutions. The "Daily Sketch", in its northern edition, which circulated in Scotland published an excellent picture of me speaking in Hyde Park. This I reproduce from its columns for Wednesday, February 25, 1925.

This sketch did not appear in the London edition.

The London edition of the "Daily Sketch", in its issue for Monday, February 23, 1925, published the following account of my Hyde Park address:—

"MERRY LIFE OF REBELS."

Guy Aldred Speaks in Hyde Park a Week After his Arrest.

"We rebels live a merry life, but I am not sure that it is always a short one", declared Guy Aldred, who was arrested a week ago in Hyde Park, to a similar meeting held at the same spot yesterday.

When he had finished his speech and received three cheers he was handed a document by a police inspector. It was a statement of the offences with which he will be charged when he appears at Marlborough-street to-morrow.

At one stage of his address there was some interruption. Aldred called upon the police to remove the offenders, and, because they made no move to do so, announced that he would report their failure to give him protection to the proper quarter.

When I appeared on the Tuesday in the dock at Marlborough-street further charges were served on me.

Readers will be interested in the caricature of Henry Lanny Cancellor, the magistrate, as pictured by a capitalist journalist—and published in the press at the time—presiding at the first day's hearing of the case.

Born in 1862, Mr. Cancellor was educated at Oxford, and was called to the Bar, Inner Temple, in 1888, two years after I was born. He served as Metropolitan Police Magistrate at West London Police Court, 1914-21, Thames 1921 and Marlborough-street, 1921-29. He died—almost immediately after his retirement from the Bench—on October 6, 1929. The following year was published his memoirs, "The Life of a London Beak." Cancellor had a sense of humour.

I conclude by looking back at the Fleet Street I once knew, the Fleet Street of Harmsworth and Arthur Spurgeon and Robert Donald, the Fleet Street of the old horse bus. It was said to have been a street of Bohemianism. But I think that it was a network of courts and alleys in which sordid and shabby day-labourism lived, moved and had its being. I knew Spurgeon and Donald well. I knew many of the old Fleet St. characters and much of its gossip and history. Fleet Street, to me, is a memory of evil enchantment, a byway of falsehood and corruption controlled by vermin. Here genius was destroyed and talent prostituted. But it had its pleasant places. In these odd nooks and crannies I paused to vision the passing of the capitalist press, the doom of commercial journalism, and the dawn of a new civilisation. I often thought of Richard Carlile and his heroic shopmen and shopwomen who had sanctified the site and I prayed, if that be the correct term for intense hopeful dedication and consecration of one's energies, that I might tread in his footsteps.

And so I pass another milestone.

I have looked back a little, I have mused and have gained some strength from my musing. I look forward to what—?

Could I decide the future it would be a free earth and a free humanity: an earth of joy, brotherhood, and service. One day that will be the decision, not of a small minority of pioneers, but of the great majority of mankind, the great common people in a mood of great common sense.

BLASPHEMY CHARGE

When Guy Aldred (above) was again before the Marlborough-street magistrate yesterday a further charge was preferred against him—that of "using insulting and blasphemous words in Hyde Park." He was again remanded on bail.—(D.S.)

Marlborough St. Magistrate decides that the police need legal aid.

I AM THE COMMON MAN.

I am the Common Man,
I am the brute and the slave,
I am the fool, the despised,
From the cradle to the grave.

I am the hewer of coal,
I am the tiller of soil,
I am the serf of the seas,
Born to bear and to toil.

I am the builder of halls,
I am the dweller of slums,
I am the filth and the scourge
When winter's depression comes.

I am the fighter of wars,
I am the killer of men,
Not for a day or an age,
But again, and again, and again.

I am the Common Man,
But Master, oh! take you heed,
For you have put in my head
Many a wicked deed.

I am the slave and the brute,
And my hands are strong as steel,
Oh! Master, how will you fare
When down at my feet you kneel?

JEHOVAH WITNESSES

ARE THEY BEING PERSECUTED

A. D. SCHROEDER
Deported Leader of the Witnesses.

Last month we commented on the recent deportation to the United States of Albert Danger Schroeder, organiser of the Jehovah Witness sect in Great Britain. That the deportation was an offence against conscience is established by the fact that the Ministry of Labour told Schroeder that he must work on a farm or leave the country. He refused, voluntarily, to accept either alternative. Accordingly he was deported.

Prior to his deportation, Schroeder stated, to the press, that Jehovah's Witnesses are not a pacifist group, that they have no connection with the Peace Pledge Union, and leave the question of National Service entirely to the individual conscience of their members.

In Glasgow, the case against the deportation of Mr. Schroeder has been stated clearly, and vigorously, in the press, and on the platform, by Mr. Alexander Ratcliffe, the editor of "The Vanguard", and leader of the British Protestant League. Since the outbreak of the war, Alexander Ratcliffe has felt that no Christian can support war, and he has conducted an untiring and fearless anti-militarist campaign. This activity is to be honoured because it has cost him the support of many of his Protestant supporters. It is not necessary to agree with Mr. Ratcliffe's theology to appreciate his defence of liberty of speech and writing; and his championship of the rights of conscience.

Mr. Ratcliffe considers Schroeder to be the victim of a Roman Catholic conspiracy. We believe that he is merely the victim of political arrogance and stupidity such as only bureaucracy can exhibit in war time under pretence of military necessity and equal patriotism. We believe that Schroeder ought to have been treated with exactly the same courtesy as would have been shown to a Roman Catholic priest.

Mr. Ratcliffe states the facts clearly:—

Mr. Schroeder was educated in the University of Michigan, U.S.A. In 1932 he was ordained a minister of the Gospel as preached by the body known as "Jehovah's Witnesses." That body is recognised in the U.S.A. as a "Religious Organisation," and its ministers in the U.S.A. are recognised as "Clergymen." A preacher of "Jehovah's Witnesses" in America has the same religious standing as a Presbyterian Pastor or a Popish Priest. And when Mr. Schroeder came to Britain in 1937, he came as an American Minister of the Gospel. He came to this country with an American clergyman's rights and status, and he was not interfered with by the Government till the 14th of May this year, when he was ordered to go back to the U.S.A.

Let the reader note the position. From 1937 till 1942 no interference was made with Mr. Schroeder. The war had run for two years and six months before the authorities "got after him." When commanded to leave the country no reason was given. It was not suggested that he was a menace to the war effort, or that he was an undesirable foreigner. He was first a friendly alien, and then he was our American Ally.

Mr. Schroeder refused to leave the country, for he wanted to know why he should do so. Nothing more was said of the matter till June 17, when he was told that he must undertake work of national importance. He appealed against this, but failed. He was then told that he must take up agricultural work. He refused to do so, stating that his work was to preach the Gospel as he knew it: that he was ordained for that purpose, and for that purpose he came to this country.

And now a Deportation Order is issued against him, and although he appeals to Mr. Morrison, the Home Secretary, to be heard on the matter, his appeal is refused. Ultimately, without any given reason, he is arrested and shipped back to America in August.

Now, if a Roman Catholic priest had been treated thus, what would have happened? . . . Would not the Pope have been appealed to and successfully got the British Home Secretary to withdraw his Deportation Order and to apologise? . . . But Mr. Schroeder is not a Roman Catholic priest.

In our pamphlet, "Armageddon Incorporated", we have criticised the Jehovah's Witnesses. At the same time, we have drawn attention to their treatment by Tribunals. We propose to add to this statement of fact in the present essay.

Jehovah's witnesses as an organised body of Christians have been worshipping in Great Britain since the year 1880. To-day there are 575 congregations in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland with approximately 15,000 active associates. Of this number 1,500 are full-time appointed ministers and full-time field missionaries.

Jehovah's witnesses are NOT pacifists. They claim to be neutral as to wars and organisations of this world. They do not hinder the war effort of the nations. Jehovah's witnesses in Germany follow the same course of neutrality. Hundreds of German Witnesses have paid with their blood and thousands still lie in Hitler's concentration camps. (See H.M. Government's White Paper Cmd 6120 by Sir Neville Henderson). Since 1933 Jehovah's witnesses in Germany have bitterly opposed the Nazi regime where their numbers are greater than in Britain.

The United State Government recognises as regular ministers Jehovah's witnesses who are serving full-time, granting them exemption from war duties similar to the clergy, nuns and religious workers of the churches. In Britain the Minister of Labour has chosen to make an exception of Jehovah's witnesses by refusing to recognise them as "regular ministers of any religious denomination." [See Section 11 (c) National Service (Armed Forces' Act, 1939.] The issue of Jehovah's witnesses in Britain centres chiefly around the full-time servants who are singled out by the Ministry of Labour for prosecution and their "cat and mouse" treatment.

For the ten months' period ending July 18, 1942, 440 Jehovah's witnesses in Britain were imprisoned serving sentences ranging from one month to two years. 377 of these were men and 63 are women full-time missionaries.

Severe treatment has been meted out to William Nisbet, of Edinburgh, Arthur Russel, of Middlesbrough, Gilbert Lane, of London, Gerald Henderson, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Thomas Goulden, of Liverpool. They were kept naked for hours, severely beaten, knocked unconscious and suffered assults even, in the case of Arthur Russel being manacled to a table leg.

On July 16, 1942, at Marylebone Court three officers of the London headquarters of the Society of Jehovah's witnesses were sentenced to two months under section 58A of the Defence Regulations, 1939. These officers were Alfred Pryce Hughes (47), Frank Gordon Plat (44), and Ewart Charles Chitty (44).

Hughes served a two-years' sentence in the last war and Platt three years' imprisonment (1916-1919) for their stand against war. Platt as a prisoner in the last war was forced to the front line in France and No. 1 Field Punishment was administered to him where he was strapped to a gun for eight hours at a time. Thereafter for seven months in France he was given solitary confinement. Now he is being called upon to suffer again for his principles.

On May 6th, 1942, the Home Office intimated a deportation order to the resident American Director of the Society, Mr. A. D. Schroeder. Mr. Schroeder has been an ordained minister for more than ten years. His forefathers for two generations have been American citizens.

ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE
Editor of the Glasgow "Vanguard," vigorous Protestant and Anti-War propagandist, has championed boldly the rights of the Jehovah Witnesses. The picture shows Mr. Ratcliffe speaking at Tower Hill, London.

Officials of the Ministry of Labour have admitted their purpose to close down the London Headquarters of Jehovah's witnesses using the instrument of 58A to clear out all its regular ministers. Eight further regular ministers received directions under 58A on July 17th notwithstanding that an appeal was pending in the High Court of England with reference to these regular ministers. Their names are J. B. Robb, James E. Barr, John E. Barr, H. G. King, S. E. Teasdale, A. S. Coville, F. A. Willett, and W. V. Emery.

Five Jehovah's witnesses are serving their second terms of imprisonment for resisting war. Their names are P. A. Relf, James Armstrong, G. A. Robertson, N. Gaydon, and R. W. Hindmoor.

Eleven refugee aliens have been interned by the Home Office because they are Jehovah's witnesses.

Miss Klara Bosshard, a Swiss National, was repatriated in June, 1942, the only reason given being that she was a Jehovah's witness. The British Government paid her air passage to Lisbon and thence to Switzerland.

Many of the lower Courts are prejudicial in their dealing with Jehovah's witnesses. In the case of Louisa Hercock (22) at Tottenham, March 6, 1942, Magistrates Bennett and Smith said:

"People are virtually using this organisation as a cloak for fifth column work and it is a national menace."

—"Evening Standard," 7/3/42.

"Sometimes one must do the work of the country before the work of God."

—"Hornsey Journal," 13/3/42.

In the case of E. Beavor at the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, April 9, 1942, Mr. J. H. Thorpe, K.C., in passing a sentence of two years' hard labour on a Jehovah's witness minister said:

"Parliament provided for a person in your position to be sentenced to a sentence not exceeding two years. Yours seems to be such a case. We do not know of a worse one, at a time when the country needs every able-bodied man to protect it."

—"Court Shorthand Record."

Prosecutors for the Ministry of Labour abuse their privilege in Court by heaping much slander for public consumption through the press. Mr. Trevor James, in the case of Louisa Hercock (see above):

"I am led to the conclusion that many young people are being sheltered by this organisation, which is not recognised by the Ministry. I am inclined to the view that these young people are its dupes."

—"Evening Standard", 7/3/42.

In the case of J. W. Felix before the Middleton Police Court June 8, 1942, Mr. Haywood, prosecutor for the Ministry of Labour said:

"This man calls himself a Jehovah's witness and is a member of a sect which can only be described as a small band of canting, hypocritical humbugs who have commercialized religion in the most sordid manner, and obtain an easy livelihood by playing on the gullibility of decent religious-minded people."
—"Evening Standard", 8/6/42.

In the case of Mrs. Fairweather, April 20, 1942, Mr. W. F. Watts, prosecuting at Ilfracombe said:

"I am very much tempted to suggest whether there may not be something sinister behind this movement. This woman and those who associate with her are willing to avail themselves of all the advantages of this still free country without doing a single thing in the national effort."
—"Western Morning News", 21/4/42.

Conscientious Objector's tribunals are biased in their consideration of Jehovah's witnesses who appear before them. Judge Thomas Richardson, Chairman of the Newcastle-on-Tyne tribunal said in the case of T. L. Hillary on December 6, 1939:

"You are a lot of cranks." (His decisions still bear out this prejudice.)

The late Judge Frankland, of Leeds, amongst his many tirades against Jehovah's witnesses made these remarks in his tribunal:

"You have fallen for this very obvious money-making concern, Jehovah's witnesses. You, a schoolmaster. I want you and your friend to leave the room. I don't want other people to be contaminated by your presence."
—"News Chronicle", 10/8/40.

"I want to say publicly that there is a grave doubt in my mind about the bona fides of this organisation and the people it employs."
—"Empire News", 11/8/40.

"I have been trying for a fortnight to draw your headquarters and to get them to send a balance sheet or a solicitor. They prefer to shelter; they prefer to lurk behind the privacy of Craven Terrace, London. It is another dodge for making money, most of which goes to America."
—"Daily Dispatch", 16/8/40.

"America has the biggest gold reserve in the world. I should think quite a lot of that belongs to Jehovah's witnesses and to poor English dupes they have got hold of like you."
—"Manchester Guardian", 10/8/40.

Judge Finnemore, at Birmingham, May 5, 1942, said:

"Apparently your only objection to military service is that it would mean interfering with your work as a member of Jehovah's witnesses and in my opinion this does not constitute a real conscientious objection."
—"Staffordshire Advertiser", 9/5/42.

Judge Wethered (Bristol Tribunal) described Jehovah's witnesses as:

"A mischievous society, persuading people that they should refuse to take part in the defence of their country."
—"Western Morning News", 21/4/42.

Judge Wethered, at one time, showed marked consideration to every conscientious objector who came before his Tribunal. He endeavoured to understand even when he turned down the applicant. His remarks about the Jehovah Witnesses betray war-bias.

We have no sympathy with the theology of the Jehovah Witnesses. We dislike their propaganda. We find them most annoying persons in themselves. But we would refuse to judge their cases if our bias, or genuine antagonism of feeling, rendered us incapable of delivering honest judgment as to the integrity of their war resistance. We do not like burglars but we have met burglars who were most genuine war-resisters. Charlatans or not, it is a fact that the Witnesses are genuine war resisters and that war resistance follows from their concept of Jehovah. They have resisted to the concentration camp and to the death in Germany. This fact ought to be recognised.

If Tribunals cannot put aside questions of theology and personal likes or dislikes, they are abusing their function and their personnel ought to be changed.

ANGLICAN PACIFISM MILITANT

Our fearless comrade, the Rev. R. H. Le Messurier, B.A., Vicar of Holy Cross in St. Pancras with St. Jude, continues his splendid stand for pacifism and socialism. Comrade Le Messurier aims to show that pacifism and socialism are plain, straightforward and orthodox deductions from Christian bases.

This weekly leaflet for October 11 urges his parishioners to, among other objects:

Pray for: An early ending to the war;

The return of the nations to God;

A just and lasting peace;

Those in prison for conscience sake;

The war's victims, living or dead.

In one place his weekly leaflet asks:—

Is this a joke, or not?

First schoolboy: What have you got for homework?

Second schoolboy: Bayonet fighting and Scripture.

Comrade Le Messurier concludes his leaflet with an exposition of New Testament Scripturt, from which we excerpt:

He who said, do not commit adultery, also said, do not kill. Now if you do not commit adultery but if you kill, you have transgressed the law.

The full passage is a magnificent identification of Christianity with the law of freedom and a strong denunciation of propaganda by defaming.

The letter to his parisioners deserves to be reproduced in full:—

Lest I should merit an accusation of being one-sided, I thought that this week most of this letter should be the actual words of one who is no pacifist. His prominence in the world to-day should give his words some weight. Writing of the first world-war, he shows clearly how the best things in the life of the nation and the individual were all taken over by the war spirit, and what happened as a result. These are his words:

"It was not until the dawn of the twentieth century of the Christian era that war really began to enter into its kingdom as the potential destroyer of the human race. The organization of mankind into great States and Empires and the rise of nations to full collective consciousness enabled enterprises of slaughter to be planned and executed upon a scale, with a perseverance never before imagined. All the noblest virtues of individuals were gathered together to strengthen the destructive capacity of the mass. Good finances, the resources of world-wide credit and trade, the accumulation of large capital reserves, made it possible to divert for considerable periods the energies of whole peoples to the task of Devastation. Democratic institutions gave expression to the will-power of millions. Education not only brought the course of the conflict within the comprehension of everyone, but rendered each person serviceable in a high degree for the purpose in hand. The Press offered a means of unification, and of mutual encouragement; Religion, having discreetly avoided conflict on the fundamental issues (Note this—R. H. Le M.) offered its encouragements and consolations, through all its forms, impartially to all combatants. Lastly Science unfolded her treasures and her secrets to the desperate demands of men and placed in their hands agencies and apparatus almost decisive in their character."

This is a terrible picture, my people, of how the Devil uses everything decent for his foul ends. But let us follow the sketch a bit further. Our writer continues:

"In consequence many novel features presented themselves. Instead of merely starving fortified towns, whole nations were methodically subjected, or sought to be subjected, to the process of reduction by famine. The entire population in one capacity or another took part in the War; all were equally the object of attack. The Air opened paths along which death and terror could be carried far behind the lines of the actual armies, to women, children, the aged, the sick, who in earlier struggles would perforce have been left untouched. Marvellous organizations of railroads, steamships and motor vehicles placed and maintained tens of millions of men continuously in action. Healing and surgery in their exquisite developments returned them again and again to the shambles. Nothing was wasted that could contribute to the process of waste. The last dying kick was brought into military utility."

And the result. What does he say about this? Listen.

"The former peace-time structure of society had for more than four years been superseded and life had been raised to a strange intensity by the war spell. . . But now the spell was broken. . . The boundless hopes that had cheered the soldiers and the peoples in their tribulations died swiftly away. . . . How could it have been otherwise? By what process could the slaughter of ten million men and and the destruction of one-third of the entire savings of the greatest nations of the world have ushered in a Golden Age? A cruel disillusionment was at hand for all."

Now for the writer's name. Believe it or not, it is the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, in his "Great War", pp. 1603, 1278f.

There, my people, is truth, put by a non-pacifist. Now perhaps we see why we cannot be told what we are supposed to be fighting for, except in general terms which help to cheer us in our tribulations. By what process can the present slaughter bring in a Golden Age? How well does religion deserve the sneer which Mr. Churchill gives it in the words in bold type!

Pacifists are sometimes accused of irrational thinking. But what can be said of a person who believes a thing to be no use, and yet persists in doing it? The war-method stands condemned by one of its great exponents, two thousand years after its condemnation by its greatest opponent, our Lord JESUS Christ. By their fruits ye shall know them. God give us grace to follow the peace-way, the love-way here and now.

Your servant for Christ's sake, discontinue night air-raids on civilian centres of population could still be arrived at. It is a question of bringing sufficient pressure to bear upon our politicians, the figure of whose air-raid casualties, as far as I am aware, still stands at 0.

The answer to the footling objection that even if the Germans promised to do so, they would not observe such an undertaking as I have mentioned, is so obvious that I shall not waste paper by giving it.

THE BREAK-UP OF AN EMPIRE

A Review of the War Situation

By C. H. NORMAN

Since the appearance of the article " On the Rocks " in the " Word " for September, 1941, many remarkable and disturbing events have taken place in the international conflict. As foreshadowed in that article, the United States and Japan have entered the war as active participants, with disastrous results to the British Empire and its associates, especially Holland, which has lost control over the whole of her Pacific possessions.

There are one or two preliminary comments which must be made before indulging in a more realistic analysis of the situation than the British people are permitted usually to consider owing to the activities of the propaganda and censor departments, which combine ingeniously and successfully their efforts to confuse the mind and cloud the intelligence.

It is notable as an achievement of " democracy " in that country which has imagined itself controlled by the will of the people that President Roosevelt is the second President of the United States who, having been elected on a specific pledge to keep the United States out of war, has, shortly after election, plunged his people into a calamitous and avoidable conflict. There is not a scrap of difference between the conduct of President Wilson and President Roosevelt in that respect. It may be said in reply that the action of the United States was dictated by the fact that Japan adopted at Pearl Harbour the tactics resorted to by Great Britain against the Danish Fleet lying at Copenhagen during the Napoleonic War, on which subject the memoirs of Lord Malmesbury are most instructive. But the answer can well be made that the acts of the Japanese were provoked by the freezing of Japanese assets everywhere that Britain and the United States could lay hands on them in July, 1942, the " freezing of assets " being a polite euphemism for annexing other people's property over which there was not the slightest right to exercise control. According to the " Evening Standard " of May 22, 1942, the Allied Statesmen were not agreed on this dangerous and provocative policy: " When Britain and America imposed economic sanctions on Japan last July this was done against the wishes of Mr. Menzies' Government in Australia," which country was likely to be involved seriously in a Pacific war. It would be interesting to know how far the Dutch Refugee Government agreed in the policy of economic sanctions. Anyhow, the weaker party was overborne by Britain and the United States with the consequences which are before everyone to see in the geographical and military position of Japan now compared with then.

The Japanese statesmen, no doubt, resented, quite properly, the homilies on the virtues of quite properly the homilies on the virtues of " democracy " and the wickedness of " aggression " of which they and the Japanese Emperor had been recipients at the hands of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Winston Churchill. Of all people, the Japanese could measure the value of Mr. Roosevelt's horror at aggression, as the Phillipine Islands were obtained by the United States as a result of the most aggressive war, except the Boer War, in the last century. It is instructive as evidence of this man's state of mind, to read the full text of President Roosevelt's message to Congress on December 15, 1941, on the entry of Japan into the war, setting forth a summary of the American policy in the Pacific. The reference to Japan is put thus: " In 1853, Commodore Perry knocked on Japan's door," and there is a discussion on trade relations. There is no mention of the fact that a decade later the Japanese port of Shimonoseki was bombarded without cause by the combined fleets of the United States, Great Britain, France and Holland, just to learn the Japanese to adopt Occidental trade methods! But the sentence which can hardly ever have been exceeded even by the Germans or the Soviet for humbug is the sentence in which the President describes the seizure of the Phillipine Islands as a result of the American-Spanish War in 1898: " At the end of the 19th Century, the sovereignty of the Phillipine Islands passed from Spain to the United States." That is all that is said by the President, who was presumably relying upon the fact that the organised ignorance produced by the American educational system made it certain that the ordinary American citizen had never heard of the Spanish-American War, any more than he had ever heard of the seizure of the Panama Province of the Republic of Colombia in 1904 as an example of non-aggression, or of the seizure of the Danish West Indian Islands in 1916 by President Wilson as a further instance of the policy of non-aggressive acquisition! Perhaps, however, the Japanese statesmen were not so ignorant of those historical events as the United States population and took the correct measure of the pose of the United States President as a champion of non-aggression. It may be, too, that the Japanese statesmen were equally unimpressed, from their knowledge of the history of the relations between Burma and Britain, at the affecting spectacle of Mr. Winston Churchill's indignation about unprovoked aggression. The following quotation is taken from the " New Stateman " of 6th June, 1942. " What possible excuse could there be for the re-conquest of Burma by the British Empire? If one reads the story of Britain's wars in Burma, they are about the most aggressive and least justified in the nineteenth century; Hitler has only a little enlarged and improved on the technique. I was amused to learn that, in 1825, the British neatly anticipated Hitler's technique by a proclamation which began by saying that the King of Burma " by his unprovoked aggression and extravagant pretensions had forced the British Government to invade his dominions." There were three major wars necessary before Burma was subjugated by the British. Since the end of the European War, 1914-1918, there have been two major revolts in Burma put down with considerable ferocity. What finally turned the Burmese against the British was the treacherous seizure of U. Saw, the Burmese Premier, on his way home from Burma in 1941 after a mission to England. What has happened to that unfortunate man no one has been permitted to know—in England anyhow. It ill befits Mr. Winston Churchill to lecture other people upon their moral delinquencies in the circumstances.

The events in the Malayan Peninsula, the Dutch Archipelago, Hong Kong and Singapore were no surprise to anyone who had any realistic knowledge of the situation there. The wars between the Dutch and the Achinese made it exceedingly unlikely that the inhabitants would keenly support the Dutch against a Japanese invasion. There was really something comic about the Chinese trying to relieve Hong Kong, recollecting the attitude of the Hong Kong Government towards the Chinese population of that city. The same remarks apply in connection with the major Malay States. The case of Singapore is rather different. What has happened at Singapore has entirely justified the attitude of those who, in the days of the Liberal Government of 1906-1914, opposed the expenditure of money on the Singapore naval dock. The argument was this, as advanced by the present writer, among others. At that time the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of Alliance was in full force. The proposal to build the dock was known to be a naval, capitalist-imperialist ramp. Its opponents pointed out that the dock could only be of value against Japan. To build such a dock against a country that Britain was in alliance with seemed extraordinary. It was further argued that the naval dock would be of no value for its purpose against Japan for the following reasons. It could not be defended against land attack except by the expenditure of enormous capital sums in fortifications and the maintenance of a huge garrison, which the House of Commons would certainly not sanction in times of peace. If it were not possible to defend the dock from Japanese attack, then the purpose of the dock was futile, as the only result would be that, in a war between Japan and Britain (the only circumstance in which the dock could be of value) the British could not hold Singapore owing to the enormous length of communications, and so to build the dock would simply be handing over a valuable prize to Japan. That argument has been entirely borne out by the events which have occurred since December 1941. It is also important to remember that the breaking off of the policy of friendliness towards Japan was taken at the instance of the United States, which took the view that such an alliance lowered white prestige throughout the world. The folly of acting on such a view is plain to everyone. Those who gave the matter even a moment's thought recognised the profound wisdom behind the original policy which produced the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and the change-over which took place after 1919 has been the result of the maleficent skill shewn by Vansittart and his colleagues in turning the allies of England into her enemies. In the war of 1914-1918, the following states, now enemies, were then Britain's allies: Italy, Japan, Roumania. France, a loyal ally through 1914-1918, is being treated in 1941-1942 as Russia was treated in 1918-1919 after the Russians retired from the war: her territories being blockaded and invaded on the flimsiest pretexts. This, notwithstanding that the successful evacuation at Dunkirk was only effected by the skilful covering of the French Army of the North!

Nothing perhaps is more interesting in the turns and twists of this Imperialist-Capitalist war than the unity of purpose which has developed between the Communist leader, Mr. Stalin, and the leaders of ruthless exploiting Anglo-American Capitalism, with the South South American dictatorships and the Chinese military gambiers lagging slightly behind. One has only to re-read Mr. Stalin and Mr. Molotov's speeches about Anglo-French Imperialism between 1939 and 1941 to appreciate the hugeness of the joke, coupled with a study of what was said by the United States, Britain and France about the Soviet during the Russo-Finnish war, which is fully documented in Mr. and Mrs. Coates book entitled " The Soviet-Finnish Campaign, 1939-1940." Never were so many lied to by so few should be the slogan of the war of 1939—!

After the invasion of Russia by Germany, which seems to have been caused by the curious activities of " non-Imperialist " Russia in Poland, Finland and the Baltic States, Mr. Stalin has rather excelled his newfound friends in telling the tale to his unfortunate subjects, who find that the results of Russian Communism are no different from the results of Russian Imperialism. During the winter campaign, the Russian communiques announced nothing but successful advances and the annihilation of millions of Germans. It was certainly a surprise to find at the end of the Russian winter that the Germans were still in occupation of vast Russian areas, still holding every large town taken in the summer advance of 1941 with the exception of Rostov-on-Don. Certainly an Englishman would be astonished if the leaders of England declared that the British forces were uniformly successful if that success were signified by the towns of Birmingham, Lincoln, Bristol, Cardiff and the interlinking territories still remaining in the hands of German invading forces. Yet that is what the propaganda of Mr. Stalin and his colleagues amounts to. It is perhaps a measure of the real intellectual condition of a Russian peasantry and industrial workers after 20 years of so-called Communism that the Russian leaders think such nonsense is excusable.

COLONIAL AFFAIRS

Native Conditions again Exposed in a Further House of Commons Speech

By A. CREECH JONES, M.P.

(Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Labour).

[The following speech was made by our comrade Creech Jones, on the motion for the Second Reading of the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.—Ed.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 4th August, 1942.

Mr. Creech Jones (Shipley): The American Ambassador remarked the other day that a survey of American public opinion showed that there was a greater divergence of view on British Colonial policy than on any other subject dividing the two nations. If that misunderstanding exists in the United States there is also in our own country and in this House a great deal of misunderstanding in regard to our Colonial policy. I therefore make no apology for asking the House to give again to-day some little attention to our Colonial responsibilities. The broad outline of Government policy was given to the House by my right hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for the Colonies in the Debate a few weeks ago on the Colonial Estimates. My purpose to-day is to draw attention to a number of special problems which have occurred during the Session and which have given rise to some misgiving and doubt.

I wish I had found at the Colonial Office the open door to which the Under-Secretary referred in the last Debate. As far as I, personally, am concerned, I usually get a very sympathetic hearing at the front door, but there seem to be many inner doors. Everybody behaves with great charm and everyone treats me very nicely. I am not likely, however, to find myself on the floor through falling into space as suggested by the Under-Secretary but because of the existence of unforeseen inner doors which most effectively block any resolute action.

Let me say something first, about the war effort. My criticism has been directed on a number of occasions in the past to the fact that the Colonial peoples are not always able to contribute to the war effort according to their capacity or their wishes. The Under-Secretary recently told us of the contributions being mobilised by the Colonies for the war effort. He said that the Colonial Office were stimulating exports of the minerals and raw materials we needed and that we were creating export machinery for that purpose. The Colonial peoples were growing more food and developing their own resources more and more, which, he said, was good in war or in peace because these factors contributed to health, nutrition, soil conservation, and so on. Further, local industries were being stimulated; and imports were being limited by Government bulk purchase of goods. All of us would agree that most of these things are of permanent value in Colonial life, but I would add one or two reservations about this policy.

Industrialisation and the exploitation of minerals and other natural wealth in our Colonial Empire should be very carefully controlled and developed with an eye on future policy and the consequences when the war is over, because such exploitation of mineral and natural wealth has a profoundly disturbing effect on native life in all its aspects. It is also important that in planning Colonial economy to keep an eye on maintaining some sort of balance in Colonial economies. In any case, it seems to me that when the Government opens out new resources and grants new concessions steps should be taken to see that definite conditions are laid down with respect to wages, conditions of employment, welfare conditions, profits, royalties, the application of I.L.O. Convention and, sometimes, the ultimate ownership of the resources concerned. It is also important in the second place, that in creating machinery for the control of exports and imports monopolists should not be strengthened. In some of our Colonies their insinuating influence is pretty strong. Already certain steps which have been taken by the Colonial Office have created some apprehension among merchants and others both here and in West Africa and other colonies. No steps should strengthen existing monopolies. Further, if we are promoting local industries, I ask that the Government should do it through local native enterprise on co-operative lines if possible, and that there should be the maximum of co-operation within the framework of an ordered plan. I hope that certain proposals which are being considered at the moment inside the Colonial Office in regard to West Africa will receive the endorsement of the Government.

In regard to raw materials and products, I hope the Colonial Office will give every encouragement to co-operative production, will encourage co-operative marketing and credit, and take steps to ensure much more rationalism in the handling of products before they reach consumers. Above all, there is very real need that producers should be given a guaranteed price. That applies to the small native producers as much as to the larger concerns. There should be some stability in regard to price, and the small peasant producer should be shown some way out of his chronic poverty which often means serfdom to him. The Government should take all the necessary steps to ensure a price which will give a reasonable standard of living to prime producers engaged in meeting the world's needs. Before I leave this side of my argument I need scarcely add, as being fundamental, that I hope that nowhere will the Colonial Office, or those responsible, permit native land to be further alienated or allow individual land ownership to be introduced.

I recognise that it will be one of the problems after the war, in applying the trade and economic freedoms of the Atlantic Charter, to reconcile the reasonable claims of the Colonies with the kind of economically regulated world which we hope to create. We shall want new Colonial industrial enterprises to get on their own feet, we shall want no unreasonable restrictions in respect of their goods and products and the markets therefor. The Colonies economically need a fair chance, yet they have to be integrated into a larger economic order.

In passing, may I also say that from time to time I receive complaints and read complaints that local Colonial Governments do not go fast enough or show enough drive in regard to the war effort. Sometimes the people are not actively associated with the effort. I suggest that this state of things ought to be remedied. It is not only true on the economic side, it is a criticism made by the Colonial peoples in respect of their defence — civil defence, military organisation and the rest of it, and repeatedly voiced in West Indian and West African newspapers. I do not refer to Palestine because I understand that later this week we shall be discussing the special problem of the Jews. There is one observation, however, which it is necessary to make in respect to this war effort. The Colonial territories, because they are apt to be regarded as Imperial possessions, as material possessions, are being exploited to the full. We are using or proceeding to use their limited mineral resources; we are using their manhood, and profoundly upsetting their native life. The Under-Secretary remarked in a recent broadcast on the generosity of the Colonial peoples, which I am sure we all gratefully acknowledge. But, after all, the Colonies, if I may use his words in the last Debate, are not his "goodly heritage." They are the territories of the Colonial peoples, and these people have views and wishes. There is room in regard to all economic and social development for much more consultation with them and their permission obtained for what the Imperial power itself does. I want to stress that the corollary of this considerable contribution from the Colonial peoples to our present struggle for freedom and civilisation is our responsibility for bringing them more rapidly to political maturity and social and economic prosperity. They were excluded by the Prime Minister, from the proposals of the Atlantic Charter, though the recent speech by Mr. Sumner Welles for America does not seem to make that discrimination.

The other night my right hon. Friend reminded us that many soldiers from the Colonies were playing an active part in this war and he told us that they would in due course return to their homes. They will have travelled. They will have gathered a pretty wide experience, and some will have had the advantages of education. We have to remember that these soldiers will be a most stimulating element in Colonial life after the war. Because of those facts, I suggest that in the West Indies, as in West Africa, we should be a little more concerned about preventing the frustration experienced by these people to-day. We should seek to secure their fullest co-operation. As the recommendation of the West Indies Royal Commission put it. "the Governments should adopt a much more positive policy in bringing their point of view before the mass of the people and in explaining in much more simple terms the reasons which lie behind their decisions on major problems." That point has been raised also in regard to the Colonial Development and Welfare Act. Schemes are in active discussion in the respective Colonies, but too often the people vitally concerned are brought into consultation at all. It is one of the complaints of West Africans over here that there is far too little consultation and far too much patronising, too much of doing good to the people, instead of inviting them to use their brains and to co-operate in the changes which we think desirable.

I would further suggest that steps should be taken now to make some progress in political institutions. I have been a little apprehensive at recent developments in the Continent of Africa, particularly in Kenya and Northern Rhodesia. For the purposes of the war we have been obliged to set up new authorities, executive authorities, with powers in regard to economic mobilisation. At the same time, so far as the Legislative Council and the Executive Councils of both territories are concerned, there has been no recognition that the black people live in an overwhelming majority in these territories. I have said before that it is not that there are no educated black people. There are, and some of them are experienced. If you create new authorities—which may be of some importance in the future constitutional developments of those territories — it seems reasonable to ask that, in regard to existing constitutional machinery, there shall be more representation from the great masses of the black people in those areas.

Likewise, there is a strong tendency for the colour bar to increase its strength in Northern Rhodesia at the present time. I hope the Government are watching that situation with very great care and that some action can be taken in Northern Rhodesia at the earliest possible moment to check this very unhappy and very unfair development. It is also desirable that we should look again at the constitutional arrangements in West Africa, to see whether we cannot make indirect rule a little more flexible than it is, and whether we cannot immediately take some steps in regard to what the West Africans themselves have been demanding for a long period, some fundamental reform in municipal government. I see no reason for prolonged delay.

While I am dealing with certain difficulties in our Colonial policy I might mention the clamour for constitutional reform in Mauritius and in the West Indies. I received a vague promise from the Colonial Office a year or so before the war that constitutional reform in Mauritius would receive the serious consideration of the Department. The great mass of the workers in that Colony still clamour for political expression in the local legislative council, but nothing is done, although all other interests can be expressed and a place found for them. That situation has become intolerable. In regard to the West Indies, why this very slow progress? The Colonial Office sometimes shelter themselves behind the terms of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, but let me point out that since the issue of the report—which we have not been privileged to see, although I do not understand why it should not now be published — vast changes have occurred in the world. There has been the impact of war on those Colonies. These people have shown considerable desire to play a larger part, not only in the war, but in their own local affairs. The war has gone right into the Caribbean sea. America has, with our permission, established bases in a number of these Colonies. Therefore, the people feel that if defence is in the hands of America and if much of their economic future will be tied up with American organisation, it is important that they should, at least, have some effective control in regard to their local affairs.

Why, therefore, do we dilly-dally so long in respect of representative government and of moves towards more responsible government? The people themselves are clamouring for change. It is not good enough to say, "There is a Franchise Commission working in Trinidad and another in British Guiana." The Royal Commission said that more and not less participation by the people in the work of Government was a real necessity for lasting social advancement. I would urge that it is important to press on with constitution-making in the West Indies, even to permit the beginnings of responsible government, and, in the case of most of the Colonies, of real representative government. May I also draw attention to our continued failure to do very much in regard to the constitution of Bermuda, Barbados and the Bahamas? Labour difficulties are arising — the failure to adopt I.L.O. Convention is a case in point. There are intolerable labour conditions. Yet, we have no authority over the governments of those three Colonies, though it has long been obvious to everyone that the archaic constitutions should be drastically remodelled.

While dealing with political change may I make some reference to the position of civil liberty in certain parts of our Colonial areas? What is the answer, I ask the Under-Secretary of State, to the continued detention of Domingo in Jamaica? What has Domingo done? Is there any reason that he should be under lock and key merely at the pleasure of the Governor, while no evidence exists, certainly to the outside world, why his detention has been allowed to last so long? Let me refer also to Wallace Johnson. This man was taken possession of by the authorities before the war was actually declared. Some excuse was found; he went through a process of criminal prosecution. Almost before he left prison he was put under detention again, and then, because of the clamour, he was released, but not unconditionally. He is conditionally released, and the most wretched arrangements are made as to the conditions under which he shall live. Unreasonable conditions are imposed upon him in regard to his living. I do not understand why, because a man has allied himself with working-class societies, oecause he is a trade union leader, these onerous conditions should continue to operate in his case. Again, is there now any reason why the leaders of the Kikiyu Central Association and other kindred organisations should continue in detention? Why should so many of the natural leaders of the people of Kenya continue to be withdrawn from them?

Finally, on the question of civil liberty, I want to refer to the operation of the Defence Regulations in the West Indies. Have those Defence Regulations been brought into line with the Defence Regulations in this country? Certainly they were in Jamaica as a result of pressure. But for several years many people have been detained in the Colonies for no adequate reason, and all our efforts to obtain from the Colonial Office an explanation of why these people are detained have been completely unavailing. I have just received from Jamaica a telegram telling me that three or four persons whom I have been trying to yet released for considerably over a year have been released at last. But what was the purpose of their detention? They were simply swept into detention and it was nobody's concern to see that justice was done.

AIR RAID HORRORS: MUST THEY CONTINUE

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The recent speeches by Hitler and Goering contained two points of special interest.

The first was the confident assertion that Germany's economic problem has been solved and from now onward a rising standard of living may be expected in Germany and also in Europe.

This announcement may have caused surprise to those who anticipate that the war will end soon with Germany in a starving and disorganised condition. The statement calls for consideration and enquiry, as to the nature of Germany's financial system and business efficiency. Is its financial system sensible? As a result of conquests or alliances in Eastern Europe, given access to agricultural wealth and rich stores of minerals, is it reasonable to conclude that a steady rise in Germany's economic prosperity must result?

If Germany's gains in Russia are held, will the economic position of the Axis, on the whole, be stronger than that of the Allies? Are the Axis, indeed, now favourably situated for a long war?

The other matter of special interest in Hitler's and Goering's speeches was the grim threat that, as soon as Russian resistance should be broken, there would be devastating reprisals for our air attacks on the civilian population of Germany.

Those who are disposed to go into hysterics over what they regard as fresh evidence of the brutality of the Hun would do well to remember that, as far as the conflict between ourselves and Germany is concerned, it was we who started night air-raids and persisted in them in spite of Hitler's plain warning that there whould be reprisals if we did not abandon this particularly loathsome and to some extent unnecessary feature of the present conflict. Not only did we start night air-raids on civilian centres, but we also restarted them last spring at a time when the baby-killing competition seemed to have died down and one began to hope might be allowed to remain in abeyance for the rest of the war.

Nocturnal air-raids are, as I said in my last speech in the House of Lords, the last refuge of a strategic bankrupt. They have been condemned as a waste of men, planes and petrol even by the experts on war strategy who have not been concerned with the humanitarian side of the question at all. They appear, however, to be approved of by the Prime Minister, one of whose favourite maxims seems to be, "If you cannot do anything sensible, always do something silly rather than do nothing at all." A disaster, if the B.B.C. and the Press are sufficienty mendacious and inventive, can always be presented as a victory, or at any rate as an invaluable means of gaining information. Mere inaction, however, has no propaganda possibilities!

Sir Ernest Gowers, Senior London Regional Commissioner (who seems to have a house in Hampshire) is reported to have said that we face the prospects of air-raids which will make April 16, 1941, and May 10, 1941, "mere picnics." Jolly, isn't it, especially as there is such a lot to look forward to after the picnics are over!

Intelligent people of my acquaintance seem, indeed, to fear that it may be the Government's policy to send all troops out of the country; garrison Britain entirely with American troops whose homes are on the safe side of the Atlantic and who may be more reliable if restive civilians should need "firm" treatment; and turn these islands into an air base for a bombing contest with Germany, regardless of what our people may have to suffer.

If such a programme does not appeal to British citizens, they would do well to inform their M.P.s of the fact, in adequate numbers and also in time. Even the most satisfying punishment of war criminals will not bring the dead back to life and it will be discouraging for a British soldier to learn that his wife and family have perished miserably in an air-raid, what time he is engaged in "smashing Hitlerism" in far-off India by shooting tiresome natives who will imagine that they, as well as Poles and Czechs, have a right to freedom from alien tyranny!

A woman whose daughter died recently from a virulent form of tuberculosis which, owing to war conditions, is now rapidly on the increase among children and young people, received a letter of condolence. She replied that she was glad that her daughter was dead. Her son was in the Air Force and she would soon lose him (she did). She wished that her two remaining daughters were dead, also, as they would then escape what she felt lay in front of us.

A little boy who had had no undue amount of experience of air-raids and was then living in a quiet district, was being examined by a doctor for some minor ailment. Suddenly he went deadly pale and his pulse began to race. Afterwards the doctor asked the boy's mother what had happened for he felt confident that nothing had been done to alarm the child. "Oh," replied the mother, "There was an aeroplane over. Didn't you hear it?"

Another little boy who had been in a badly blitzed area, but who has now also been moved to a safer place, is abnormally quiet and spiritless. He has sensible parents who, when they were living in the town, took pains to speak of the nightly visit to the air-raid shelter as a nuisance and not as a cause for alarm. The boy had two playmates of his own age, the girl's name being Margaret. One night Margaret and her brother were blown to bits and the other boy's parents did their best to keep the news from their son. A few days later the family were returning home after a night in which a raid had occurred. There was an object lying on the doorstep; the boy picked it up; then dropped it with a shriek. The mother, making an effort to cope with the situation as best she could, said, "It's only a bit of pork the butcher has dropped!" "No, Mummy," was the reply, "It had fingers on it like Margaret's."

The above are true stories told me recently by members of the medical or nursing profession from their own personal experience. They are also straws in the wind and a red light for those whose heads are not of wood and whose hearts are not of stone.

There is quite good reason to suppose that a mutual agreement to confine air attacks as far as possible to military objectives and to

FATHER AND SON

WHEN THE WAR ENDS

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT.
(First Commissioner of Works, 1924 Labour Government.)

[The following essay by our comrade Jowett is reprinted from the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, January 22, 1943.—Ed.

The war will end some time and whenever it ends there will be problems to face and to solve which will be infinitely more difficult to deal with if preparations for dealing with them have not been made beforehand.

At the centre, and in the key position in relation to all these after-war problems, there will be that of unemployment which it will be impossible to solve if we do not recognise at long last that we are living in a machine age.

Indeed, we in this country are living in a machine age at a time when we no longer have the advantage we held before the last world-war of a competitive lead as the first comer into the machine age. Failing to recognise that the competitive advantage of this lead could only be temporary, British parliaments of pre-1914 generations made no effort to maintain a safe balance between production for home consumption and the large-scale production which machinery made possible for export. A neglected and rapidly declining agricultural industry has been the most outstanding penalty for this disastrous national policy.

This fact was clearly revealed by experience in the last world war—experience which is being repeated in this war, but on a far larger scale.

British exports were higher in 1913 than they had ever been, but they slumped tremendously after the last war with no sign of recovery when this war began. Cotton goods, Britain's leading exporting industry, for example, which exported over 7000 million yards in 1913, exported less than 1500 millions in 1938. During the first world war countries unable to obtain British cotton goods had developed their own cotton industries, and in some cases had become successful competitors for foreign trade.

All exporting industries suffered grievously through loss of markets during the last war, whilst, at the same time, under war conditions machinery was being improved, new machines invented, and every possible device applied for saving labour in production and transport of goods and services. With far greater intensity during this war all these labour-saving devices have been put into operation.

Furthermore, unless it becomes possible for American and British capitalist financial interests to destroy (by means of a dictated peace and an army of occupation to enforce its provisions) the trading organisation which Germany has already established over a large part of Europe, British continental export trade will be severely limited, and in some previously British-controlled markets, completely destroyed.

There are European countries which are finding markets for their agricultural and dairy produce now at their doorsteps which previously they had to seek at the far ends of the earth. As Wilfred Wellock correctly stated in the I.L.P.'s monthly journal, "Left", of last March, concerning transactions conducted through this new form of trading:—

"No cash is used" (or paper credit borrowed) "balances are struck periodically in order to see which countries have credit and which have debit balances."

It is this new system of foreign trading that was destroying British export trade in countries of eastern Europe before the war, and was, in fact one of the main causes of the war; and I doubt whether it could be replaced even if Allied armies dictated terms of peace in Berlin.

And yet, notwithstanding all the evidence founded on past experience which points inexorably to even further drastic reductions in British exports, after-war development of British export trade is being advocated officially by Government spokesmen and unofficially in many quarters as one thing which can be done to increase employment when the war ends!

Now it appears clear to me that only those who vainly expect return to pre-war world conditions with the bankers' credit trading system prevailing everywhere and consequent wars and preparations for wars, can possibly believe that there will be more and not fewer workers employed in producing for export trade when the war ends.

Therefore, it appears equally clear to me that whether one thinks of the immediately succeeding after-war years as leading to a new Socialist State or Commonwealth or not, the first thing to be done in preparation for dealing with after-war problems is to ascertain to what extent we need imports and to what extent we are able to supply goods and services to exchange for what we need.

There may be, say, five millions of workers in the Forces, and, say, ten millions of workers employed producing munitions for the Forces. These are being maintained now, together with the rest of the population; and although we are receiving from the United States far more than we should have goods and services available to exchange for them even if our own resources were developed to the absolute limit, yet by far the largest portion of what we are receiving, indeed the bulk of what is coming unbalanced by exports, is for munitions for destruction by war and not for consumption and re-organisation in conditions which only ought to be tolerated after the war.

In this connection it will be well for us to recognise that it is possible to learn even from the economic system that the hateful Nazi German Government has adopted, although that system has been applied to the evil purpose of war.

Here is an account of it as described in two speeches of the German Chancellor on 30th January, 1937, and 30th January, 1939 (quoted in Peace News, 11th September, 1942):—

"The will to place the economic system at the service of the people, and capital (money) at the service of economics, is the only thing that is of decisive importance. . . . The folk-community does not exist on the fictitious value of money, but on the results of productive labour, which is what gives money its value."

"In the second speech he pointed out that prices were stabilised as well as wages, and that the seven million unemployed were put to work and the extra money needed to pay them was created, the product of the work giving the extra money its value. As more goods were produced more money was issued; in short an automatic balance was established between production and purchasing power (money). Stabilised prices rendered 'inflation' impossible."

There are, as I see it, three alternatives before this country after the war. The first is a complete and drastic social and economic revolution

THE CURE

BY THE REV. R. H. LE MESSURIER, B.A.
(Vicar of Holy Cross in St. Pancras, London).

Oliver was sick, violently, disgustingly sick.

"Wot's up, mate?" demanded the thin-faced, thin-lipped Rube Allcop, his Cockney friend.

"Er—I don't know. . . . I . . ."

"I gets yer mate. It's these 'ere bloody stiff 'uns. I wuz the sime the first time I sor 'em too. But ye soon gits used ter it."

Oliver's stomach gave another heave. He was empty by now, but this only made things worse, not better. The retching still went on, and he doubted if he'd ever get used to it.

He'd got used to the desert, with its gamut of alternating cold and heat. He hardly noticed the sand by now, though it got into everything—his nose, his eyes, his mouth, his food. There was no escape from it. So he'd gritted his teeth—literally—and by now didn't notice it much, except of course in the frequent dust-storms which swept over the Libyan desert. Then the only thing to do was to get under any available cover and wait till they passed.

He'd got used to the flies and the bad food. In fact, most of his meals were a mixture of the two, plus a liberal helping of sand. And Oliver Sanders, so finical at home, could hardly remember the time when he ate from a clean plate at a spotlessly covered table.

But this was different. They'd been in action several days now, and Oliver's crowd spent most of their time burying corpses—their own pals sometimes, but mostly the "Eyeties" whose positions the Blankshires had systematically infiltrated and stormed. Great, bloated corpses they were, with gaping, blood-crusted wounds. Bits of brain, strings of queerly coloured guts, detached limbs—no, Oliver couldn't get over the violent nausea which always attacked him whenever he was "detailed" for this job.

He wished he wasn't so sensitive. How he longed to be like Rube, who didn't bat an eyelid, no matter how gruesome or disgusting the job was.

Rube was a queer little Cockney. He was coarse and foul-mouthed. He'd been in action in the International Brigade in Spain. He'd knocked about in all sorts of queer places before he seemed to find a peculiar vocation in fighting. Tough, wiry, with a perpetual leer on his drawn face, Rube was a holy terror when it came to action. At other times he was crude. He drank enough for ten, yet never seemed to get really drunk. He spent every available minute stalking women, trying to get them on the cheap. But if he couldn't, well, he'd pay up. Women were indispensible to him now. He been in hospital twice, too . . .

Yet Oliver liked Rube. They had somehow developed one of those queer, military friendships which just happen in wartime. They had nothing in common, really, unless it was their business of learning to kill for their country. Their friendship was the attraction of opposites. Rube was short and thin: Oliver tall and hefty. The Cockney was deep and cunning: the Bristol man open and frank. Above all, Allcop was irreligious and even blasphemous: Oliver Fordham religious and in his own way devout. That was, of course, in the old days before the war. Now, well, he wasn't quite . . .

Oliver felt he wasn't cut out to be a soldier. But, like many of his kind, he just had to put up with things. He had been called up, left his librarian's job, and now was just one of the boys with a number. He had made himself get used to the bayonet-training. Forced himself to plunge his bayonet into the straw-filled "dummies" on the assault-course, and even compelled himself to listen to the literally bloody stories of men who had been in action.

But he couldn't get used to burying corpses, though he'd been at it four days now. It was always the same. As soon as he began his ghastly work, his stomach seemed to turn inside out. And the process, once started, continued for hours after the job was done.

"Trouble with you, mate," went on the little Cockney, "Ye've never done one of 'em in. You wite till ye've 'ad a real go at one of 'em. Ye'll feel different then."

Oliver was engaged at the moment in helping to lift a corpse with a huge, putrefying abdominal wound, and Rube's coarse remarks only added to his misery.

"Shut up, do," he hissed between his teeth, trying once more to stop the awful retching.

"Orlright. Orlright, chum. Keep yer 'air on. I wuz only tryin' ter 'elp yer. But ye kin tike me word. When ye've 'ad a reel go at 'em, ye'll be better. That'll cure ye of bein' sick."

That night Oliver couldn't sleep. He could not get his mind away from the corpses. They might be enemies, but somehow or other he thought of their families, especially their women. They'd soon be mourning the death of their men, and it was just as well that the mothers and wives didn't see what their boys looked like when the desert sand received their bodies.

He fell asleep at last, only to dream of more bloody horrors. Yet in his dreams he was fighting mad and did things which as yet he would never have done in the waking state.

All his nausea disappeared in sleep.

An hour before dawn they were called. A patrol was ordered out to take an Italian machine-gun position not far away.

"That's more like it," said Rube Allcop cheerfully. "I don't mind makin' a few more ruddy stiff-'uns. This time someone else kin dig 'em in."

Oliver felt strangely cool as the ten men half-crawled, half-ran, over the cold, black desert. Everything went like clockwork. It seemed almost like "night-ops" in England. He could scarcely think it was the real thing at last.

"Stick close ter me," Rube hissed in Oliver's ear, as they gathered themselves for their final run, and the sergeant gave his last whispered instructions.

"Scatter out a bit, but keep me in sight. As soon as it's light enough to see the M.G. post, I'll blow my whistle. Lob your bombs over. Wait till they've gone off. Then dash in."

"I 'ope the ruddy Millses leave somethun' for the knife," whispered Rube plaintively.

Oliver wasn't so sure. He wasn't afraid. But he'd rather wipe out the Italians with bombs than have to do the work with the bayonet. For a long time he lay still, waiting for something to happen.

Suddenly the desert turned grey, then a strange lilac. Dawn was coming up fast. Oliver peered in front of him. A little quiver was now running throughout the entire length of his body. When it was light enough he saw a few shapeless mounds of sand about thirty yards in front. It was the machine-gun nest. Nobody stirred in it. Only an occasional boom of a distant gun broke the stillness.

The sergeant's whistle. Oliver heaved himself up, pulled out the pin of his Mills bomb. Threw it. Then buried himself again in the sand.

The bombs burst with a staccato pattern of sound. Oliver jumped up and followed Rube, who was racing for the post, yelling like a man possessed.

Tut-tut-tut-tut. One gun was still manned. Out of the corner of his eye Oliver saw three men fall on his right.

A short trench—merely a square hole in the ground—yawned in front of him. Rube jumped in Oliver followed. Except for two dead men, the hole was empty, and the machine-gun pointed drunkenly skywards. Right and left, from other holes, came sounds of fighting, and a few shots. Then silence.

"'Ere," shouted Rube suddenly, pointing with one hand. "Chuck a Mills dahn there, quick."

Oliver looked. Saw the entrance to a dug-out. Threw down a bomb. And darted away from the opening as the bomb exploded underground. There was a scream, cut off suddenly in the middle.

"That's got 'em orlright," Rube shouted gaily.

All at once Oliver saw an Italian crawl up from the dug-out. The main force of the explosion must have missed him. But he was a ghastly sight. His head and hands were covered with blood. He could hardly stand. But at length he propped himself against the trench wall and feebly raised his hands.

"No shoota," he said with a whine.

Rube's bayonet was within six inches of the Italian's throat. The wretched man's eyes were protruding from his head through fear. Suddenly Rube laughed harshly. He lowered his rifle.

"'Ere," he said through the side of his lips to Oliver, "'Ere, 'ave a dip."

"What do you mean?" asked Oliver.

"Go on. Plug 'im in the guts."

"Oh! I can't do that. He's surrendered."

"Christ almighty! Wot's that got ter do with it? Our orders wuz to wipe 'em aht, wuzn't they?"

"Yes, but . . ."

"Go on, ye bloody fool. 'Oos ter know? He's near dead, anyways. Go on. Give 'im one quick, afore anyone comes."

"But . . . I . . ."

"Don't be so cissy. He'd do it ter you if 'e 'ad the charnst. Go on. Do 'im in. It'll cure your sickness, too. Go on, d'ye 'ear?"

Half in a dream, Oliver moved forward. The Italian whimpered . . . The whites of his eyes showed. He plucked at Oliver's bayonet . . . screamed.

In . . . twist . . . out.

"Bloody good work, mate," chuckled Rube.

HUMILIATION WITH HONOUR.

Vera Brittain's new book "Humiliation with Honour" (3/6, Andrew Dakers Ltd., 42 Great Russell Street, London, W.C.1) is one of the finest things written during this war on the spirit in which Christian Pacifists should meet the trials and temptations of a time of martyrdom and crisis. It also contains powerful exposures of the moral degradation that war brings 18B CASES.

"In search of Justice" by Henry St. George (18B Publicity Council, 15 Woburn Square, London, W.C., price 6d.) is an excellent exposure of the notorious Defence Regulations, which should be read by every freedom-loving man and woman. Some of the examples of injustice and ill-treatment are enough to make one's blood boil, particularly the case of a woman and her two tiny children. From this case alone it is evident that one does not have to go as far as Germany to find "war criminals." The wonderful organisation which, we are told, is being set up to deal with these offenders might do worse than try its 'prentice hand on those responsible for the torture inflicted on Mrs. W. E. B. and for the death of her baby, in case the members of the tribunal should be in their graves before any war criminals of foreign nationality were within their reach!

SOMETHING TO LOOK FORWARD TO.

"Something To Look Forward To" by Lady Rhys Williams, Economic Reform Club, 32 Queen's Ave., Muswell Hill, London, N. 10. (No Price). Probably 6d., post free 8d.

Although Lady Rhys Williams can hardly, in the full sense of the term, be described as a monetary reformer and although her ideas need to be combined with monetary reform to give them maximum utility, her booklet, "Something To Look Forward To" is of great interest and value to all who are concerned with problems of demobilization and post-war reconstruction, especially in their early stages. Many of Lady Rhys Williams' suggestions are most practical and thought-provoking and have something in common both with the Social Credit idea of the National Dividend and with the proposals contained in Mr. Marshall Hottirsley's 6d. booklet "Now or Never" (S.C.C.C. Grens House, Swinton, Mexborough), another recent publication well worthy of study by all who are interested in post-war problems. These booklets tempt me, however, once more to remind readers of "The Word" that the longer the war is allowed to drag on, the harder and slower will recovery be, and the more protracted the suffering for many people, even under the most ideal political and economic system. Well may this war-period of spiritual, mental, physical and economic degeneration be termed "those wasted years." I am impatient to end it and begin the reconstruction of something worth while before still more has been destroyed. The Prime Minister is reported to be quite uninterested in post-war reconstruction. I can well believe it; but it is a bad thing for the country that it should be so.

THE RED army.

The recent Moscow celebrations, and the references, for war alliance purposes, in the capitalist press, throughout Britain and the United States, to Stalin as though he were creator of the Red Army are nauseating to those who believe in truth as a pearl beyond all price. Without truth there can be no social order and no progress. Truth alone is harmony. For this reason, as an enemy of discord, we direct every reader who wishes to know the truth about the Red Army and the magnificent work of Trotsky in its organisation, to read the factual record by Enrich Wollenberg, translated from the German by Claud W. Sykes. This work contains a wonderful and most helpful bibliography. It was published in 1938 by Secker and Warburg, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.2.

BOW STREET WORLD.

Inspired by the centre article in last month's "Word," and the references to the Marlborough St. Magistrate, a comrade has lent us "Bow St. World," by Albert Lieck, who was for many years chief clerk at Marlborough St., and subsequently went to Bow St. This work is published by Robert Hale, 102 Gt. Russell Street, London, W.C.1. We believe that it is out of print at the moment. We have read and enjoyed thoroughly this most interesting, thoroughly human, truly philosophic, and well informed work. We are anxious to secure a copy of this work for "keeps" and advise readers to do the same. We would like also to secure the other writings of this able author and would be grateful for an opportunity to buy second-hand copies. "Bow St. World" is a far greater study in sociology than many alleged Socialist writings.

THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT AND ITS CRITICS

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT.
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government).

[The following article by our comrade Jowett is reprinted from the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, 9th October, 1942. We reproduce it because we believe in full and free discussion. We are entirely opposed to Stalin and to the Stalin Government and do not believe the enemies of Stalin are, of necessity, the enemies of Soviet Russia. We are opposed to the Soviet Trials, to suppression of the truth concerning the part played by Trotsky in the Russian Revolution, to the persecution of the Anarchists and the anti-Parliamentarian Bolshevists under Stalin, and even before, under Lenin and Trotsky. We are opposed to Soviet diplomacy and we are opposed to the Stalin-Hitler pact. These facts do not prevent us from entering into complete co-operation with Comrade Jowett in the struggle against war and towards Socialism. We wish our readers to form their own opinions and to follow neither Jowett nor ourself without question. In the interest of truth we print Comrade Jowett's reply to our article and are content to leave the matter there. For our part, there can be no Socialist fellowship with the Stalin Government that, like the Hitler Government, has murdered and tortured Socialists. We have complete Socialist fellowship with the common people of the Soviet Union as with those of Nazi Germany.—Ed.]

What masses of people in all other countries are thinking of Soviet Russia, as that Socialist Sixth of the World goes through its ordeal of blood, tears and sweat for maintenance of its Socialist way of life, is tremendously important for the future of Socialism in the world.

Therefore, statements concerning Soviet Russia which are misleading, either because they are not true or because they tell only part of the truth, ought not to be allowed to go undenied or uncorrected. In my opinion nothing seems so sure as a future effort by British and American financial and big business interests to undermine and if possible to destroy Soviet Russia's Socialism.

When Soviet Russia, weakened economically by its sacrificial resistance to nearly the full weight of the mighty Nazi mechanised armed forces, not only ceases to be of military use to them but in need even of food and raw material, Soviet Russia's capitalist and imperialist enemies will resume their nefarious pre-war activities. Anti-Socialist propaganda, artfully and cunningly devised to discredit Soviet Russia, is then to be expected and what is said in Socialist anti-war publications now will be used in one form or another for anti-Soviet propaganda later.

Consequently, it is my present purpose to comment on one of the statements that have appeared recently which I think are misleading because they do not state the whole truth, or do not give due weight to relevant circumstances which, in fairness to Soviet Russia, should be stated and taken seriously into account as a necessary part of the matter.

I have in mind the statement which appears on the front page of "The Word" for October. It is accompanied by an expression of sympathy for the common people of Russia and condemnation of the German invasion which is quite natural from such a militant anti-war Socialist as is "The Word's" editor, Guy Aldred, but, as a statement of case, it is, in my opinion, incomplete and tends to give force to what may be the most dangerous part of future anti-Soviet propaganda. The statement I refer to I will quote. Here it is:—

> "Whatever may be the deeper social and economic causes of the Second World War, the 1939 Moscow agreement freed Germany for war and so made the present terrible clash inevitable.
> Our sympathy for the common people of the Soviet, our condemnation of the German invasion of the Soviet Union, must not blind us to the criminal folly of a pact that was designed for war, not peace, and was never intended to emancipate the workers of the world from war and oppression."

Now I see two substantial objections to the statement I have quoted appearing at this time, and, unaccompanied by any statement of relevant facts which explain why the Government of Soviet Russia entered into a Pact with Nazi Germany.

One is that it seems to me grievously unfair to the peoples of Russia for Socialists to throw this question of the pact with Germany into public discussion whilst the peoples of Russia are in the agony of a life and death struggle against the mightiest anti-Socialist state in the world.

The other is that without a statement of relevant facts which led Soviet Russia into signing the pact, disastrous as the consequences have been—the statement itself must have the effect of seriously prejudicing the case of Soviet Russia whilst masses of people in every part of the world are being attracted to the Socialism for which Soviet Russia stands by Soviet Russia's Socialist achievements, and, by the unity of its varied peoples in the most terrible trial of endurance in all the world's history.

To get the whole truth about Soviet Russia's pact with Nazi Germany it needs to be stated that it was really a move in the game of power politics in which all the Governments of the great European powers were at the time deeply implicated.

Soviet Russia took part in this international game of power politics under, I believe, the grievously mistaken view that it was the only way by which the security of Soviet Russia, as a Socialist federation of peoples, could be safeguarded.

Previously, as a Member State in the League of Nations, Soviet Russia's representative, Litvinov, had stood alone for years in his continuous efforts to work the policy of international alliances inside the League of Nations (illusively described as "Collective Security") for peace and collective action against aggressive Powers. Not until the policy of so-called "collective security" failed and it had become clearly evident that the Governments of Britain and France were willing to get a temporary peace for themselves with Nazi Germany at the expense of Soviet Russia did Stalin and his colleagues in the Russian Government abandon their efforts for peace by working for it through the "collective security" system.

Chamberlain and Daladier's negotiations with Hitler and Mussolini in 1937 were believed by the Soviet Government to have been to patch up a temporary peace with Hitler for the Western Powers, in return for giving Hitler a free hand to attack Russia. Whatever the real object of these negotiations may have been Soviet Russia was not told, but the events of the following year (after the Franco-British negotiations had failed) gave Soviet Russia every possible reason for being sure that Chamberlain was scheming to get Russia involved in a war with Germany whilst Britain and France made preparations for their own inevitable Imperialist War with Germany.

The Soviet Russian Government's answer, to this Franco-British scheming to involve Russia in war with Germany, was swift, startling, and tragic. It was the pact with Germany. Stalin and his Government went in up to the neck in the morass of power politics. They sought to strenghten Russia's position and safeguard Russia's Socialism by extending Russia's frontiers. They made war on Finland because agreement to remove all Finland's menacing positions was found to be impossible.

It was a mistaken policy—tragically mistaken. All that can be claimed for the policy is that it gained time for Soviet Rusia's preparations for the war with Germany which Stalin and his colleagues knew would have to come, for Hitler's book, "Mein Kampf," had had made that clear for all the world to see.

But although tragically mistaken, the policy and the pact with Germany was the beginning of it, was not "designed" to promote war as "The Word" seems to imply but to keep Socialist Soviet Russia out of an inevitable war between the British and German rival Imperialist States and, to prepare Russia for its own defence, with or without allies, whenever Hitler should decide to strike at Soviet Russia and its Socialism.

Hitler's Nazi Germany has struck. For more than fifteen months the peoples of Russia have been going through an ordeal unequalled in in all history.

Millions of forgotten people in other lands are now with the Socialist peoples of Russia in sympathy and understanding, and the number grows.

It is not for us who are Socialists to provide material for discouraging the growth of Socialist fellowship which is being kindled and fanned into flame by evidence of Soviet Russia's Socialistic achievements and the Soviet people's unity in sacrifice in defending their new way of life. The enemies of Soviet Russia and its Socialism, will do more than enough of that themselves at their own time.

COLONIAL AFFAIRS

Native Conditions again Exposed in a Further House of Commons Speech

BY A. CREECH JONES M.P.

I want now to refer to a number of economic difficulties. Most hon. Members on these Benches are conscious, from correspondence and messages reaching them from the Colonies that the cost of living is rising, that wages do not keep pace with the increase in the cost of living, and that conditions in many areas are now becoming almost intolerable—so intolerable that in a number of Colonies, in spite of their patriotic zeal to support the war effort, the working people are threatening strikes. It is no good saying that the Essential Work Order is a satisfactory expedient for meeting a situation of this kind. You cannot fob off the working people with the idea that in the course of time a report will be made on the cost of living and something may be done about their wages. I put it to my right hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State that if the Essential Work Order is made operative, there should be, at any rate, definite guarantees in respect of conditions of employment, that if the strike weapon is withdrawn from these men, other means should be open to them for the purpose of securing proper adjustments in their standards. This situation in regard to the lowering of the standard of living as a result of the war situation is a condition that is prevalent in West Africa and the West Indies. I have just received a telegram from Ceylon pleading that I make representations with the Colonial Office on this very matter. In view of this feeling, I ask that the local Governments should make some effort to adjust what has become an almost intolerable situation. It is not enough to say that these people must make some sacrifice for the war effort.

The second point of an economic nature that I want to raise is forced labour. I shall not discuss the problem of forced labour, but I want to make one or two observations to my right hon. Friend concerning the application of this policy. Why is it that permission to apply this policy is so readily given from London without substantial facts being produced as to the necessity for it? The latest Colony in which this policy has been operated is Northern Nigeria. Why? There is a great surplus of labour there. Would it not be possible for the Colonial Office, in such a case, to say to the Colony, "Why are you not able to recruit that labour? Have you made absolutely certain that there are reasonable conditions in the industries concerned and that they are sufficiently attractive to the labour that is available?" Why is it that permission is given without the most stringent safeguards being made in respect of the new labour to be caught up in the industries concerned? Why, in Northern Nigeria, are there no labour inspectors? All that is done is to send up an administrative officer who, probably as part of his other duties, looks after the new situation created in the tin mines. Are the Minimum Wage Regulations being operated or is it simply said, as the Under-Secretary said in reply to a Question the other day, "Yes, we will see that local wage rates are operated"? I suggest that that is not good enough. To what degree is the Minimum Wage Convention, to which we are a party, being operated? How far-reaching is this minimum wage legislation? Those are some of the questions to which I would like to receive an answer.

I said the other day, in a Supplementary Question, that there was reason to doubt whether, under the Forced Labour Convention, the policy of the Government could be justified. I am supported in my view by so distinguished an authority as Lord Lugard, who said that he was at the Permanent Mandates Commission when the Forced Labour Convention was being made and his recollection was that when they thought of exclusions, they were thinking of exclusions in respect of war, but they had not in mind that the exclusion would cover working for private profit. That is precisely the position now—that we are engaged in industrial conscription in private employment out of which a profit can be made. Moreover, as far as Northern Nigeria is concerned, I want to ask the Under-Secretary whether any steps are being taken about the royalties that are being paid to the Nigerian company which has an interest in this matter. It gets at least half the royalties in respect of the exploitation of minerals. Is it going to surrender, in respect of the new wealth got out of Nigeria, its full share of royalties under some taxation legislation? Finally, what steps are being taken to safeguard the local native economy while the men are withdrawn? There are other questions which occur to me in regard to the Northern Nigerian situation. What are the terms and periods of employment? How long are these people to be away from their homes? We have not seen the Regulations and we know nothing about the conditions; all we know is that somebody in Northern Nigeria put it to the Colonial Office that what had happened in Kenya should apply in the Northern Nigerian tin mines, and without saying what safeguards or conditions there should be, permission was given. That sort of thing ought to stop. It has happened not only in Northern Nigeria, but it is now happening in Southern Rhodesia, and the Southern Rhodesian Government use the excuse that as the policy of forced labour is spreading in Africa they see no special reason why it should not be applicable in their own territory.

The third economic problem that I want to mention is the situation in the West Indies. I should like to know more about how the Government are facing the alarming situation that is developing economically in the West Indies. Before long the workers who have been employed on the American bases will be returning to their homes. In some places, as an hon. Friend reminds me, work is finishing now, and there will be a most grave unemployment situation. In certain Colonies there is already a very great problem of surplus population. Consequently, the economic situation will become very bad indeed. At the same time, the cost of living is rising. There are shipping difficulties. We have not mobilised the production of food to anything like a sufficient degree to meet the needs of this population of nearly 3,000,000, and so far as rice is concerned, although the Under-Secretary said that certain things had been done, I doubt if they are adequate to feed the populations of our own territories. I put it that we are face to face with a very grave situation which calls for the gravest attention from the Government at the present moment. It is quite true there has been an Anglo-American Commission, and presumably it has reported. The American Ambassador made a speech the other day about it. As far as I know, we have not had a report here. Presumably, there are steps to be taken in regard to the control of prices, to the rationing of goods, to increasing local production, organising shipping and the rest, but I am very apprehensive, and I would like to koow more of the Government's economic policy in this respect.

Then there is the problem of social distress. We have had for the last two years the Colonial Development and Welfare Act. We were told the other day that no fewer than 83 schemes in a dozen categories had been endorsed though the expenditure indicated by my right hon. Friend is not quite in harmony with other information given to this House a little while back. The figure of £800,000 under the Colonial Department and Welfare Act was mentioned as against £250,000 in the return for 30th June. I am open to correction on that point.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Harold Macmillan): I would like to have these figures correct. Is the hon. Member giving the figure of money voted or that of money spent?

Mr. Creech Jones: I am givin the figures set out in the return.

Mr. Macmillan: I am accused, as I understand it, of having made a false return. The mistake I think the hon. Member is making is that one figure is the cost of schemes approved, and the other figure, which I gave the other day, is that of money actually spent. As the hon. Member will appreciate, there is a time lag between the two.

Mr. Creech Jones: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon if I have made a mistake. I was under the impression that the return to 30th June was of moneys paid, which was a sum of £250,000, whereas in another place I have seen that, under the Act, public schemes amounted to £800,000. I found it difficult to reconcile the two figures. The point I desire to make to my right hon. Friend is that in this House we are very much at a loss in arriving at any real comprehension of the meaning of the figures so far given. When for instance the 83 schemes in the West Indies are broken up into a dozen categories we do not know the relation of these individual schemes to any broad policy of social and economic development. It is on that sort of thing we would like to be informed by a report, so that we could get a more intelligent and comprehensive view of how the Colonial Development and Welfare Act is working.

I appreciate that, fundamentally, all this talk about social development is economic but I put it to the House that the resources of the Colonies are their own. We have acknowledged the paramountcy of their interests, yet on us falls the responsibility of rapidly creating the conditions under which the people can stand on their feet, of associating them with other areas for economic and political needs, and of moving on to their de-colonisation both in status and in stature.

I should have liked to have spoken about Colonial administration—the machine at the Colonial Office, and the general administrative machine in the Colonies. As regards the former, may I suggest to my right hon. Friend that the Colonial Office might open its doors a little more widely to its own people when they visit London from their post overseas? There is room for a little more consultation. Sometimes Departments might call for reports, might get the "low down" from some of the junior officials who have been engaged in Colonial administration. Sometimes the Colonial Office might give them a warmer welcome for their views and ideas, than they have been accustomed to give up to now. The second point I make in regard to Colonial administration is this. I want to see more Africans and others brought into the administration of their own territories, but I would ask that the more imaginative, more go-ahead members of the European administrative staffs should have greater opportunities than are now permitted to them. We do not want a Colonial service made up of men who are continuously playing for safety. It would help sometimes if we could bring in on the secretariats some men who have had experience in the districts, out in the field, and who are facing problems in an imaginative and fresh way. I hope that that side of the administrative work will not be disregarded.

I hope finally that my former request to the Colonial Secretary will be given some attention. If it is the aim of the Government to work out its policy on the lines of past declarations, I hope we may be informed what these declarations are, and that we may get a White Paper on them. I hope also that a greater interest in Colonial problems will be engendered in this House by the creation of some suitable machinery for considering Colonial policy. The time is long overdue for some joint Parliamentary Committee for this purpose. I hope that in this House, with our great responsibilities, going forward as we are into a new world where increasing demands will be made on us, we may have the facilities, the machinery and the opportunity of dealing with Colonial problems with understanding. Nothing can contribute more to that end than the creation of proper Parliamentary machinery.

Towards the conclusion of the debate, a breeze occurred between Mr. MacMillan, the present Under-Secretary for the Colonies, and our comrade Creech Jones.

Creech Jones pressed to know what was the period of native conscription and if conscription was confined to particular tribesmen.

At another stage, the Under-Secretary said:—

My hon. Friend the Member for Shipley made, not exactly an accusation, but an innuendo that there was a statement going around that in some way or other the Colonial Office had got mixed up with monopolies in West Africa and was increasing the powers of monopoly traders.

Mr. Creech Jones: I should like the Under-Secretary to quote me correctly. I made no such innuendo or suggestion. I merely asked the Colonial Office not to strengthen monopolies in any action they took to deal with imports or exports.

THE EDITOR'S APPEAL

The response to our appeal last month has not equalled what was needed. We asked for £1,500. This sum is less than the actual debt on our new press, on our pamphlet publication, and on "The Word," which is one of the most costly produced papers in the Movement. Letters from comrades express great appreciation of the paper and its contents. Only a few rally to its help. Either we must put the price of the paper up to 3d. per copy, which we do not want to do, or we must command immediate support. IF EVERY READER MADE A SACRIFICE FOR ONE MONTH THE SUM NEEDED WOULD BE RAISED. We would make no more appeals for a year.

This paper is not subsidised. Many people imagine that the Strickland estate sustains our work. This is an error. War conditions have wiped out the Strickland legacy completely and has turned its provisions into a serious handicap and liability. Pamphlet publication carries with it the need for advertising. Whereas we freely announce publications issued by other sections of the Socialist and Pacifist Movements, the advertising of our booklets in various Socialist and Pacifist papers costs money. The rates are high and often inconsiderate. But such advertising is a necessary method of reaching an audience.

A few comrades did respond. Some responded well. But the total response amounted to only a little over £50. The matter rests with our readers. Either there must be a general response this month, or else we must increase the price of the paper and cut down its size, or else we must cease publication entirely. If EACH reader will note that this appeal is both serious and genuine, and so respond immediately, we will carry on. IF NOT, DRASTIC CHANGES WILL BE ANNOUNCED NEXT MONTH. Please respond and end this threat of crisis.

SAVE "THE WORD."

The author of the following letter is a well-known Protestant writer and lecturer, who wishes to remain anonymous:—

Dear Mr. Aldred,—As a Christian reader of your journal I send you herewith Two Guineas in response to your Appeal for £1,500. I give this willingly and am making a sacrifice in order to let you have it.

"The Word" to my mind is necessary in these days of press dishonesty and hypocrisy, and journals such as yours should be encouraged.

I hope that 500 of your readers will follow my example, and that they will give NOW!

"The Word" must be saved for the thinking and sane who read it.

WAR COMMENTARY

The fact that Americans should recently have been engaged in killing Frenchmen living on the other side of the world, with whom they can have had less than no personal quarrel, brings once more into sharp relief the beastliness and utter moral depravity of war. One of the reasons given—that the move was an unavoidable necessity to anticipate similar action by the enemy—is an excuse which both sides have employed ever since the beginning of the struggle; but the further claim that the occupation of French territory in Africa was necessary to prevent an Axis invasion of America strikes one as bold a flight of imagination which even Dr. Goebells might have envied!

If war were the noble thing its advocates claim, statesmen could avoid this rather nauseating hypocrisy. They could simply say to a neutral neighbour, "We are very sorry, but we feel that securing victory for our people is a duty so important that we cannot allow any other consideration to stand in its way. We also feel that the success of our cause will be of the greatest benefit to other nations besides our own. We therefore see no alternative but to occupy your country as a matter of strategic necessity. We hope you will not resist, as we have no desire to injure your people and we shall try to cause them as little inconvenience as circumstances permit." That at anyrate would be honest!

There are people, some of them influential, who have favoured a negotiated peace but have felt that no effective action can be taken until our military fortunes are on the up-grade. The success in North Africa, if it can be sustained for any length of time, should give them a chance to prove their mettle and the soundness of their judgment.

If they do nothing, the battle, beyond administering some check to Axis confidence, may, in the long run, achieve little beyond a useless sacrifice of good men's lives.

If we had not got involved in war with Japan and lost our main sources of supply of rubber and tin; if we had not antagonized the Indian people; if our shipping losses were not so severe; and if Russia had not been largely crippled, the military possibilities of the recapture of partial control of the Mediterranean might be considerable. As things are, even if the Germans should be turned out of Africa completely, the position, notwithstanding the trumpetings of our warmongers, would seem to be one of stalemate. Let us hope that the forces of reason will make the very best use of the opportunity which such a situation might provide.

BEDFORD.

"UNKNOWN WARRIOR"

If a tear fall in Westminster,
Is it more pitiful, or salter
Than the red eyes of a lover in
A grey back street in Berlin?

Is the silence of the unknown
Tomb sunk in the Abbey's stone
Sacred? but not the sheets turned down
Waiting a corpse in some German town?

Was his English flesh whiter than
That of the tall, young Hamburg man?
Or his own heart quicker to flame
Than the Florentine boy without a name?

You meet here, as if this nave
Were the only youthful soldier's grave.
In a German slum, a bed stands
Empty. Kings kiss the guilty hands.

GLASGOW No. I TRIBUNAL

Our comrade, J. T. Caldwell, of the United Socialist Movement and the Strickland Press, appeared before the Glasgow Tribunal on October 21, 1940, and was granted conditional exemption. The condition was that he should volunteer for part-time A.R.P. On November 4, 1942, Caldwell again appeared before the same Tribunal, to have his case reconsidered, on the ground that he had failed to carry out the condition of his exemption, but had reasonable excuse for his failure.

Sheriff Principal Sir A. Campbell Black presided at both hearings and on each occasion the editor accompanied Caldwell as a witness.

The Tribunal varied its finding to one of unconditional exemption. As on the first occasion, the Tribunal treated the applicant courteously.

At the recent hearing, an afternoon session, 10 cases were reconsidered. The eighth case was that of Caldwell and the ninth that of our comrade, Philip Boyle, who was the first conscientious objector to be court-martialled in Scotland. He received two Court Martial sentences before being exempted. The editor appeared for Boyle also, whose condition was varied to suit his present employment.

One case was very irritating even to the listener. An amazingly vague decision by the Appellate Tribunal was interpreted in a most fantastic fashion by the objector concerned, who had an array of witnesses in Court, and a solicitor to speak for him. The result was not given. The Tribunal treated the applicant with politeness and attention, whatever its decision might have been. We did not feel much sympathy with his argument that he was giving expression to the condition of exemption. However genuine his opposition to war may have been his evidence proved that he was not fulfiling any condition of exemption.

We listened to 7 cases in addition to giving evidence in the cases of Caldwell and Boyle. The Tribunal was courteous and anxiously fair in every case. Whatever prejudice the appearance of conscientious objectors may rouse in the military-minded folk, no bias was expressed in the conduct of Sir A. Campbell Black and his colleagues. The questions were to the point and the atmosphere was judicial and competent without being heavily solemn. The hearing given to each case was good.

On Tuesday, November 17, afternoon session, the editor accompanied Miss Clementina Bertolini before the Glasgow No. 1 Tribunal. This was the first time he had been at a Woman's Tribunal. Sir A. Campbell Black brought out the facts in this case with sympathy and understanding. This was the fifth case heard that afternoon. Miss Bertolini was given unconditional exemption on pacifist grounds. She is a Catholic and was 22 on the Sunday before her Tribunal. In the other cases, two were refused, and two were granted conditional exemption.

COMRADE CALLAGHAN'S APPEAL.

On Thursday, November 19, afternoon session, the editor appeared with Comrade Arthur Callaghan, of the Burnbank Anti-parliamentary Group, before the Appellate Tribunal, Edinburgh. Comrade Callaghan appealed against the decision of the South West Scotland, No. 2 Tribunal, held on September 11 last, which removed his name from the register of conscientious objectors. The decision of the local Tribunal was unanimous. The appeal was successful and Callaghan's name was placed in the register of conscientious objectors, on condition that he found employment as a miner. Callaghan is a miner by occupation and had left the pit owing to unemployment and a pit closing down.

18B DETENTIONS

The 18B Publicity Council, 15 Woburn Square, London, W.C.1, has published a pamphlet by Henry St. George, directing attention to the detention and sufferings of British citizens through the administration of war-time regulations by Ministers of the Crown acting in the name of the People of Great Britain. Our concern is with the facts recorded in this pamphlet and not with its argument. On the one hand it speaks of "iniquities" and "inhuman administration," whereas we would record the facts without undue comment, and leave them to tell coldly their own story. On the other hand it concedes to the Government arguments in support of 18B, such as:—

"THERE IS NO SUGGESTION that the necessary Defence Regulations should be abolished, no one but a fool or a criminal would suggest any weakening of the powers of the lawful administration in defence of the country, . . ."

We must be both criminal and fool for we deny that the Defence Regulations are necessary or lawful. We declare that they ought to be abolished. In our view, all such powers as those conferred by 18B are a menace to the citizen and entirely contrary to the established law of Britain and to the fundamental principles of the constitution. Because a number of lawyers turned by political adventurism into judges say otherwise, that does not settle the constitutional issue for us. Judges have reached such conclusions before and their interested defence of Star Chamber regulations and decisions have been scattered to the winds. 18B victims, or their friends, upholding special legislation of this extraordinary nature, remind us of Trotsky attacking Stalin. Trotsky agrees with secret trials and defends the idea of such conduct, only he objects to Stalin's secret trials. He does not realise that the whole business of secret trials is wrong. But these 18B critics will not condemn the entire defence legislation. Why?

We confess we are at a disadvantage in dealing with the matter because we believe in democracy, full legal, social, political, and economic democracy. We know that some of the victims believe in Fascism and special powers of state suppression. Hence our sympathy is qualified. After all we cannot be expected to maintain free speech and freedom from arrest for folk who wish to use speech and freedom for the purpose of depriving us of our right to both. On the other hand, we have no right to deny the principles for which we stand, and on which social justice rests.

Mr. St. George's pamphlet quotes the vigorous words of Abraham Lincoln, whose great virtue was his unfailing common-sense of utterance and understanding:—

"We know that great political and moral wrongs are done and outrages committed, and we denounce these wrongs and outrages, although we cannot at present do much more."

The pamphlet sets out, in its own peculiar language, two sets of facts and makes a demand with which we agree entirely.

(1) Men, women, and children of British birth have been, are being, or are liable to be imprisoned without trial, without adequate reason, and entirely without protection at law or of any principles of justice.

(2) The harshness of the imprisonment has caused the death of some victims and the permanent injury to health of many.

(3) 18B prisoners ought to be brought to public trial or else released unconditionally.

The pamphlet points out that in May, June, and July, 1940, the Government feared an invasion. Consequently arrests took place in various parts of the country, and many citizens who had fought for Britain in previous wars and even in this war, and had been rewarded for gallant services, were imprisoned for "what they might do," to quote the words of the Home Secretary. In all 1800 British born citizens were detained. Of these, after many weary months of imprisonment, over 1300 have been released, many unconditionally.

M . . . an ex-service man was serving on the "small ships" about to leave for Dunkirk. He was arrested under "18B." Owing to the insanitary conditions and the fact that 12 men had to use one razor blade, he contracted "Sycosis Barbae." This disease has now left him unfit for work and is too advanced for any successful treatment. He is now "discharged"—which means that he should never have been detained—and has no redress. His life, his health forfeit "on suspicion."

Mrs. C. . . . Upon the detention of her husband, Mrs. C. was assaulted by "patriots" in the vicinity of her home and suffered a serious hemorrhage as a consequence of this attack. Mrs. C. had experienced no major illness in her life before, but recurrent hemorrhages so undermined her health that eventually Tuberculosis infecting both her lungs was diagnosed by her medical attendant. She was urged to undergo sanatorium treatment. Mrs. C. refused to be separated from her four little children, who would obviously have to be put in some form of Home or Institution. This poor woman pleads continually with the Home Office for the release of her husband.

C.M. . . . A volunteer of the Boer War. Also served in the War of '14-'18. Three times wounded in his Country's service. M. was 69 years of age and with the set habits obvious in an older person was quite unable to adapt himself to the rigorous conditions prevailing in prison and internment camp. When seriously ill he was released—and died shortly after.

D. . . . A miner's son, 18 years of age when detained in 1940. A sufferer from Claustrophobia. His confinement in prison so played havoc with his adolescent mind that in spite of every endeavour of his fellow-detainees to restore his mental balance, he became quite insane and is now confined in a mental home on the Isle of Man.

R.R. . . . This ex-service man suffered from severe shell-shock as a result of his war services. He had received continuous medical treatment until detained in June, 1940. This treatment then ceased. His physical condition became such that after release early in 1941, he died, directly as a result of lack of medical attention, leaving a widow and one son.

H. . . . A crippled ex-service man, maimed in the course of war service. His home has been broken up and his wife forced to undergo uncongenial employment to supply him with bare necessities, he being obviously unable to "work" for 3s. a week in detention.

P.T. . . . This old man was a sufferer from cancer of the tongue when detained. Even with the finest and most constant treatment his hold on life was but a precarious one. Irrespective of his physical health, this man was detained with only access to the miserable medical services of detention camp and prison infirmary. He was let out to die.

Mr. W. . . . Another ex-service man, W. never physically strong, was detained and subsequently released unconditionally. W was released early in 1941, but, unable to rehabilitate himself in his old search for work and the means to provide for his family. He died three months after release. His family consisted of three young girls and his wife. . . . Mrs. W. is blind.

G.D. . . . This man was unable for obvious reasons, whilst detained, to afford the protection which all fathers wished to give their families during the nights and days of sudden death which came from the skies at the latter part of 1940. Fearful for his dear ones' safety through "Blitz" attacks on his home town, he induced them to join his parents in Belfast. During one awful raid, a "direct hit" wiped out the whole family.

Mr. and Mrs. W. E. B . . . Mr. B., a builder by trade, had married a German woman. She was arrested in May, 1940, as of "hostile origin." Mr. B., British by birth and descent, was also arrested as having "hostile association."

Mrs. B. was taken to Holloway with her little boy, aged only 15 months, where they were placed in a damp, unheated cell. After a fortnight, the child wes sent to a public institution and was not seen again by either of his parents until nearly a year later when he was returned to his mother in Holloway.

Mrs. B. was pregnant, but was subjected to the same deprivations and hardships as her fellow-detainees. About Christmas, she was removed to the prison hospital, where she was left to fend for herself during her twenty-four hours labour. She gave birth to a girl on January, '41. Three weeks later, mother and child were back in the prison cell under usual prison conditions.

When the little boy was sent back to his mother, the three lived together in the cell until transported to the Isle of Man. Both children were ill and Mrs. B. prostrate with fatigue and anxiety. The boy, originally a strong, healthy child, came back from the Institution stunted and emaciated. The journey to the island proved a severe trial. Weary hours of waiting, hardly any food, no help in carrying their baggage, this poor young mother had a terrible ordeal with her two baby children. During the voyage no food was provided, and Mrs. B., who was breast-feeding her baby, was terribly sea-sick and collapsed. She was even denied fresh air and only permitted to sit in the lavatory.

Upon arrival, Mrs. B., carrying her baby and with the other child clinging to her skirt, was ordered to march to the railway station and to carry her luggage. As this was obviously impossible, she was at last taken to her destination in a "Black Maria" and reached her quarters at Port Erin at 9.15 p.m. They had left Fleetwood after travelling all night by train at 5.30 that morning! At Port Erin, Mrs. B. and her children were given a room without any heating facilities—even hot-water bottles for the children were refused. Naturally they caught cold, and eventually the boy developed whooping cough. The baby caught this complaint—and died on November 15th.

Mr. B., a prisoner himself, asked that he might be allowed to bury his baby daughter in his home town. The request was granted by the Home Office, but only on condition that he bore the entire expense. As detention for over 18 months had deprived him of his livelihood, he had to arrange to sell the last remains of his small property.

Questions were asked in the House of Commons on October 22 regarding the employment of British detainees in the Isle of Man. The questioners were calling attention to the inadequacy of the pay for the work done, and they were unable to get an answer to their questions. Mr. Stokes who has a passion for liberty and merits much praise for his courageous stand on the questions of liberty and conscience, asked definitely if the rates of pay had been adjusted. All he got in reply was a jibe at the idea of liberty or justice. Herbert Morrison said:—

I do not know what my hon. Friend means. He refers to 1s. a day, and then to 1s. a week, and he does not seem to mind much which way it is. It must be remembered that these people are being maintained at the expense of the State. I think the hon. Gentleman wants to elevate these ladies and gentlemen rather too high in the social scale.

Morrison may have meant this comment to stand as a witty reply, but all decent people would consider it unworthy of a Minister of the State enjoying a privileged position of power. These people in the Isle of Man, even if they are maintained at the Government expense, are under preventive detention, are detained without charge or evidence of ill-doing. They have no right to be there, and to joke at their condition is an expression of bad-taste, to say the least of such want of charity.

ROBERT MORLEY

NEWCASTLE C.O. AGAIN SENTENCED

A fine of £5 (or 20 days' imprisonment) was imposed on our comrade, Robert Morley, of Highfield Road, Westerhope, at Newcastle Police Court on Friday, October 30 last, for failing to submit to a medical examination for national service. He was ordered to submit to such examination that day.

Moreley urged that he should be sentenced at once and that the Bench should cut out the formality of sending him to a medical board.

Reading from a written statement he said he was an anti-militarist and believed laws which made war possible anti-social.

Later, Morley was sentenced to 12 months. Report next month.

Thus the Morley family continues its magnificent stand for Socialism, Pacifism, and anti-Militarism.

Comrades who wish to know the full details of the splendid stand made for conscience and pacifism by our Comrades Morley should read our columns for February, August, and December 1941; February and September, 1942.

A CHAMPION OF FREE SPEECH

By D. M. Elliot

(Formerly President of the National Union of Journalists).

[The following article was published in "The Plebs" for October, 1942. It is a review of our "Richard Carlile, Agitator." This book is published at 1s. 6d. and will be sent, post free, for 1s. 9d. Carlile was born on December 9, 1790. He died on February 10, 1843. Next February, therefore, will be the centenary of his death. The B.B.C. has refused to make a broadcast on the subject of his life and work, on the ground that the subject is not of sufficient interest! Carlile's prison essays, under the title of "Jail Journal," will be published by the Strickland Press, this month.—Ed.]

If no persons had resisted error and offered themselves, even as victims, falsehood always would have prevailed, declared Richard Carlile, when answering an indictment for blasphemy brought against him in 1819 for publishing Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason."

That was the keynote of Carlile's career, a burning need of the sense to uphold truth, whatever the cost.

By common consent Carlile is ranked among the great champions of freedom of expression in speech or writing—by some regarded as the greatest of them all, though less well-known than Milton, Wilkes or Paine—and it is a salutary reminder of how dearly bought was such liberty as we enjoy to-day in these matters to read Guy Aldred's account of the life and times of "Richard Carlile, Agitator."

Aldred makes no bones about his admiration for Carlile—"the genius of his age" he calls him—and little wonder, for here was a man who, in the striking words of Eliza Sharples, who shared his life, "did not suffer himself to be moved by ignominy, distress or most cruel suffering, but continued steadfast in the cause of truth, not because it was profitable or delightful, but because it was just."

Aldred's study—this is the third edition, and the book is recognised as one of the authoritative works on Carlile—is at once inspiring and forbidding. It is inspiring by reason of the clear-cut picture it gives of one man's iron determination to fight for what he conceived to be the right; forbidding because of the indelible background of cant and terror it depicts as passing for law and justice.

Carlile was born in 1790 and died in 1843—less than a hundred years ago. In his comparatively short life, he spent nine years and seven months in prison out of sentences of twelve years imposed on him because of his defiance of laws which sought to prevent the spread of knowledge. It was an age in which petty larceny was still punished by execution, when transportation was a common sentence for those who dared to proclaim the working man's right to independence of thought and action. Carlile could not be silenced. "The general distress of 1816," he wrote, "opened my eyes, and I soon saw what was the importance of a Free Press. I wanted to be doing something in a great cause." He never looked back on that resolve.

On the platform and in his publications he attacked one form of hypocrisy after another—the Church, the law, freemasonry, the stamp taxes, all coming under his flail. When prosecuted for publishing what are now regarded as mild expressions of public rights, he really placed his accusers on trial by the brilliance of his defence. To a judge who had made an inept comment he replied bitingly, "Your Lordship's observations argue nothing but the absurdity of legislating on matters of opinion."

There was a lyrical quality about Carlile's courage. "I would rather be free in prison," he said, "than shackled outside." By shackles he meant the mental black-out which those in authority sought to impose on the workers of his day. "I write for the poor," he wrote, "though all in that class do not see it. (How often could that reproach be cast!). I write for the poor, or the rich oppressor would not persecute me."

Persecution was by no means confined to Carlile himself. Of those associated with him in his printing and distributing enterprises, 150 went to jail, including his wife, Jane Carlile, and his younger sister. He and his shopmen were not to be cowed, however, and in 1825 he was granted unconditional release.

Somewhat bombastically perhaps, but with justification, he declared eight years later, "I have accomplished the liberty of the Press in England, and oral discussion is now free. Nothing remains to be reformed but the ignorance and vices of the people, whose ignorance cannot be removed while their bodies are starved and their church remains a theatre of idolatry and superstition."

Unfortunately, the results Carlile looked for have not materialised, partly because the Press freedom he fought for so tenaciously has never been absolute and partly because the ruling classes were quick to learn, when direct oppression failed, that subtler methods were no less effective for keeping authority invested in their hands.

Aldred's book will well repay the reading. Its vitality comes largely from its autobiographical character, the many passages in which Carlile speaks for himself. None, however, is more graphic than the terrible indictment of mankind's indifference by Eliza Sharples, in which, in a passionate outburst over Carlile's death "wanting the necessities of life" after all these years of suffering and trial, she exclaims, "Such being the reward of sincerity, who then shall marvel at its absence?" It is a charge not only against the masses of Carlile's day, but against the workers of every generation who have honoured their martyrs only when it is too late.

ROMFORD PACIFISM.

In these days of war-madness and unbalanced thinking, it is a relief to report the work and activities of the Collier Row Peace Pledge Union. It is just 18 months ago since four of us decided to form a group to study Pacifism and Socialism and to engage in intensive propaganda. It was not long before we made ourselves felt and others wanted to join us. Our group increased in numbers and every member was 100 per cent. Pacifist and Socialist to the backbone.

Membership with us does not simply mean easy-armchair conversations, routine group meetings—but daily active propaganda in the home, on the land, in the shop and in the street. Members are not afraid of being known as Pacifists and Socialists. Quite early we started a Literature Section and in a very few weeks every one was busy selling "Peace News," "The Word," and hundreds of other books and pamphlets. This literature was put into the hands of non-pacifists with great results. Not only did these folks read one pamphlet but, like Oliver Twist, they asked for more. The printed page is the finest form of propaganda—it leads to questions being asked and an opportunity of "putting it over."

We carry the Pacifist and Socialist message to the non-Pacifist and the anti-Socialist and seek to enlighten and educate them. We get many letters into "The Romford Press."

Our latest piece of useful work is the formation of a Group Lending Library. Books have already been given to us but we need many more. Will those who read this report please help me? I want all the Pacifist, anti-War and Socialist books and pamphlets it is possible to get. Can anyone send me the following:—"Conscience and Conscription" by John Graham; "The Queen's Daughters in India" by Andrew and Bushnell; "The Great Crusade" by Josephine Butler; "The Conquest of Violence" by Bart de ligt.

We also have a Group Reference Library for which I require any literature or records of the C.O. Movement 1914-42; Guy Aldred's early pamphlets and periodicals; "At Grips With War," etc., and the following issues of "The Word" to complete my files: Vol. 1, No. 1, 4, 8; Vol. 2, No. 7, 8, 9; Vol. 3, No. 1; also "Regeneracion" Leaflets, 1936; "News from Spain," 1937; and "The Barcelona Bulletin."

Please send your gifts to the Group Secretary, GEO, E. WATLING, 3 LARCHWOOD CLOSE, COLLIER ROW, ROMFORD, ESSEX.

RICHARD CARLILE'S FUNERAL.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE RICHARD CARLILE.—The remains of this notorious individual were deposited at the Kensal-green Cemetery yesterday. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon a vast number of persons were assembled in Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, to witness the departure of the funeral cortège. At 3 o'clock a hearse and five mourning coaches drove up to the house where the deceased was lying. The funeral procession moved on, and during its progress attracted considerable attention. On arriving at the grave a considerable delay occurred from the clergyman having had to read the burial service over several bodies before the arrival of the deceased. When the officiating divine, the Rev. Josiah Twigger, arrived at the grave, accompanied by the clerk, one of the deceased son's addressed the clergyman as follows:—"Sir, we want no service over the body of our late father; he passed his life in opposition to all priestcraft, and we protest against the service being read." The reverend divine replied—"Sir, I must do my duty." Another son of the deceased here stepped forward and said—"We have purchased this ground as the resting place of our deceased parent, and I object, with my brothers, to the reading of the funeral service." (Here loud cries of "Hear, hear" were given by the mob assembled round the grave.) The clergyman continued—"I must and will do my duty, and at your peril abide the consequences that may occur from any opposition to the usual observance on such occasions." Another son—"Then, Sir, we will not hear it." Here the mob cried out, "Yes, yes! leave the grave: let all the friends of Mr. Carlile go away." At this moment the party assembled quitted the grave, the mourners retired into the coaches, and the clergyman proceeded in the most impressive manner to read the service, during which he was frequently interrupted by ribald jests from a few stragglers who had kept at a short distance from the spot. It is due to the sons of the deceased to state, that they gave their opposition in the most respectful tone possible, but their example was not imitated by many of the followers of the deceased. After the clergyman had retired, a rush was made to the grave, and a son of the deceased addressed the crowd as follows:—"I beg to state that I, with my family and friends, were opposed to the performance of this service; we did not require it; and have given every opposition in our power to its being done. I thank you all, in the name of my late father, for your attendance here on this occasion." Having said thus much, he and the followers of the funeral departed.

The above account of Richard Carlile's funeral is reproduced, same type, same style, and words per line, from "The Times," London, for Thursday, February 28, 1843.

EDITOR'S BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS.

We have received many letters from all over Britain congratulating us—we believe that that is the correct phrase—on reaching our fifty-sixth birthday. Some of these letters recall incidents in the Movement and will apear in "Our Letter Box" next month. The following letter from our comrade the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, written from The Rectory, Ballachulish, Argyll, merits reproduction for its humour:—

November 8, 1942.

My Dear Guy,—Congratulations or condolences on your fifty-sixth birthday. Here's something for your Birthday Book:

Two guys the same idea got—
To put the Commons on the spot:
Fawkes tried with his Gunpowder plot;
Aldred with High Explosive Thought.

The Orange and Protestant Champion came
On the fifth of November to Tor Bay;
The Logical Protestant, Guy by name,
Was born on the anniversary day.
Is this not, in fine,
A proof of Design
Refuting what atheist Guy may say?

You have had to deal seriously with weaker apologetics in your time! All the best for the next fifty-six years!

Yours,

MALCOLM MacCOLL.

We have several sermons delivered by our comrade MacColl applying the thought of the prophets of Israel to the world to-day. At an early date we hope to publish some of these excellent indictments of our social system, with its inequalities, crime, and glory of murder, called war, and miscalled patriotism.

THE NEW POETRY

Words without thought, I heard it said,
Can put sweet music in the head,
Colour, and form, and make eyes see
More than can common poetry.

Try each thing once, I always say,
And see what's gold and what is clay,
But rather than risk going nuts,
I'll stick to poetry that has guts.

THE BREAK-UP OF AN EMPIRE

A Review of the War Situation

By C. H. NORMAN

It is very difficult to understand the general attitude towards Russia as evinced by the Labour movement in England after its fierce denunciations of Communism and all its works. Without belittling the efforts of any individual Russian or German, let us consider some matters in estimating the resources of these powerful states. Russia has a territory covering eight million square miles with a population put at about 150,000,000. Russia, for many years, has been boasting of the strength of the Red Army and the Air Force, especially at the annual parades in the October celebrations. Russia, like Germany, had been preparing for war actively since 1934. Russia knew that the policy pursued from the outbreak of war in 1939 had earned the distrust of Germany, so that Russia had every reason for strengthening her forces in every respect, while the Germans were engaged with powerful enemies. Incidentally, one must say plainly that the Russo-German Pact of 1939 was the major immediate cause of the war, as it enabled Germany to feel free to reject the Anglo-French ultimata in September, 1939, on the subject of Poland. Had Russia even remained with a free hand, without indicating what line would be taken, it is probable that German policy on the Polish question would have been different from what it was. If the signature of the Russo-German Pact were intended by Russia to prevent a European war it was an incomprehensible error of judgment. If it were hoped that it would prevent a Russo-German war in any event, the policy afterwards followed by Russia in Finland, in Poland, and in the Baltic States was completely misconceived, as that policy could only be understood on the assumption that what the Russo-German Pact was designed to avert would become inevitable, as the occupation of Finnish territory, while protective of Russia, on strategical grounds was equally threatening to both Germany and Sweden on the same principles. That is the true explanation of the policy of Sweden, whose territory Finland originally was, in the conflicts between Russia and Finland and Russia and Germany. Again, it must be emphasised that the policy of Sweden in 1939-1940 was the main matter of substance which prevented Britain and France going to war with Russia in aid of Finland. Just reflect what the position of Britain would have been by now had that calamity occurred. The same people are to-day in office as those who tried to bring about that catastrophe

The persistence of Great Britain in the food blockade of Europe is aggravating the already horrible conditions natural to ordinary warfare. The Allied blockade of France is seriously affecting the health of French children according to a report submitted by the National Committee of Child Specialists to the Academy of Medicine in Paris ("Manchester Evening News", 20th May, 1942). The air attacks on Paris, Lubeck, Rostock and Cologne indicate that the British Government has abandoned even the pretence of limiting air attack to military objectives—which was always a piece of British hyprocrisy under the conditions called for by night bombing instituted by England in June, 1940. The relatives of the slaughtered inhabitants of Bath, Norwich, Exeter, Ipswich and Canterbury have little to thank Mr. Winston Churchill, Sir Archibald Sinclair, and the heads of the British Air Force for in this policy, as all these towns were bombed indiscriminately in reprisal for the indiscriminate bombing of Lubeck and Rostock. It is rather strange if the excuse for this policy be to relieve pressure on Russia, that the Russian Air Force, which, we have been often told, has complete command of the air in Russia, did not itself bomb Lubeck and Rostock! Is the British Government becoming more savage in its conduct of the war in the air than the Russian Government?

The gross inaccuracies in all Government statements about the losses of the other side render it very difficult to judge what the true strength of the contending nations is. The Americans are becoming as reckless as anyone in their statements of Japanese naval losses. The only test one can apply is the geographical and strategical test. If the Germans did so badly in Russia during the winter campaign, how then is it that their geographical situation was what it was in June, 1942? If the British Navy has had complete command of the Mediterranean during the war, as Mr Churchill has so often assured a credulous public, how is it that General Rommel has been able to maintain such a large army in the Libyan deserts? If the British Air Force has complete command of the air, how is it that towns were bombed in April and May, 1942, with comparative impunity and with heavy loss of life, by small German air forces.

One quotation may be given for the purpose of testing the reliability of the statements of the British Government about war losses. The policy of not publishing sea losses was supposed to have been instituted by the British Government in 1941 for the first time. On the 7th March, 1942, Mr. Alexander, First Lord of the Admiralty, spoke thus at Fulham, according to "Reynolds News", 3rd March, 1942: "After Dunkirk we had not got half a dozen corvettes, eleven destroyers had been sunk in three weeks and 73 more were in dock for long term repairs." No such statement was made by the Admiralty at the time (1940) even though the pretence was being maintained to the public that full information was being given of the losses as and when they occurred.

However, there are some consolations for one class in this somewhat gloomy picture. Though Russia and China are apparently being slowly defeated so that soon the Axis Powers will be in command of most of Asia and Europe, while their opponents hold America and the African continent, with Australia in the balance, the shareholding class has some satisfaction in knowing that the spirit of internationalism is not quite dead, as the Press Department of Lever Brothers and Unilever Ltd. on the 11th December, 1941, issued this statement "The German Commissioner for the Dutch Company has announced that Preference Dividends for 1940 in Lever Brothers and Unilever N.V.'s will-be paid", thus relieving the English Company of its liability. The "Daily Telegraph" and "Daily Mail" announced in June, 1942, that "British holders of debentures issued before the war by the Czech armaments concern, the Skoda Works, are still able to draw interest on their holdings though the works are in German hands." "Long live international finance" would seem to-day a more vital watchword, judging by these instances, than "Long live International Socialism." Some people were bold enough to declare that the International Socialist movement would never support a war as they did in 1914-1918. The writer always took the opposite view, thinking that they would be more easily tricked the next time than in 1914-1918. Mr. Churchill has said time and again that the war which began in 1939 was a continuation of the war which ended temporarily in 1919. He is quite right. How, therefore, the Communists and Socialists can justify a worse ratting from their principles than took place even in 1914 it is impossible to comprehend. And the self-justificatory nonsense they write only makes one more convinced of the sad fact, which experience has taught me in 30 years, that Parliamentary-Trade-Union-Socialists and Communists will rat on their principles at the very moment when they should stand to them, namely on the outbreak of war, more easily than the holders of the opposite philosophy, who remember the rights of property before everything. The outlook is dark for the ordinary people as the ruinous policy of destruction from the air and the insane Russian idea of the "scorched earth" policy must combine to prevent the restoration of anything like decent conditions of life for decades to come throughout Europe and the world. Such are the consequences of the madness of statesmen and military leaders and the supineness of popular leaders.

SYLVIA TARTAGLIA

The morning session of the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal, on Thursday, November 19, was a Woman's Court. We regret we did not attend until the afternoon session because of the case of Sylvia Tartaglia, of 26 Grove Street, Edinburgh. The local Edinburgh Tribunal had removed her name from the register of C.O.s and the Appellate upheld this decision. In our view, wrongly.

Miss Tartaglia put her case forcibly. The fact may have prejudiced its consideration. She said:—

War is futile. This war has killed my father and my grandfather. There will be another one in 25 years. I am determined to do absolutely nothing to help this war.

Ignoring the tragedy the war had meant for her, Lord Elphinstone exclaimed:—

Do you mean to say you are prepared to enjoy the privileges of living in this country and yet do nothing to help it?

Miss Tartaglia made the spirited retort:—

I would not say that the internment of my father his death, and my grandfather's death is a privilege worth fighting for.

At the afternoon (Men's) session, Lord Elphinstone behaved with great fairness. But we think that his decision and his questionings in the Tartaglia case were harsh and unjust.

IS MONETARY REFORM NECESSARY?

Not in the way that will appeal to the Socialist, but none the less from a direct sense of public usefulness such as expresses the approach of the scientific mind, Sir Allcott Verdon-Roe, O.B.E., F.R.Ae.S., M.I.Ae.E., has spent his life trying to introduce new ideas and inventions. In due course, a Socialist society will find itself the richer for his pioneering activity.

The somewhat static powers that be of Capitalist society have regarded his far-seeing practical suggestions as revolutionary impossibilities and have declared them to be impractical, with much smug self-assurance and complacency. In many instances time has shown how mistaken this pompous bureaucratic deadness was, and how vitally important his ideas were, and are, to the people. Unfortunately, when accepted, these ideas and inventions, intended to serve mankind, are used for destructive purposes.

On January 24, 1906, a well-known capitalist paper added an editorial footnote to a letter to the then Mr. A. Verdon-Roe, saying:—

"It is not to be supposed that we in any way believe in the undertaking of the writer, as we consider all attempts at artificial aviation are not only dangerous to human life but are foreboding to failure."

The present war is a sad reply to this comment.

In May, 1909, Mr. A. Verdon-Roe was told by Mr. Haldane's Secretary, in front of Mr. Haldane (later Lord Haldane) that as they were trustees to the public purse, they regretted they could not offer aviation pioneers any encouragement, as they did not see any possibility of using aeroplanes for war purposes.

It is an indictment of the system that aviation should be considered from such an evil viewpoint, and that the question of what harm could be done, not what good could be done, should decide its utility. One day aviation will benefit mankind only, and then Sir A. Verdon-Roe's labours and inventive powers will be deemed blessings. But not under the present capitalist-militarist system.

Because of the ridiculous opposition to his aircraft proposals, on the ground of impossibility, Sir A. Verdon-Roe feels that some of the opposition to his currency proposals may be no less antiquated and conditioned by mean and false interests. He feels that his proposals deserve serious consideration and that even Socialists might consider whether a medium of exchange is necessary in a new social order, and so analyse his proposals.

The following letter was published in "The Independent" for August 18, 1934:—

Sir,—In a recent issue you published the following:

"Sir Alliott Verdon-Roe is too delicious. 'Happily,' he tells the Editor of the Morning Post, 'there are now available a number of schemes and proposals for improving the monetary system,' and he suggests that the Cabinet must no longer side-track its responsibilities, but carefully examine the most promising plans available, confer with the authors and put the best features of the schemes into effect as soon as possible.'

"Sir Alliott should go to Washington, for Mr. Roosevelt in the same happy way has done exactly as Sir Alliott proposes."

It is to be hoped that the most of your readers realised that the above was a vacuous criticism. To say that Mr. Roosevelt has done exactly what I propose is a negation of facts. Unfortunately, on the contrary, he has been trying the crudest of methods. Had Mr. Roosevelt adopted the best features from available plans, the American people would be enjoying exceptional prosperity in all those activities under human control, with practically no unemployed.

There is a wonderful opportunity awaiting Britain to show the world a way out of its chief troubles by adopting a sound monetary system. But our Government will do nothing; their recent debate on monetary policy—which had been called for in a letter to "The Times" on April 4th, of which the writer was one of the signatories—was a shocking exhibition of ignorance and smug complacency; for Mr. Chamberlain said: "The Government did not claim to be responsible for the whole of the trade expansion that had taken place, but what they did claim was that they had created the conditions which had made that expansion possible." (Ministerial cheers.) "Our banking system had stood the tremendous strain and stress of the last few years better than any other banking system in the world; our public finances showed greater improvement than those of any other country in the world. What then, was the justification of embarking on some fresh inquiry?" (Ministerial cheers.)

Do Mr. Chamberlain and those who cheered realise that we have more unemployed now than we had during the worst pre-war depression; that suicides are an indication of a nation's peace of mind, and these have risen from 1,000 in 1917 to 9,000 yearly, many times greater than any pre-war year; that we are only producing a small fraction of what we are capable of, and we cannot produce or buy this small fraction without getting further and further into debt, leading to a crash (or war) unless we can get rid of this increasing indebtedness; that bankruptcies have increased from a few hundreds to thousands yearly; that the National debt was £7,400,000,000 in 1919, since that we have spent some £8,000,000,000 in interest7 and redemption, and that it is now £600,000,000 greater; that the majority of those who find work for millions of people, without this employment the nation would soon collapse, are in the hands of a small section of the community—the banks—who merely employ a comparatively few clerks; that the welfare of a nation depends on the prosperity of its industries; that it is possible to clear approved enterprises of their debts by means of a practically costless new paper currency issues, and in addition to make these industries financially sound without weakening the purchasing power of the £ stering; that under a sound monetary system the profits of industry would be so large that a very small tax on profits distributed would not only find all the money necessary for taxation but for national expenditure as well, so the need for a government loan should never arise; that a government loan is equivalent to a snake trying to live on its own tail; that it is not a difficult task to remove the financial stranglehold which is causing unemployment, misery, strife, untold suffering and wars; that this can never be done until the Government exercises its prerogative and prints the correct amount of tangible currency and judiciously puts it into circulation, according to proposals that have been prepared?

Had those who have been finding work for millions—and lost thereby—said: "We can see we shall lose our money by struggling on; we will buy Government stock instead," where would the nation and banks be?

While the banks have been labouring under "the tremendous strain and stress of the last few years," Mr. Montagu Norman's salary has been raised, the hard pressed banking community have spent millions of pounds on buying costly sites and building palatial premises, while carrying over colossal reserves. Meanwhile thousands of their clients—on whom they have foreclosed—have committed suicide, being too proud to beg, having no dole or pension to fall back upon, aalthough they have contributed towards these.

And yet our Government see no justification for an inquiry into the monetary system. Where do they think they are heading?

Yours, etc.,

A. VERDON-ROE.

The writer thinks that the present condition of the world, the wholesale destruction of war, the chaos which must be the aftermath; show where the financial rulers of the world were heading.

The editor commented on this letter in the usual footnote:—

(Sir Alliott leaves us unrepentant. He says that Mr. Roosevelt's methods are wrong and that his own are right. We are happy to know that our standard of living, our employment and our Credit are all far better than those of the unfortunate countries that have listened to their currency experimenters.—Ed.).

We would like our Socialist comrades to state their view of these proposals, and to discuss whether they expect to use a social credit note, a labour note, or no means of exchange under the Socialist Commonwealth. Thorough discussion of this question is invited.

PASTORAL SYMPHONY

BY LADY DUNN

Just as the character of writers can usually be discovered from their books — so the character of a great musician and composer is felt in his music.

Let us then consider Beethoven—as shown us in his great Pastoral Symphony.

The "Pastoral" could equally happily have been called the "Country" symphony—for it describes a long walk taken through the countryside around Vienna—and Beethoven's reactions during that walk.

Beethoven wrote on the top of the score—of the first movement "Cheerful thoughts on arriving in the country."

He was not always cheerful—and he had much to make him otherwise—but evidently even to arrive in the country raised his spirits and we shall now start off with him, in spirit only of course for Beethoven usually walked alone—the chattering of companions proving too disturbing to his thoughts.

The first movement of the symphony is cheerful and continuous. When one sets out for a given beauty spot—there are usually several miles of rather common-place countryside to cover before reaching it.

"No one could describe the first movement of the symphony as "common-place" but it is of simple charm—the air is fresh—one feels cheerful and eager-inclined to take off one's hat and keep step as it were with the spring wind blowing over the rather flat countryside —not to dwadle, but rather to work off one's first walking enthusiasm."

And then comes the second or slow movement.

And here we arrive at a beauty spot—a wood—a cluster of trees—trees bedecked with the first beauty of pale green leaves—a little stream crystal clear with tiny trout playing amongst the rocks—a bank covered with moss under birch trees—inviting one to rest as the sun trickles through the branches.

With a sigh of happiness Beethoven sinks to the bank — stretches himself, and finally lying flat on his back with his arms over his head relaxes—but, not for long, for soon to his sensitive ears comes a "song."

It comes to our ears too—We call it the "rippling of water" and leave it at that—but to Beethoven—it is something much more and soon the beautiful second movement of the great symphony is born in the lovely music called "Beside the Brook."

Over and over again the song of the little brook repeats itself in this movement—it is almost as if Beethoven himself after writing it said, "It is very beautiful—we will have it again!" and so it goes on and on—to his, and our great satisfaction.

Lying back once more he remains so still—so full of thought that a tiny quail running out nearly stumbles over that quiet figure and disappears with a startled cry—a nightingale from a low thicket breaks into song—and a cuckoo flying overhead gives the cry which is perhaps the sweetest of all spring songs.

Beethoven smiles—takes out his notebook—and those three birds become Immortal! for wherever this great symphony is heard there too will be heard the song of these birds—in dull war-stained concert halls in darkest winter months—on gramophone records played under goodness knows what conditions—"close your eyes, relax, and forget! for here we have spring and fresh air—the song of the brook and birds prove it."

Then the very human side of the great master appears—for Beethoven after his long walk and rest is hungry.

He finds his way to a nearby village inn—and the third movement of the symphony is given over to what happens there.

Seated at a little table after ordering his favourite dinner (a fish and bottle of sweet wine) Beethoven takes out his old pipe and looks round.

He finds himself surrounded by the Austrian counterpart of "jitterbugs"—when asked "What is a jitterbug?" the answer should be course be "Someone who, when they hear music, cannot sit still!"

Jitterbugs are not common—only in the United States—they abounded in Austria during Beethoven's lifetime.

Seeing a stranger—or even perhaps recognising Beethoven — for a time these young people also dining at the inn kept their high spirits in bounds—then the effects of the great tankards of cider which they had drunk with their dinner plus the playing of their own rude musical instruments (under the table softly to begin with) proved too much—and very soon they were all dancing merrily.

One might have thought—that this "noise," this "common music" would have filled the great Beethoven with disgust—that he would have clapped his hat on his head—pressed it down and strode away perhaps even without paying his bill!

To the confounding of all "musical snobs," nothing of the sort happened.

Beethoven enjoyed the dancing—he enjoyed the music—one feels he would have been pleased if some pretty girl had summed up sufficient courage to have invited him to dance.

No one did—but out came his note book again—and that merry dancing and music with its syncopated rhythm—its wierd little instruments—are all put in the third movement of the "Pastoral Symphony."

And then!

After the simplicity of the first movement—the loveliness of the second—the frivolity of the third—comes magnificent grandeur.

The effect of a good dinner—which Mozart always found so helpful to inspiration—brings from Beethoven one of the greatest pieces of descriptive music ever written—for what is there in nature to match the awe inspiring grandeur of a thunderstorm?

And so, breaking in on the little peasants' "Merrymaking" comes the distant rumble of thunder—the pattering of heavy raindrops—these mixed with the scurrying feet of people hurriedly taking in the small tables and running for shelter—and none too soon! for a great storm breaks in wild fierceness—flash after flash of lightning—and claps of thunder in increasing violence—until with body and soul drenched—the one with rain—the other with music—an exultation seldom reached takes hold of one—even as the storm having reached its height recedes in the distance—blowing up again for one final crash as the blue sky begins to reappear.

Instinctively and with Beethoven — one stands up and rejoices.

The walk home through the same countryside is accomplished to a "Hymn of Thanksgiving" which welling up in Beethoven's great heart overflows into our own.

This is the story of the "Pastoral Symphony."

WAR: "THREE VIEW POINTS"

NON-PACIFIST.

The Christian . . . cannot regard any war as a "Christian war" or as a "holy war," for no war can be holy, though the object with which a particular nation undertakes it may be just. There is only one holy war—that against sin. . . . No Christian can fight, as those serving with modern fighting forces are obliged to fight, save (as it seems to me) with extreme reluctance, sustained by a strong sense of duty, and the personal conviction that, in all the circumstances, no other course is morally possible for him. And when a Christian says he cannot fight, because his conscience will not allow him to kill his brother; then in my opinion such a man's decision should be accepted, and he should be able to count on the support and sympathetic understanding of fellow-Christians who take another view. . . .

The Church . . . must not hesitate, if occasion arises, to condemn the bombing of civilian populations quite outside the military zone by the military forces of its own nation. It should set itself against the propaganda of lies and hatred. It should oppose any war of extermination or enslavement, and any measures directly aimed at destroying the morale of a population. . . .

The Churches . . . should counteract and subdue vindictiveness, hatred and lust of power and the desire for retaliation. Their supreme loyalty will be to Christ. The greatest service which the Church can render is to remain steadfast and loyal to its Lord and to test all claims of national interest rigorously by His Gospel. It is not the Church's function to say ditto to the state.

—The Bishop of Chichester: Christianity and World Order, p. 82/7 (Penguin).

MILITARIST.

It must be clearly realised that the decisive sphere of Total War is the mental sphere. A Nation whose mind is not made up to fight is already half defeated. . . . Total war . . . is warfare in which every possible means is utilised to produce the earliest possible achievement of the sole object of war: Victory. . . . Moral and ethical questions have no validity in Total War except in so far as their maintenance or destruction contributes towards ultimate Victory. Expediency, not morality, is the sole criterion of human conduct in Total War.

—Dennis Wheatley: Total War, p. 17/18 (Hutchinson).

PACIFIST.

Once embarked on war (with its necessities of conscription and propaganda) you must be dishonest, you must override the rights of neutrals, and the rights of conscience; you must tell lies about your opponent's doings, while you whitewash your own; you must make unclean treaties to reconcile divergent interests and win fresh alliances; committed to the arbitrament of physical force, over a dispute which you loudly proclaim to be a moral one, you must—if you would contend successfully—be ready to do all kinds of moral wrong. It seems to me absolutely hypocritical to say that you can hope to win a war without throwing to the winds the bulk of the moral laws which man has made and ascribed to God.

Therefore, I don't see how God can be the God of battles . . . or how we can hope to improve our position by asking Him to take a hand in it. It is an ugly, dirty, dishonest business. You may . . . embark on war for a just cause; but you cannot wage war justly, or make a just peace. . . .

In the middle ages . . . the Pope used on occasion to say "you must" or "you mustn't" to the Temporal rulers of Christendom, choosing their wars for them and, when they disobeyed, visiting them with spiritual punishment. Now he no longer does so. That seems to me symptomatic of the gradual substitution of Nation-worships for a form of Christianity which (whatever might be its defects) did top the world, and command a wide allegiance. But the position, as I now see it, is that the bulk of people who call themselves Christians do really place Country first and Christianity second, making patriotism their God. And by patriotism I mean, "My Country, right or wrong." . . .

Christ, it seems to me, is dying out of Institutional religion—in which He feels Himself no longer to be true. But in hearts outside Institutional religion—which can give the cup of cold water He needs—He will again "come true."

—Laurence Housman (writing to Dick Sheppard): What Can We Believe? pp.71/2, 119 (Religious Book Club).

DUKE OF BEDFORD.

On December 21, our colleague, the Duke of Bedford celebrates his 54th birthday. Were he an ordinary member of the aristocracy, the society papers would be full of "small-talk" concerning his social and political interests. But he is opposed to war and a man of radical and liberal thought. He associates with Anarchists, Socialists, and Freethinkers, without losing his own Christian faith, and without seeking to curb the minds and thoughts of others. His fearless speeches in the House of Lords, now so much despised, belong to history and will live, when the contemporary clap-trap of his critics is forgotten, or recalled as the generalised error of the tragic past. He celebrates his birthday by adding to his reputation as the outstanding pacifist pamphleteer of our time with his new pamphlet, "If I Were Prime Minister."

Titles are of moment only in class society and even then they can grow small in value. But the Duke possesses the virtues of courage, simplicity, and integrity: and he believes in the power of the word over the sword. This makes him a peer among peers, and probably against peers.

FALSEHOOD IN WAR TIME

A STUDY IN FIGURES

By ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE.

It is a great pity that Truth should become the first casualty in war-time, and that the policy of lying should be accepted by the Nations as the first essential principle for war propaganda purposes. Yet, it is natural that this should be so, as wars are founded on Lies. War-mongers can only successfully prosecute their propaganda so long as they can rely upon the People swallowing their Lies, for War and Truth are as far apart from each other as Darkness is from Light.

In the present war the People have much opportunity of uncovering falsehood, for the war Liars have overstepped themselves over and over again. It would seem, however, that the People have become so accustomed to the war Lie, that no longer do they care.

The case of the German-Russian war brings to light to what length Lies can be stretched. A pity it surely is that our Russian Ally should be so mendacious in its war propaganda. For a careful study of Russian war propaganda since Hitler invaded Russia in June, 1941, aptly proves that we have in Russia a Lying Ally.

In an Editorial on 7th November, 1941, the Glasgow Evening Citizen wrote at length on the "reliability" of the Russian communiques. It was pointed out that the Russians have never "concealed the truth," that they have never "put a gloss on reverses or imagined victories." And so credulous had the Editor of the Citizen become at that time that he was led to add, "We have come to believe the Russians" and that "Stalin's view of the war will not be met with scepticism and downright unbelief."

From subsequent editorials in the same journal the Editor has revealed that he was wrong. As it is, in the very issue of the Citizen where the Editor lauds Russia for its "reliability," a U.S.A. Senator is reported as stating that Stalin's word is not to be trusted!

The Citizen again for 20th June, 1942, declares "The Germans are such liars," but again subsequently the same journal has had to admit that the Germans were not liars on the very points to which the Citizen directed the attention of its readers that the Germans were "such liars."

Let us now have a sample of Soviet Lying!

On June 23 last there appeared in many of our dailies the "Official Soviet Figures" of the German losses for a year, from June 1941, to June 1942. Stalin claimed that the Germans had lost 10,000,000 men killed, wounded and prisoners. The figure given by Stalin of German dead was 3,500,000. The figures of the loss of material were also given. However, the Citizen by June 1942, seemed to have changed its opinion about Russian "reliability" and about Stalin being a Truth-teller so very much, that the Citizen refused to publish Stalin's figures of the German losses, namely, 10,000,000, as claimed by Comrade Stalin. Other journals also, including the Glasgow Herald, The Scotsman, and such "reliable" dailies, did not publish Stalin's "official" figures. The claim of Stalin was so suspect that it was boycotted by scores of dailies, although the figures did appear in many newspapers, such as the Daily Express and like "sensational" dope-suppliers.

In the same list Stalin stated that the Russian losses in the Russo-German war since June 1941 were 4,500,000 killed, wounded and prisoners. But the queer thing about that 4,500,000 figure is that it was the same figure given by Stalin in November 1941 of Germany's losses in the same war from June, 1941, to November 1941 (Authority, Glasgow Herald, 7/11/41).

Stalin, it would seem, in arranging to spread the Lie that Germany had lost 10,000,000 men in a year's war with Russia (a Lie that the Citizen would not accept!) seems to have gone back to November for a figure for his own losses: he taking the figure which previously he had laid against Germany for German losses from June to November 1941!

The good British patriot must always understand that Germany's losses are always three times more than Russia's losses. It matters not whether the Russians are advancing or retreating (they are mostly accustomed to the latter!), the German losses are always highest. The true British patriot must always conclude that Stalin speaks the Truth: that Stalin's word is "reliable," when the Official Soviet Communique comes out with the information of a three-to-one loss against Germany every time.

Now, let us hearken to Mr. Churchill. Mr. Churchill contradicts comrade Stalin, for on May 10 the Premier stated he believed that the Germans had lost up to that time (June 1941 to May 1942) 2,000,000 men. Of course, Mr. Churchill could not prove his figure. For Mr. Churchill knows no more about it than does Mr. Aldred. All that Mr. Churchill or Comrade Stalin can know of German losses is the figure of prisoners, and that is all that Hitler can know of Russian or British losses. The Glasgow Herald for 22nd June states "So far Hitler has lost 2,000,000 men in Russia." But at that time Stalin gave the Glasgow Herald the "Official Soviet Figures," showing that the Germans had lost 10,000,000 men, 3,500,000 of them being dead. But the Glasgow Herald, as we have stated, declined to insert that Stalin claim which appeared in other journals on June 23 and 24.

Now, Stalin has claimed that 3,500,000 Germans were killed in twelve months in Russia. Mr. Churchill states the figure of German losses for approximately the same period was 2,000,000. Let us say that these 2,000,000 were killed. We now come to Hitler, and he should know what his own losses are.

In the Glasgow Herald (3/7/42) and the Citizen (2/7/42) there appears a German official statement on German losses in Russia.

From June 22 to June 21, 1941-42, the Germans say that their killed numbered 271,000. The number missing (prisoners and not found) is given as 65,730.

Thus Stalin says 3,500, German dead: Churchill says 2,000,000 German dead, and Hitler says 271,000 German dead.

It is perfectly evident that Stalin deliberately lies on the subject: that Churchill is merely guessing and giving vent to wishful thinking, and that Hitler may be telling the truth. As it is, what we have already said surely clearly reveals that Russia is Our Lying Ally.

Surely commonsense should convince anyone that the Army that is mostly always retreating or being driven back will suffer more heavily than the Army that is driving an enemy back. When an Army is retreating it is running away. The Army that is chasing those that run away has every advantage, especially in modern warfare where planes are used to bomb the retreating enemy. We know from experience in France and at Dunkirk what happened to the British and French Armies as they retreated. We have been told all about it: how Germany's dive-bombers slaughtered the men wholesale.

It is the same in Russia!

To say that the Russians in their continual retreat from June 1941, till winter came to effect a halt on the Germans, and afterwards when the Germans again took the offensive in Russia, up to June 1942, accounted for 10,000,000 Germans, is surely the height of absurdity! Surely mendacity could not reach higher!

CHRISTIANITY, MILITARISM, and ESPIONAGE

CONCERNING 18B—AND A STORY FROM 1918

The recent discussions on 18B, the rabid "Second Front" propaganda of the cowardly and despicable stay-at-home hireling militarists of the Communist Party, direct attention to the dangerous nature of war-time clamour. Lady Astor uttered the simple truth as to the part played by Stalin in the war and immediately is denounced at "inspired" Communist Party gatherings of workers as the author of "irresponsible, mischievous, dangerous and subversive" statements. The Beaverbrook press feature these worthless and unprincipled denunciations to seal the alliance between Lord Beaverbrook and William Gallacher. What a world! This pretence of hysteria is the comedy which hides from understanding the tragedy of our times.

The recent debate on the 18B Regulation in the House of Commons shows how impossible it is for people to think clearly on current wrong. Commander Bower is right unquestionably in his expressed view that a large number of perfectly innocent, inoffensive, and loyal citizens are being detained illegally to cover up the dereliction of possibly six persons who may be a menace. Our comrade, R. R. Stokes, of the Labour Party Peace Aims Group, is right when he characterises as outrageous the cowardly animosity displayed against the unfortunate detaines. Maxton made a persuasive speech, asking Herbert Morrison to "liberate every person possible." But no one seems to think that the principle of 18B is thoroughly and completely wrong. Commander Sir Archibald Southby made an excellent speech, quoting effectively Blackstone, and showing how the common people had been tricked in the alleged amendment of the original declaration. The fraud exposed by Sir Archibald Southby literally takes ones breath away on reflection. We can all recall the storm in the House of Commons. The original discussion was summarised in these columns at the time. M.P.s protested. The national press pretended to protest. The regulations were amended. We were told that the Law Officers of the Crown had embodied the principles of the amendments. Yet, later, the Highest Court in the land declared that no actual amendment had been made. In this debate, Herbert Morrison, who was opposed to the original regulations, soberly advised the House that no amendment was intended. He said this rejoicingly and aggressively. But the House accepted this attitude, which means that, at the beginning of these regulations and their discussion, the parliamentary opposition and the newspaper noisiness was undiluted mockery and humbug. No one said 18B was wrong and unnecessary. But we tell our readers in the country, in both Houses of Parliament, and on the Government Benches, that 18B is unnecessary precisely because it is wrong and violates a fundamental principle of justice and human liberty. War is bad enough without the added fundamental negation of an inherent right of human liberty constitutionally registered only by the heroism and struggle of the best and bravest of our ancestors. We are jealous of their struggle and their legacy.

Many of our 18B internees have been Fascists and some adhere to the ideas of Fascism. This fact makes many critics wonder at our opposition to the internments. We are advised that there are limits to toleration. One Freethinker refers us to the Utilitarian doctrine of the Victorian Rationalists. We are not in love with Utilitarianism and prefer the radical libertarianism of Richard Carlile. We believe that liberty can take care of itself and that democracy does not need to pay Fascism the tribute of imitation. Fascism is an evil thing and ought to be renounced. Its ways are no less evil when camouflaged as decrees of democracy afraid of destruction. Under cover of such decrees Fascism creeps into the decencies of the Commonwealth and destroys its virtue. Then principle surrenders to power.

Our opposition to 18B is based on the fact that we believe that the liberty of the citizen is a legal right to be maintained and defended in times of orisis and clamour, and not a fancy exhibition of alleged freedom to be pronounced and toyed with in periods of comparative calm, when the Executive of the day has no intention of challenging the citizen's right. We believe that umbrellas — and constitutional rights are citizens' umbrellas—are for use on rainy days and not on clear ones. The importance of this truth can be illustrated by a reference to the United States in the year 1918. Time and place permit us to discuss the facts, and so to illustrate our contention, without rousing prejudice.

The year 1918 opened by a declaration of the Kaiser, that the preservation of Christianity was the issue at stake in the great conflict, and that he was on the side of Christianity. He elevated God to the high command of the German army and avowed that "God's hand is seen to prevail." Woodrow Wilson, in the name of the United States, speaking officially and Lloyd George, in the name of England, replied to the Kaiser by announcing that the English-speaking democracies were trusting in heaven. In the United States, the bond salesmen and managers of the Liberty Loans prepared statements for the press saying, like their enemy the Kaiser, that Christianity was at stake. Governor Lowden, of Illinois, announced at a meeting of ministers that the war was "a conflict between the spiritual resources of the world and the national resources of the world." The United States represented the spiritual resources. Wall Street stood for Jesus of Nazareth. The Kaiser represented the material resources. His was the cause of Woden. And so it was proposed to make Onward, Christian Soldiers the battle hymn of the United States' Army, on the ground that the American forces were "the reserve forces of the Almighty." The press throughout the great republic pictured United States' soldiers singing and playing Onward, Christian soldiers throughout all the streets of the cities of Europe, in the belief that "it will proclaim everywhere that America has a divine objective."

Henry Watterson of the "Louisville Courier-Journal", declared that "the Kaiser never appeals to Christ." So far as words went, this simply was not true. George Washington did not appeal to Christ. Abraham Lincoln did not appeal to Christ. Neither Washington nor Lincoln believed in militarism. Each took to the sword with loathing and both assumed power with diffidence and a stern determination to surrender it back to the people. They were each superior, in personal dignity and worth, to the Kaiser. And they did not employ the term "Christ" as a charm or a name of jargon to be played with for military purposes. The Kaiser did. He beat Woodrow Wilson at the game of appearing pious. Thus the American journalist was talking nonsense in the name of patriotism: nonsense and falsehood.

The American Expeditionary Forces were getting into action in 1918. United States conversation tended everywhere to be war-talk. Philosophy and intelligence were at a discount. Henry Watterson had to make headlines somehow. It never occurred to him to splash the Truth across his pages. He might have said that a War Lord could not express the spirit and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. He might have denounced the Kaiser's appeal to Christ as moral blasphemy. This would have been to think. It was beyond him. He preferred the lie: the Kaiser never appealed to Christ!

Woodrow Wilson pleased the Christian Ministers throughout the United States by distributing small editions of the gospel to the American Expeditionary Forces. On each fly leaf he had caused a piety paragraph to be reproduced. According to Henry Watterson this was appealing to Christ. But the Kaiser slept with a New Testament on the lightstand by his bed. He told the first gathering of German chaplains to the front: "We must make Christ the ideal of our practical life." At Christmastide, 1917, Elsie, the fair daughter of Field Marshal von Hindenburg, later to become President of the German Republic and the inaugurator of Hitler's regime, sent to the soldiers fighting under her father, a hymn which read as follows:—

"Christ Jesus gave his life for me;
From every debt I now am free.
He has procured the Father's favor,
He has become my gracious Savior.

"He to the bayonet thrust gives vigor,
The joy to aim, to pull the trigger.
My aid is Jesus, that I know—
On to the foe, on to the foe!"

The New York "Sun" quoted the first two lines of the second stanza, and lamented Elsie's state of mind. The "Sun" added that the words showed "the extent of the revolution which must take place in German sentiment before any discussion can be possible between Germans and Americans."

The lines are crude and the sentiment an outrage. But the "Sun's" comment was humbug. United States Clergymen made Jesus a man of war from the first day that the United States entered the war. That was said to be patriotism. So was Elsie von Hindenburg's atrocious hymnology in German.

A Los Angeles divine asserts that Jesus was the man who "put fist into pacifist. A pious pun, but hardly a Christian sentiment.

"The Christian Register" was, and is, one of the most reactionary papers published in the United States. The pious editor referred to Jesus as the "Christ of Anger and action — a Christ who will fight and kill." He exclaimed, in ecstasy:—

"How glorious is that LASHING FURY of Jesus Christ, who would take bayonet and hand grenade and bomb and rifle, and do the work of deadliness."

To please this editor, and his readers, the United States' Government, with President Wilson's approval shipped 400,000 Testaments, purchased from the Bible Society, to American soldiers in Europe. The Government sent the Testament to American Citizens in arms abroad, and the United States Courts sent citizens at home to jail for quoting and believing in the Testament. Which brings us, at last, to the crux of the story.

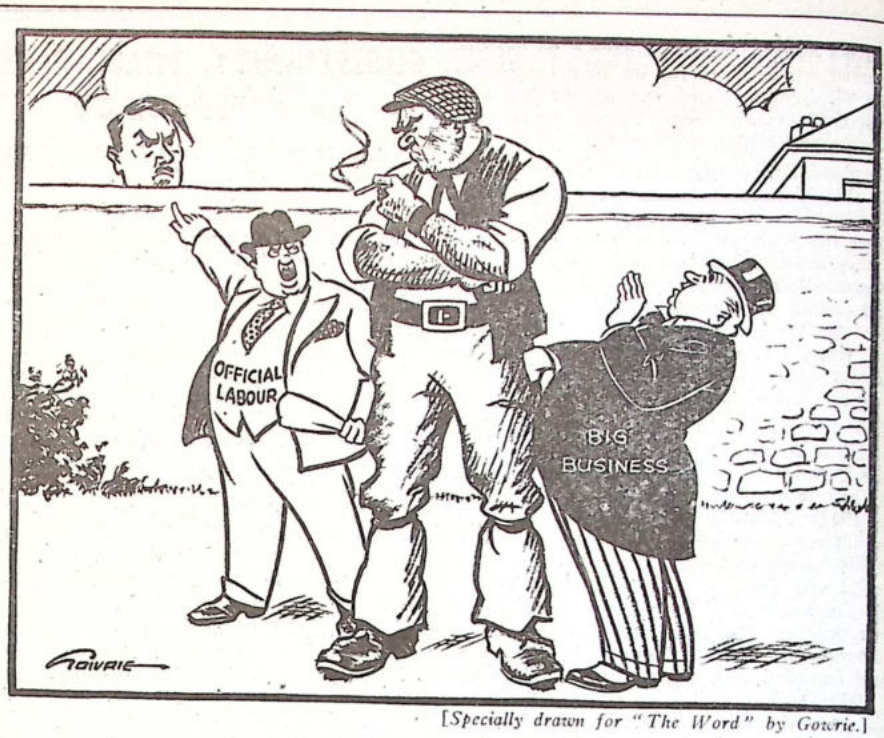
In Los Angeles, the Rev. Floyd Hardin, the Rev. Robert Whitaker, and a Quaker theological student, named Harold Storey, were sentenced each to six months in the county jail and $1,200 fine. Storey had said, with justice, that it was "difficult for many Christians to conceive of the Carpenter of Nazareth thrusting a bayonet into the breast of a brother."

The prosecuting attorney, demanding Storey's conviction, fiercely quoted as true Christian teaching "But these mine enemies, bring hither and slay them before me."

Whitaker and Hardin shared Storey's sentiments. A stupid Court, in all the glory of its legal pomp, decided that they were degrading Christianity by using it as a cloak for disloyalty!

In "The Truth Seeker", New York, the National Freethinker weekly, for April 13, 1918, Dr Bowden, Associate Editor of that journal with George E. MacDonald, took issue with Governor Lowden's doctrine that the God of the Kaiser and the God of Joshua were different and opposed deities. Under the heading, "THE CLERGY ARRAIGNED", Professor Bowden wrote:—

"We have carefully compared the reputed offenses of the German emperor with the hideous doings of God as related in the Bible, and there seems to be but one conclusion to draw from the comparison, and it is this: The former received his inspiration from a careful study of the performance of the latter. Indeed, it is well known that the Prussian generals who published books explanatory of the German idea of war, based their notions directly upon the lessons they had learned from a very painstaking study of the Holy Scriptures. And it is also well to note that not one of these German works has been answered from the biblican standpoint which forms the groundwork for their authority."



[Specially drawn for "The Word" by Goivrie.]

Look! There's your enemy.

Thereupon, the New York postmaster, the Hon. Mr. Patten, dropped "The Truth Seeker" a note saying that the Solicitor of the postoffice Department, the Hon. W. H. Lamar of Washington, had pronounced "The Truth Seeker" of April, 1918, unmailable under the Espionage Act!

Under the Espionage Act! Six weeks of enquiry passed. Editor George E. MacDonald wrote the Hon. Solicitor. The latter answered all correspondence promptly and politely. But he refused to say wherein "The Truth Seeker" had offended.

At last, a happy letter caused Mr. Lamar to relent and to explain.

Mr. MacDonald pointed out that it grieved him to be accused of disloyalty without having it explained to him wherein he had offended, since he had never intended disloyalty. He was a member of a Liberty Loan Committee in his own town and could account personally for sales amounting to $6,000. On the date that his paper was suppressed, he was doing work for the American Red Cross. His ancestral blood had soaked American soil from Bunker Hill to Bull Run. His two sons were serving overseas and so the Service Flag decorated the windows of his home. Was he the kind of a citizen to have his his loyalty inpeached in this insidious and anonymous denunciation by some unknown scribe whose American history dated from the arrival of the emigrant ship from which he came ashore at Ellis Island.

The Hon. Solicitor replied that in view of what MacDonald had said, there would be no proceedings, and while it was not the general practice of his office to indicate to publishers particular matter appearing in an issue of a publication regarded as non-mailable by the Department under the Espionage Act, he would advise MacDonald that the paragraph from the Professor's article formed the basis of the ruling of the Department!

So that was it. A citizen was guilty of espionage—that is to say, he was a spy of the enemy, or gave him aid and comfort — who argued that the Kaiser derived his inspiration and example from the intense nationalism of the Old Testament and the Old Testament conception of God.

Which explains why we do not believe in supreme power of decision of arbitrary arrest being placed in the hands of the Executive.

LEIGH FISHER SENTENCED

On Thursday, November 5, our Comrade Leigh Fisher, of Burnbank, was committed to Edinburgh Prison by the decision of the High Court of Justiciary. His appeal against his conviction at the Hamilton Sheriff Court, on July 23 last, when he was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for refusing medical examination was dismissed.

Fisher took his stand as a political and moral objector and stressed his Socialism. He was removed from the C.O. register by the S.W. Scotland No. 2 Tribunal. The Appellate upheld this decision. He was sentenced in November, 1941, to 30 days for refusing medical examination. He was prosecuted in January and took his first stated case on May 27, 1942. The details of his appeals will be discussed fully later. Fisher conducted them in person. His case is being raised in parliament and we prefer to postpone discussion.

Reports of his Tribunals and first conviction appeared in these columns for August and December, 1941.

We incline to the opinion that when Fremiet designed the wonderful little statue of "The Gorilla and the Woman," he had a prophetic vision of the ravaging of civilisation by the ruthless tyrants who are directly responsible for the present situation.

LABOUR AND WAR

A Protest Against Inhuman Slaughter Made in a House of Commons Speech.

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

The following speech was made by our comrade, Rhys J. Davies, during the debate on the King's Speech.—Ed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, December 2, 1942.

Mr. Rhys Davies (Westhoughton): I have listened to most of this Debate and confess that I am considerably heartened by the tone of some of the speeches. This is the first occasion since this war began when I have heard it even suggested that we are not far away from peace in Europe. It would give me great joy and delight if that suggestion could be substantiated. Once again I hope the House will bear with me, because I take a minority view on most of these international problems. Incidentally, this could not be a Parliament at all unless it were ready to listen to minority opinions. Thirty Members of the House and myself have tabled an Amendment to the Address in reply to the Gracious Speech. The four main points we wanted to deal with were briefly these: First, the amplification and clarification of the Atlantic Charter—a matter which has been referred to already by other speakers. The problem of making progress in democratic government in the Colonies. Then, we demand that something should be said about independence for India. Finally, we come to the main point which I want to deal with, to-day, taking up the challenge that I have found in some of the speeches in this Debate regarding what is to happen internationally at the close of the war.

I hope I may be forgiven, as one who does not know very much about foreign affairs, except what I have learned by travel. I have met a great number of statesmen on my journeys abroad. I would like to make one observation on that score. I trust that no Member in this Huse will envisage a world in which Great Britain, America, Russia and China will be on one side in a comity together, inciting into existence another group of hostile Powers on the other, and so divide the world into two great camps when the conflict is over. I have been very pleased from time to time with some of the speeches of our Foreign Secretary, in which he has made it clear that his mind does not travel that way. I would like to emphasise it. There is no hope for peace in Europe after the war unless Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Russia can all work together. I know it is unpopular to say that now, but the day will come when it will not be so. In the speech that he delivered some time ago the right hon. Gentleman made the point, if I remember rightly, that if you bankrupt one great nation in Europe, you might bring other great nations down to bankruptcy in the process. I have not liked some of the contrary sentiments expressed in the Debate to-day, on that score.

Let me turn to some observations which have been made suggesting that we should not bother about post-war problems at all until the war is won. That suggestion has been made fairly often of late. Let us remind ourselves that General Smuts, broadcasting recently to the Dutch in their own language when he was in this country, made a very firm declaration that the United Nations should say something more than is contained in the Atlantic Charter. Our own Ambassador in Madrid, the right hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir S. Hoare) delivered a speech in his constituency some time ago when he was over here, demanding exactly what I have been trying to demand, namely, a clearer statement of peace aims. When Mr. Wendell Wilkie comes to speak on the Atlantic Charter he is very frank to our Government. I know America fairly well, and I would not be surprised when peace is made that Mr. Wendell Wilkie may then be the President of the United States of America. That is possible, and, therefore, there is no sense in not listening to Mr. Wendell Wilkie. He is very blunt on this subject: he calls for much more than is contained in the Atlantic Charter. What does the Atlantic Charter presume? It presumes that Great Britain, America, Russia and China will be powerful enough to disarm Italy, Japan and Germany and keep them in subjection for good.

Mr. Muff (Hull, East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman says "Hear, hear." Let me combat that sentiment.

God forbid that anything untoward should happen to our country, but if it should, does the hon. Member think that anybody could keep the British in subjection? Does he think we can keep the Germans in permanent subjection?

Mr. Muff: Yes.

Mr. Davies: Then I must be much more British than the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Muff: I am not one of the Herrenvolk.

Mr. Davies: I challenge that philosophy.

You cannot keep the Germans, the French or the Italians down for good. As a matter of fact, the attempt has been made for centuries to keep 4,500,000 Irishmen down, and you have failed to do that. I am sure nobody could keep the Welsh down for long. Hon. Members must therefore bear in mind that you can never keep any nation down against its will, and it is all nonsense to say that the United Nations to which we belong shall some day subject the whole world with which we disagree, and keep them in subjection for all time.

I hope hon. Gentlemen will forgive me but I have lived too long to be influenced by propaganda from either side. I have sat on too many commissions and signed my name to Reports too often to be much affected by the Beveridge Report, the Scott Report or the Uthwatt Report either.

Let me bring hon. Gentlemen up against one fact of the new world they are talking about. What of the new world we have already started? How many Members of this House are satisfied with letters from discharged soldiers who have been refused any pension. What about starting the new world there? No, if we want to build a new Jerusalem we have got to do something other than issuing Reports, and in consequence I shall be very interested to see what is to happen to these Reports, especially the Beveridge Report, in due course.

Hon. Gentlemen have been talking glibly about winning this war and the effect on this country of the victory. Let me bring their attention to Lancashire. There are other hon. Gentlemen here who know more about that county than I do, but I have represented a Lancashire constituency almost longer than anybody here. I ask the House to look at the effects of the last war on this country. Even when we win a war, the conflict damages trade, commerce, and our financial relationships with other countries. These are a few figures about what happened to the largest single export commodity in our country. In 1913, before the last war, the number of textile operatives employed in Lancashire was 711,000. We won the last war, we beat Germany, but the Lancashire textile industry suffered, not because we won the war, but because of the war, so that the 711,000 operatives were reduced, before the beginning of this war, to 390,000. That is what war does to our nation. An hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Let me add another point. This country to which we belong is the last in the world that can afford to go to war. Every time we go to fight, other nations to which we have been supplying commodities learn to manufacture those goods themselves. I understand that the United States of America are now supplying the goods which in the past we have sent from Lancashire to the South American Republics.

I do not wish to detain the House too long. I feel rather deeply about this problem of war. I am opposed to war. [An Hon. Member: "So are we all."] I hope you are, but the way to oppose war is to try to prevent it, and when you are at war to endeavour to get out of it as soon as you can. [Interruption.] It might be a very simple philosophy of mine, but I think Gandhi is a greater benefactor of mankind than the most efficient general of the day. I hope I may not be thought impertinent if I say too that St. Francis of Assisi did more to elevate mankind than any admiral in history.

So far as I know, there have been about 3,000 wars since Christ was born: there were 18 wars between the last great war and this: and war has never, as an instrument of policy, settled any problem satisfactorily to mankind. Indeed, wars create more problems by far than they set out to solve. Our chief aim at the outbreak of the last war was to destroy German militarism. We never aimed at the destruction of the Turkish or the Hapsburg Empire or to give more power to the Serbs, or, indeed, to create a national home for the Jews. The one aim we started out for, namely, the destruction of German militarism, we never achieved at all. Then only a few of the 14 Points of the late Mr. Wilson were put into operation. In short, I want humanity to win this time. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman should be offended at what I say. I hope my other hon. Friends will not mind what I am saying.

I have been in this Labour Party from its very beginning. I was there to start it. This party was formed for two main reasons. One was to try to abolish poverty, and I am proud that it has achieved so much in the abolition of poverty. Any hon. Gentleman who wants to know what has been achieved to the glory of Parliament, and especially of this Labour Party, might look at the census of the London County Council of the homeless on the Embankment and under the arches of this great city; and he will find that the social services we have established have made a vast difference to human well-being. This party has no meaning as a party, however, unless it has an international attitude towards things: unless it has something to say that will prevent wars. I object to the Hitlers, the Mussolinis, the Roosevelts and the militarists everywhere, men of 40 and 50 and over calling upon boys of 18 and 20 to do their foul work for them. I protest in the name of the common man against war as a means of trying to settle international problems.

> "The song of hate is a song of hell;
> And some there be who sing it well."

That is what one of your own poets says, and I say "Amen" to that. As I say, I feel strongly on these things; and I hope the House will pardon my feelings. I have, as already stated, travelled a great deal of this world. Wherever I have gone I have found men and women just the same everywhere. Only a few take nations to war. I am not so sure, however, that the great statesmen now in power—Roosevelt, Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, and our own Prime Minister—will be in power when the peace comes. I care not, however, what anybody thinks of what I say about war. I was elected to Parliament 21 years ago because I opposed the last war, and I am not going to sell my principles for the applause of the crowd in a passing phase like this conflict. This war will come to an end like every other war, and, in spite of the glowing promises which are now made, I venture to predict that this war, like the rest, will make the poor poorer and the rich richer—that it will make the rich richer at the expense of the poverty of the poor. Finally, I detest war and protest once again, if I may, in the name of the common man throughout the world against the damage done to the soul of mankind by this insane slaughter.

GERALD HENDERSON

Dear Sir,—In your October issue you were good enough to include a letter from me drawing attention to two severe cases of "cat and mouse" treatment of conscientious objectors. Gerald Henderson of West Hartlepool, a religious objector, had been court-martialled five times, his fifth sentence being one of 15 months' imprisonment. I am glad to say that Gerald Henderson has now made his sixth appearance before a conscientious objectors tribunal and has at last been held to have a genuine conscientious objection to military service.

The success of Gerald Henderson lends added point to the claims of the other man, Stanley Hilton of Rochdale, also a religious objector. Although he has been court-martialled only three times, Stanley Hilton has already served sentences of one year's imprisonment and two years' detention (commuted to seven months') and is now serving a term of two years' imprisonment.

Is it not time to call a halt? The discharge of this man from prison and from the Army would be wise administration, for it must be clear by now that he will never make a soldier and that while in prison he is a complete loss to the community.

Sincerely yours,

FENNER BROCKWAY.

London, November 25, 1942.

The case of Gerald Henderson makes interesting reading and was referred to in these columns for November, 1942. Henderson is aged 25. His record of persecution is as follows:—

REGISTERED AS C.O., December 18, 1939.

LOCAL TRIBUNAL, NEWCASTLE, January 18, 1940. Struck off the C.O. Register.

LONDON APPELLATE upheld Local Tribunal finding, June 12, 1940. Accepted Medical examination. Posted to Royal Engineers, Halifax.

CALLED UP, February 27, 1941. Arrested, April 1. Given 7 days C.B. for ignoring calling-up notice. This was clearly an illegal sentence, contrary to the Acts, since the refusal arose from a conscientious objection.

1st COURT MARTIAL, April 15. Sentenced 28 days detention, Hull Military Prison. The sentence ought to have been civil imprisonment.

2nd (FIELD GENERAL) COURT MARTIAL, June 2. 4 months' civil imprisonment.

APPEALED MANCHESTER TRIBUNAL, June 23. Refused.

3rd (F.G.) COURT MARTIAL, September 7. 6 months' civil imprisonment.

APPEALED MANCHESTER TRIBUNAL, October 16. Refused. Fourth Tribunal. 2nd Tribunal after imprisonment.

4th (F.G.) COURT MARTIAL, February 5, 1942. 7 months civil imprisonment.

APPEALED LONDON APPELLATE TRIBUNAL, April 1. Refused.

5th (F.G.) COURT MARTIAL, 15 months' civil imprisonment, Armley Gaol, Leeds.

The success referred to by Fenner Brockway was conditional registration.

A PATH TO WALK ON

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The appropriate message for the New Year is one of hope and encouragement, and apart from the Christian message, the only real message of hope and encouragement for this stricken world is that which points the way to an early peace.

A stage in the war has been reached when the opposing forces are so evenly matched that an early peace achieved by a decisive military victory for the Allies is in the highest degree unlikely. Even after years of further slaughter and sacrifice there is a considerable probability that the position will be no more favourtble than that of stalemate, while even war experts have admitted that unless the situation with regard to shipping losses improves greatly there is no absolute certainty that it will be possible to avoid defeat.

This prospect should compel every person of intelligence and goodwill to ask himself if there is no better alternative to years of continued war. The alternative, if it exists as a practical way of escape, will obviously have to satisfy the major demands of groups of people with widely different interests, and, since these interests are so very different, it cannot possibly give to every group all that it desires. Axis and Democratic governments; occupied and conquered countries; militarists, pacifists and Jews, will rightly expect to receive something of very definite value; but, for the sake of a greater gain, they must also be prepared to surrender part of what they would have considered a feature of an absolutely ideal settlement.

There are, of course, some persons whose demands cannot be met, even in part—I refer to the financiers who would prolong the war until the shackles of the money-lender have again been rivetted on Europe and to the men and women in well-paid war jobs who do not want the war to end because they are earning comfortable incomes or enjoy a new-found sense of importance which flatters their self-conceit. Some of these persons know the sordid selfishness of their aims and do not try to hide it. Others do try to hide it, anyhow from themselves, by imagining that they are being patriotic or are helping in a great crusade against Axis tyranny.

It is difficult to argue with those who, for the sake of power or personal comfort, are indifferent to the death and wounds of their fellow-countrymen and to the sorrow of the bereaved. Perhaps the only thing that I can do is to ask them the simple question how they think they will feel when they look back on life after old age has robbed them even of the joy of domination over the lives of men? I might also ask them how they will feel when they have to meet the God in whom many of them do not believe but who, for all their unbelief, exists? I am not an old-fashioned Fundamentalist to try and frighten people with threats of hell-fire. Rather would I remind them of one of Studdert Kennedy's poems in which he describes the experience of a man to whom there comes a vision of his judgment. Instead of books, recording angels and a great white throne, this man meets only Christ. Christ's glance penetrates to the inmost recesses of his being, showing him, among other things, all the meanness of his past life. Then He asks him the one short question "Well?"

What is the path which might lead to an early and lasting peace, reconciling, as far as may be, those who at present seem irreconcilable, and asking of none more than is reasonable, bearing in mind their characters and their present aims and outlook? Briefly, it is what may be termed "wise diplomacy."

Wise diplomacy would intimate our willingness to conclude peace on terms fair to all countries, including Axis countries allowing all a share of the world's economic resources proportionate to the needs and numbers of their people together with protection against military and economic aggression and freedom to adopt whatever political régime they desired. Only one fundamental condition would be laid down — that each nation must be prepared to treat its neighbours as it desired to be treated itself.

Would there be anything original about such a suggested basis for peace? Yes, two things. It would be the first time in history that a sincere and perfectly definite proposal had been made for an arrangement whereby all nations would receive a share in the world's economic resources proportionate to their needs and numbers. It would also be the first time that a frank suggestion had been made that each nation should really treat every other nation as it would like to be treated itself, and it would be the first time that there had been a plain intimation of willingness to do this on the part of the country, or countries, making the proposals.

The next question with which wise diplomacy would have to concern itself would be that of securing honest performance of undertakings. This might seem difficult in a world filled with war-hatred and mistrust, but it need not prove so difficult as might be imagined. No matter how much, or how rightly, we may distrust another nation, it is not beyond the power of human intelligence to devise guarantees, conditions, or rights of inspection adequate to secure safety for ourselves and our friends. One thing only would be necessary. If the conditions and rights of inspection which we asked for were very drastic, we would have to show perfect readiness to allow equally drastic safeguards for the benefit of the other side. We must not expect the latter to put themselves at a disadvantage which we would never tolerate for ourselves.

Put bluntly and in homely language, wise diplomacy would say to our present enemies "You can have peace to-morrow on the same general terms as we desire for ourselves and for our Allies—peace with honour, justice and perfect safety. You can have a share in the world's resources proportionate to the needs and numbers of your peoples. Our only condition is that you allow to other nations the same rights and liberties as you ask for yourselves and that, on condition that we grant you equally drastic safeguards, you on your part provide us with the safeguards as to honest performance of your undertakings which we feel compelled to ask. We would further add that you can continue to enjoy peace, justice and friendly relations with us as long as you go on treating other nations as you desire to be treated yourselves. Directly, however, you cease to do this, you will have more war."

What would be the special advantages of this kind of approach to the war problem?

We should for the first time mobilise fully, in our own interests and in the interests of an early peace, the tremendous potential asset of the war-weariness of the Axis peoples. Of the existence of this war-weariness there is ample evidence from non-propaganda sources, just as there is equally ample evidence that at present it is useless to us, because the Axis peoples, like ourselves, have no intention of submitting to defeat and the occupation of their countries by the enemy. Remove from them, however, all fear of such a fate; offer them peace with honour and proper safeguards for our own performance of our undertakings; offer them what they have never yet had—a fair share of the world's resources and freedom from the threat of hostile military alliances and economic warfare; and we should have removed the only real incentive they possess to continue fighting to the bitter end and their rulers' main asset for inducing them to do so.

By this offer we should also place ourselves for the first time in a position of tremendous strength to manoeuvre Axis dictators or governments into a position of great and increasing unpopularity with their own people should they try to behave unreasonably.

There would, incidentally, be no real difficulty in getting information of what we were doing across to the Axis peoples. The ban against listening-in to foreign broadcasts is often ignored and leaflets culd be dropped by aeroplane, not only in Axis countries, but also in all the occupied and neutral countries where Axis troops or civilians are present.

If an Axis dictator were to declare to his people "We cannot trust this offer", our reply to the people would be, "We have not only offered you peace on the fairest possible terms, but we have also expressed our willingness to allow you safeguards as thorough as we ourselves require. What ground, then, exists for this complaint that you cannot trust our offer? We do not ask you to trust our word but to state the conditions which would be acceptable to you as a basis for the mutual performance of actions."

If the dictator refused to restore freedom to some smaller nation, we would say to his people, "Look at your leader! We offer you peace with honour and a fair share of the world's economic resources, and yet he insists upon keeping you at war, simply because he will not grant to other countries what he demands as justice for his own."

If the dictator broke a pledge without reasonable excuse, we would say to his people "You could have continued to enjoy peace and fair treatment merely on condition that reasonable undertakings did not cease to be observed and that other nations were treated as you wished to be treated yourselves. Now, however, your leader appears to insist on plunging you into war once more. Well, we repeat that you can always have peace by observing the fair conditions laid down, but if fair treatment does not satisfy you, we fear that there is no more to be said and hostilities must begin again!"

The other great advantage of a wise diplomatic approach of the kind suggested is that it would remove altogether the difficulty of "trusting" enemy governments, because our relations with them would be based not on trust but on actions. As long as they fulfilled certain specified conditions, there would be peace; directly they ceased to fulfil those conditions, there would be war. After all, it does not so very greatly matter if the head of another nation is a rogue, provided that he can be induced or compelled to refrain from behaving like one!

People who are great believers in the "fight to a finish" policy might be disposed to regard as somewhat unsatisfactory an arrangement which left enemy leaders, whom they considered untrustworthy, still in power, and they might think that it would involve the undesirable burden of the continued maintenance of large armed forces as a protection against possible treachery. They might be thinking in terms of a complete Allied victory after which our soldiers would come back and those who wished to be demobilized would return to their homes and civilian occupations —an arrangement undoubtedly keenly desired by a very large percentage of the members of the Forces. This, however, it must be pointed out, is by no means the plan of the present Government, in the event of victory. They intend that the Allied Nations shall garrison the Axis countries for a generation or two, in order to prevent them from re-arming; while the children of the Axis peoples are to receive an education in our ideas of democracy. This will mean that we shall still have to maintain a gigantic standing army with all the necessary equipment in order that we may be in a position to help in the occupation of countries with hundreds of millions of inhabitants. Soldiers who had returned home after several years of fighting in African deserts, might, after a few weeks' leave, find themselves shipped off for many more years' foreign service in Germany, Bulgaria or Japan; while thousands of schoolmasters, presumably also conscript, would be sent away to the same countries to teach ideals of democracy which, owing to the totalitarian organization made necessary by the "garrison" policy adopted by the Allies, would have largely ceased to exist in their native land! It is therefore obvious that an alternative plan which would not necessitate the exile of so many of our people, should receive serious consideration, especially as there is a first-rate chance that the bitter memories of the war, in combination with the just policy—economic and political—of wise diplomacy, would render possible a general agreement for the progressive reduction of armaments, with, of course, all necessary safeguards.

JARWHARLAL NEHRU AND SOVIET RUSSIA

By KAIKHORSU SHAPURJI SORABJI

A rather depressing feature about the Nationalist Movement in India is the extent to which an undiscriminating and uncritical admiration for Soviet Russia and all its doings has been, by what subtle and occult propagandist means one does not know, injected into the minds of many, especially the younger Indian Nationalists. To such an extent has this ideological infection proceeded that even a man of such outstanding ability, integrity of character and intellectual power as Jawarhalal Nehru has succumbed to it, even to the extent of hailing as brilliant and remarkable achievements things that are literally insignificant compared with what such genuinely democratic and progressively enlightened countries with not a minute fraction of Russia's astronominal resources among the whole lot of them—such as Finland, Denmark, Switzerland, Sweden and Norway have achieved in the way of social amelioration. These countries possess standards of living and amenities that are beyond the wildest dreams of the work-slaves of the Proletarian Paradise. How is it that we hear nothing of the achievements of these lands from the doctrinaires? Is it perchance, because their splendid achievements have been attained without the Dictatorship of Any body or Anything over Anyone and without those liquidations and concentration camps that appear to be the indispensible passport to the approval of the "advanced" ones? I carefully avoid that fashionable question-begging word "progress" for progress may mean just as much an advance towards the worse as the better. It is progress—in decomposition—when an apple from being merely bad, becomes deliquescent.

Let us consider the case of Nehru because, apart from the great figure of Gandhiji—who in this matter as in others sees so much further and clearer than he—he is unquestionably the outstanding figure in the Indian Nationalist movement to-day. How is it possible for Nehru to overlook and ignore, as he appears to do, the fact that Stalinist Russia is a Totalitarian State of a ruthlessness and severity that makes Mussolinian Fascist Italy rather like a kindergarten by comparison, and Hitler's Stalinist Germany (I use the epithet advisedly!) at best (or worst) a not too good second? How is it possible for Nehru while condemning the imperialist aggressions of Germany and Italy to say not a word about the just as ruthless aggressions of Stalinist Russia—which in this matter is in every way the spiritual heir of Czarist Russia—in Finland, Esthonia, Latvia, Georgia, Inner and Outer Mongolia, Azerbaijan, Turkestan? Why is the invasion and ruthless suppression of self-governing and independent States, and the forcible imposition upon them of an alien system and ideology only to be called "aggression" when Germany does it and not when Stalinist Russia does it? How can Nehru fail to see—as he seems to fail—that the arguments, security of frontier, strategic positions, etc., etc. wherewith these acts of cruelty aggression are excused or glossed over by the propagandists are exactly the same utterly immoral imperialistic power—political arguments that he denounces continually in the case of India and Malaya? How can Nehru lend his enormous prestige to any endorsement and approval of a political system that suppresses all and every opposition of thought, idea or expression, political, literary or even artistic (vide the case of the composer Shostakovitch not long since) with the utmost ruthlessness and rigour, "liquidates," i.e. starves to death peasant small-holders by the million, in pursuit of a monstrous piece of tyrannical bureaucratic "planning" (see the facts and figures given by Souvarine in this matter) that had an O.G.P.U. and concentration camps long before Germany and on a scale which perhaps even the latter has not yet attained? What sort of organic relationship has this monstrous totalitarian tyranny with the oldest democratic and freely representative system in the world, the village Panchayat of India, the very root and origin of all representative institutions? How much wiser and more humanely human is Gandhi who will have no truck whatsoever with any Western Totalitarianism but insists that India with her millenial traditions of organised and civilised life — of which, as Professor Gordon Childe tells us, she was the very cradle—must build upon her own past in accordance with her own traditions that are ageless and incomparable, and which make it as utterly unnecessary as it is unwise for her to go whoring after strange Western ideological gods who have nothing to give her of value that she cannot find in her own way of life and in her own traditions.

And our Soviet-propaganda bull-dosed dupes fail to see that the open alliance with Russia makes mincemeat of the Freedom and Democracy propaganda just as much as the previous Russo-German Pact did of the earlier propaganda of those two vis-a-vis each other; I have a shrewd suspicion that Gandhi feels this too, hence some public remarks of his anent Britain's cause quoted in "The Times" some while since.

Again, as Wilfred Wellock and Middleton Murry have so well pointed out, Gandhi is not all out against the machine as such, as he is so often ignorantly and wrongly represented as being, but he IS all out against the ruthless subordination and sacrifice of the country to the town, the crippling and impoverishment of the peasant and the countryside that inevitably result from reckless industrialisation, the dire results of which leap to the eye in every highly industrialised Western land, and against which Gandhi with age-old wisdom is out to protect India. The cosmic evils of soil erosion that are exercising some of the best minds in England and America to-day spring directly out of the mechanistic subordination of the country to the industrialised town. This is potentially the most hedious and frightful of evils, besides which all others pale into insignificance, as anyone who studies such an appalling document as "The Rape of the Earth" can realise for himself, Nehru almost inevitably fails to see; he is too much the doctrinaire intellectual, the political theorist a la Bloomsbury, too far divorced from the soil, too modernly Western by seven eighths to perceive and appreciate the paramount importance to the community of the countryman and the soil and the immeasurably vital necessity of doing everything possible to protect and foster it and him, particularly from the dangers of unchecked industrialisation.

Finally Nehru, I think, like so many Leftish thinkers shows no glimmering of a perception of financial and monetary realities, that is to say, he does not or cannot, see that adherence to a primitive barbarous and essentially corrupt monetary and Banking system is right at the root of most of the world's ills, India's hardly—if at all—less than England's; he shews no signs of being cognisant with the work of the great monetary reformers, Kitson, Soddy, Gesell, Douglas (above all) thus indicating that like so many of his way of political thinking progress and advance in the study and investigation of this paramountly cardinal matter has left home and them far behind, for it makes most of their platform cliches and catchwords equally with those of the Right not only "as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal" but completely irrelevant into the bargain. To close, by way in musical parlance of a coda, I may perhaps not impertinently add, that the perception of realities in the matter of finance and banking is fairly widespread among my own community; a relative of mine who is a person of considerable importance in one of the biggest Banks in India has remarked to me when we were discussing this matter that the financial and Banking system were the biggest frauds and swindles that had ever been put over a silly world, that he was thoroughly ashamed and humiliated in his own eyes at being associated with it but . . . that he had his living to earn and a family to keep!

ROMFORD PACIFISM

Comrade George E. Watling, Secretary of the Collier Row P.P.U. Group, is a foundation member of the P.P.U. He is also a member of the United Socialist Movement. Comrade Watling has been opposed to war since he was 14 years of age and he is now 51. He resisted the last war and was court-martialled at Hurdcolt, Salisbury Plain, on November 8, 1916. He was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, which he served at Wormwood Scrubbs. On his discharge from prison, he was offered, and accepted, alternative service in food distribution.

At the time that conscription was introduced, Watling was in o reserved occupation and was discharged only because he insisted on taking his stand as a conscientious objector. His employer wrote to him:—

I tremble to think what will be said of young men so young as yourself, who, without any ties, fail to respond to their country's call.

Yet the employer did not mean him to respond. He only wanted him not to register as a C.O.!

Comrade Watling has written many essays in defence of Socialism and Pacifism and has published also the following works: "The Real Power Behind The War" (1914); "The Confessional Exposed"; "Papal Medals and Frescoes."

In Romford, to-day, he is an active member of the group that maintains an untiring Socialist and Pacifist propaganda.

DEFINITE PEACE AIMS NOW

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT

(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government).

[The following article by our comrade Jowett is reprinted from the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, December 4, 1942.—Ed.]

"I know nothing that has happened yet which justifies the hope that the war will not be long, or that bitter and bloody years do not lie ahead", said Prime Minister Churchill in his broadcast speech last Sunday. He visualised the war from now on in two stages. Of the beginning of the first stage he said this:—

"The dawn of 1943 will soon loom red before us, and we must brace ourselves to cope with the trials and problems of what must be a stern and terrible year."

Mr. Churchill visualised two further stages of the war; the first, the defeat of Germany and Italy in Europe; and the second, the defeat of Japan in the Far East.

For the first of these stages complete clearance of German and Italian forces from Africa to enable the North African coast to be the spring-board for a great Allied land offensive in Europe is the FIRST TASK.

For the second stage, clearance of Japanese forces from all the key positions Japan now holds in the Far East including the Philippines, Malay, Hong Kong, and Shanghai.

There is, of course, nothing in this forecast of future military operations to justify even "the hope that the war will not be long, or that bitter and bloody years do not lie before us", as the Prime Minister said, and in his war strategy he quite obviously counts only military operations of real importance.

This he clearly showed by his dismissal of the insistent call for a statement concerning the sort of peace it is intended that peoples of enemy Governments and all other peoples concerned will have imposed upon them by Allied victory over the Axis powers. It would "weaken the disciplined unity and order of our array", he said, "if we fell to quarrelling about what we should do with our victory before that victory is won."

Why telling the world what Britain and the United States would do with an Allied victory after it is won would lead to quarrelling is difficult to understand if the Atlantic Charter agreement declared to the world by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill as being the aim of their two nations means what it implies.

For although in Article (4) (which refers to equal terms of access by all nations to trade and raw materials needed for their prosperity) a rather ominous reservation lies in the words "with due respect for their existing obligations", yet there are in Articles (6) and (7) over-riding principles stated which, if observed, would surely lead to agreement concerning existing obligations. The existing obligations in question being presumably existing tariff and trading preference agreements.

The Peace Aims declared for and on behalf of the two great English speaking nations, whose Governments jointly expected to carry the greatest, if not actually an overpowering weight, at a peace conference following the projected allied victory, include two affirmations of principle which are of first and not even of secondary importance.

Article (6) contains the much emphasised declaration in world-wide publicity that the peace must be a peace

"which will afford assurance that all men in all lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want."

Article (7) of the Atlantic Charter declares that the peace

"should enable all men to traverse the high seas and oceans without hindrance."

Now why shouldn't the implications be made clear now, if not as a matter of common honesty, then at least as sound war strategy to bring about the end of Hitlerite Germany (which is all that Soviet Russia is pledged to)?

If Articles (6) and (7) mean what they imply, and what peoples of enemy Governments and blockaded peoples of ex-allied and neutral Governments are vainly expected to believe they mean, then two things follow and should be clearly stated. These are:

First, if article (6) means what it says, there can be no victimisation of the German people or of the peoples of other enemy Governments.

The fear of a second Versailles Treaty, worse than the first (which the anti-Nazi masses of German people fear, and in terror of which they will fight and die, and work and slave, to avoid defeat and another dictated peace—just as we should do under similar circumstances) would no longer restrain them from opposing the war in every way possible in their Nazi-ruled and Gestapo-ridden land.

And again and again it should be emphasised that not even the most cruel and relentless of dictators can carry on successfully a war between great Powers militarily and industrially organised for the purpose without support born of fear of the consequences of defeat on the part of their peoples. And a peace giving in precise terms security for freedom from fear and want as promised in Article (6) of the Atlantic Charter would carry no such possible consequence as another Versailles Treaty, to the German people as we have given them reason to fear.

Next in importance as affecting the desire for an anti-Nazi peace of peoples of other European countries whose Governments are ex-allied or neutral, is article (7) which, if it means what it says and the world-wide desire for definitive peace aims were acceded to by the British and American Governments, would end the control of peaceable overseas traffic by any Government.

To the blockaded and starving populations of Belgium and other West European countries this freedom-of-the-seas peace aim is vital. The British blockade is the trump card of Dr. Goebbels, the chief propagandist of Nazi Germany, in the blockaded ex-ally and neutral countries, and if article (7) doesn't mean freedom of the seas and end of the Britannia Rules the Waves" mentality, then it is a sham and a fraud.

Mr. Churchill's forecast of a United Nations peace aims conference when the first of the two future stages of the war he is anticipating has been won—the armies of Germany, Italy and their satellite states defeated in the field on the Continent of Europe and in Germany itself—does not mean much. It will be a peace aims conference well and truly tied up beforehand when President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill have had all the necessary years of their people's blood and tears and toil and sweat for such a militarist victory. As in the last war, there is already evidence of this tying-up process by means of secret understandings, arrangements and pledges. This is what the Tribune (November 13th) says of the latest example:—

"We have guaranteed the Spanish Empire, and we have expressed the hope that she would recover in peace from the effects of the civil war and take her rightful place in the Europe of the future. Are we fighting for a future which we shall share with General Franco? This is a thought to inspire our soldiers to new sacrifices.

"We have also guaranteed the French and Portuguese Empires. And now Mr. Churchill has rounded it all off by bluntly stating at the Mansion House that 'We mean to hold our own.' He went on to say, 'I have not become the King's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire.'

"So there you have it. This future of sunny uplands and beckoning vistas Mr. Churchill is fond of telling us about in his perorations is to contain the French, British, Portuguese and Spanish Empires intact as before. In short, if we are to judge by the specific and definite statement made on our behalf by the British Foreign Office and by the Prime Minister himself we are fighting this war, going through all this agony and privation simply in order to put the old world back on its feet again.

"As though to give point and substance to our fears in this respect, fugitive incidents occur from time to time showing that all the old values are there in full strength only awaiting a favourable moment to assert themselves. We fete the political trader Darlan in a 'manner suited to his position and rank.' Even whilst the battle of El Alamein was in progress General Montgomery dined and breakfasted with the captured Nazi General, and the whole British Press carried photographs of the two men shaking hands. All that was wanted to complete the picture was the body of a dead British soldier lying between. It is surely intolerable that the supreme horror of this war should be treated as though it were a cricket match.

"We wonder how the underground movement in France will react to our reception of Darlan. This was the man who plotted against us and maligned us, and conspired in the murder of hundreds of brave Frenchmen who gave their lives for our cause. What kind of a Europe have we in mind? One built by rats for mice? It may appear to some people a very clever idea to seduce and beguile these men who owe their power to hurt us to their having been the jackals of our enemies; but it does not bear that appearance to the millions of oppressed men and women in Europe to whom we look for help in our offensive against Germany. Are they expected to face torture, imprisonment and death so that the authors of their calamities may be feted by us? It is not good diplomacy to beguile your enemies and lose your friends. A famous German Socialist of the last century once said, 'YOU CANNOT BE CLEVER IN BIG THINGS.'

"If our military offensive is to give the moral atmosphere conducive to an early victory it is, therefore, essential that the United Nations should now PUT ON RECORD FOR ALL THE WORLD TO HEAR A CONCEPTION OF FUTURE SOCIETY WHICH WILL RALLY MEN AND WOMEN EVERYWHERE TO OUR CAUSE. If it is done now with vision, courage and imagination, it might save millions of lives. Conquered Europe moves restlessly under the Nazi heel. If we can find the words of power it might rise to its feet. Who will speak them?"

LEIGH FISHER.

Our comrade, Leigh Fisher, has addressed the following letter to us from H.M. Prison, Edinburgh.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—This is the first opportunity I have had of writing to you since being buried alive here. The prison office phoned through yesterday to where I am working informing me that you had communicated with the governor in connection with appearing as a witness before the Appellate Tribunal on my behalf.

I had quite a fair hearing in the High Court, which was presided over by Lord Normand. During my address he interrupted to ask the Crown-Solicitor the maximum sentence that could be imposed on a charge of this description. The Crown Solicitor replied 12 months. I understood it was 2 years.

Lord Normand, in summing up, said the sentence was not excessive; that I had acted in good faith, and it was my stubborn character and strong will that had made me refuse medical examination, and that I erred in my interpretation of Section 5 of the Armed Forces' Act. The Crown claimed no expenses against me.

I hope the Burnbank comrades are having a big circulation of the papers. Comrade Lyle came to the High Court with me the two days.

Hoping everybody at George Street is well.

Yours fraternally,

LEIGH FISHER.

1404/42 Leigh Fisher, 1/12/1942.

On Thursday, December 17, Leigh Fisher appeared again before the Appellate Tribunal. He was accompanied by the editor He was registered as a conscientious objector on condition that he resumed the work in which he was employed at the time of his imprisonment.

TOM JOHNSTON AND THE KING

Welcome, Royal George

So the head man in our half-million-a-year family of latest-comers is coming to the Clyde, is he? When last we lamented at his penchant for lavish entertainment, which confronted with a three-cornered hat and a sword (which must be a lavishly ornamental one, a long chain of ironmongery dangling at one's legs) that day they will hail him Sir's Lord High Admiral of the

He must laugh. A job like his without a sense of humour would be unbearable.

Conclusion of Johnston article, much reduced. Note his initials "T. J." He was not content to leave his two-column effort unsigned. Note also position of cartoon, which obviously was drawn to illustrate Johnston's editorial. At this time (1920) "FORWARD" was a very large sheet, and the article and cartoon occupied two full-sized columns.

The "Scots Daily Express" in its issue for Thursday, November 26, 1942, gave special display to the following announcement:—

NEWS IN LINES.

TOM JOHNSTON AT PALACE.

THE King at Buckingham Palace yesterday received in audience Mr. Tom Johnston, Secretary of State for Scotland.

When we read this we looked at "Who's Who" and found that one of the accomplishments on which Mr. Johnston prided himself was that of having edited "Forward" for 27 years. We wondered if he discussed his contributions to its columns with the King. Then we pondered on the vanity of human achievement and human careerism. Interned in the Isle of Man or in Brixton Prison are men who visited the present King's father at Buckingham Palace during the Great War of 1914-1918, to receive medals for distinguished conduct, for bravery on the field of battle. What was Thomas Johnston doing during that period? He was not resisting war inside His Majesty's prisons and detention barracks as we were. Yet he was of military age, for he is only four years our senior. Somehow, he was evading the draft, and was safely spending his time between Glasgow and Kirkintilloch, penning "Socialist War Points" and denouncing Horatio Bottomley for being war-minded The Clydeside applauded his attack on Bottomley. They appreciated his vulgarisms and mistook them for extremisms. And so, in due course, he reached the Cabinet. To-day, he enjoys higher distinction than Bottomley sought to enjoy, and he is doing the same kind of propaganda that Bottomley engaged in when he prostituted his great talents—and Horatio Bottomley was a man of many talents and outstanding oratorial and journalistic ability—to the cause of war, imperialism, and destruction.

We looked up our "Forward" files, and we wondered if Thomas Johnston took with him to Buckingham Palace "Forward", for Saturday, March 14, 1925, No. 15. Vol. 19. The front-page "Socialist Commentary" is signed "T.J." Johnston was so proud of his article that he had to sign it. The headlines of this commentary explain its contents:—

THE STORY OF EDWARD THE P(E)ACEMAKER. THE CASH TAKINGS OF THE ROYAL FAMILY. TWENTY-EIGHT MILLIONS IN ONE LIFETIME—AN AMAZING RECORD.

Beneath these headlines Thomas Johnston developed a strong attack on Edward VII, the present King's grandfather. Johnston attacks Sir Sidney Lee's official biography of Edward VII as being "a masterpiece of reticence." He proceeds to attack Edward's associations with "Sir Tom Lipton"—Johnston's peculiar style of address—and Sir Ernest Cassel; to indict Albert the Good, beneath the heading: "What Albert the Good Netted in His Spare Time"; to expose "The Emoluments of Victoria the Good."

The other sub-headings of this signed article by Thomas Johnston in the columns of his own paper are as follows:—

WHAT THE P(E)ACEMAKER RAN THROUGH.
MORE PICKINGS FOR EDWARD THE P(E)ACEMAKER.
WILD OATS.
THE TRANLY CROFT CASE.

It is regrettable that space does not permit us to reproduce this article in full. But it can be consulted in Glasgow in the Mitchell Library. And it can be found in the British Museum. Later, we may be able to give it the publicity it merits, not on its own account, but in view of the present position of Thomas Johnston.

The article concludes:—

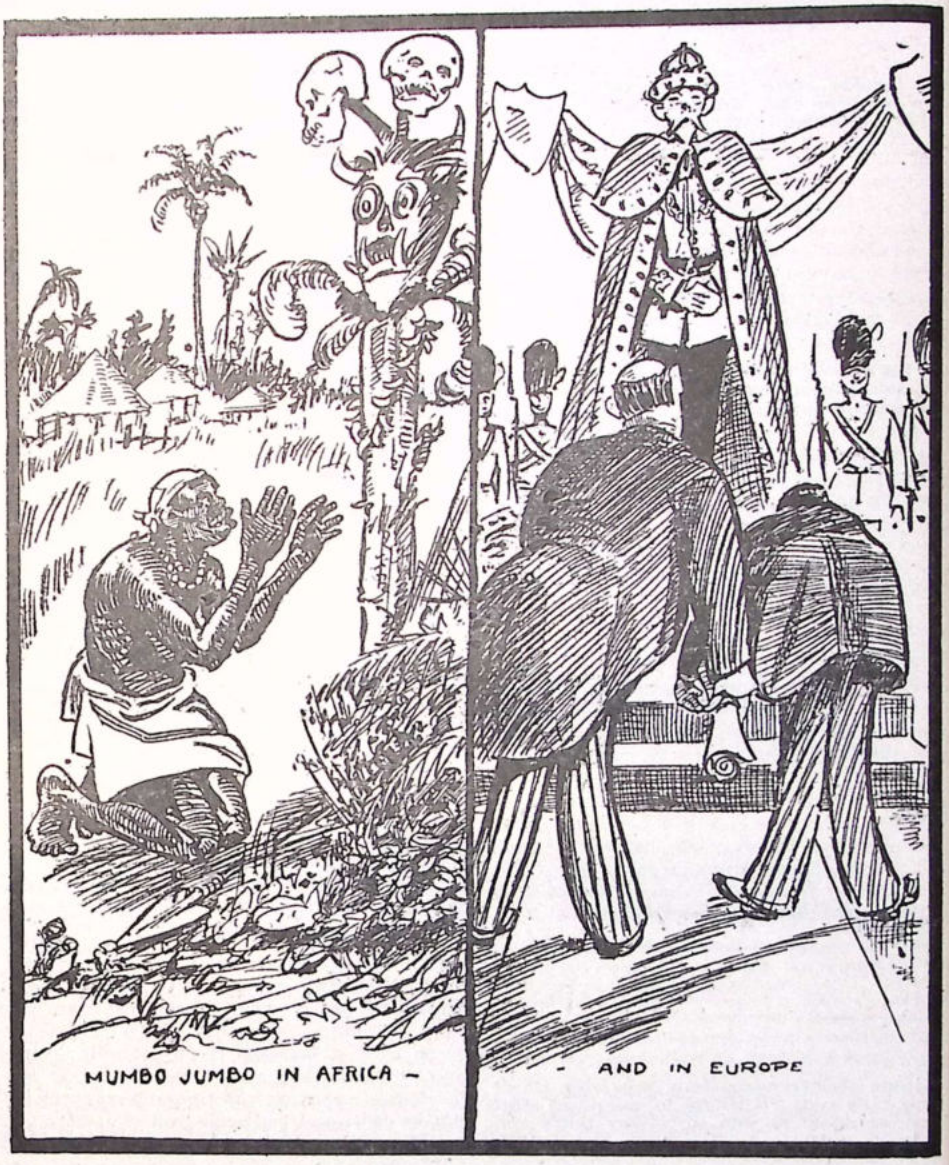
In later years the echo of these scandals died away, and the Press dubbed him Edward the Peace-Maker. Perhaps, because he spent considerable time in organising the Entente Cordiale with France and Russia against Germany.

T. J.

This conclusion indicates the nature of Johnston's denunciation of Edward VII. The Clyde thought that its vulgarity stamped Johnston a brave publicist. It disbelieved us when we indicated that the man was a parliamentary careerist and a climber; that his pen, like all vulgar pens, was devoid of power and sincerity.

We ask Johnston: Did he take "Forward," for Saturday, March 14, 1925, to the Palace? Did he show his splendid article to Edward's grandson? Did he explain that this had enabled him to climb into Cabinet position?

But perhaps his 1925 essay was not sufficiently lewd for his purpose. Perhaps Thomas Johnston took with him to the Palace a copy of "Forward" for July 3, 1920. Perhaps he turned to Page 5, and showed King George VI the article that he, now the Rt. Hon. Thomas Johnston, M.P., P.C., contributed, as editor, to the columns of "Forward" for that date. This article is too good—or too bad—to be



MUMBO-JUMBO

The above cartoon was published in the "FORWARD" for July 3, 1920. At that time "FORWARD" was edited by Thomas Johnston. The cartoon illustrated Johnston's editorial denunciation of the monarchy, which is reproduced in full on this page. In the "FORWARD", the cartoon was nearly 7 inches across.

summarised. We reproduce it in full, together with the illustration with which the "Forward's" editor tickled the fancy of his proletarian readers:—

Article contributed by the now Rt. Hon. Thomas Johnston, M.P., as editor, signed with his initials, "T. J.," to the "Forward," for Saturday, July 3, 1920:—

WELCOME, ROYAL GEORGE

So the head man in our half-million-a-year family of bazaar openers is coming to the Clyde, is he? When last he honoured us with his presence, his family name was Wettin, which was unfortunate, for it made the Rechabites suspicious. But during the war he changed his name to Windsor, and he publicly swore off the booze for the duration. If this sacrifice was designed to ease off the demand upon the available alcohol stocks, and so help us to win the war, it was nobly done.

There are other monarchs in the world, who if you saw their faces on a cinema screen, would give you the impression that they might be startled into ecstatic anticipation at the sound of a cork. It is they who give body and currency to the epithet: "Royal Fou." Not so our own Gracious. He never needs a peppermint now.

He comes of a long and noble lineage. His father was Edward the Peacemaker; his grandfather was Albert the Good, and his grandmother was Victoria the Good, who told the savages that Britain's greatness was founded upon the Bible. Such a noble and original thought! And before her were Gentleman George and William the Sailor, and George the Good, and William the Protestant and Good Queen Bess, and James the Wise and Alfred the Great, and a whole string and galaxy of virtue.

It's worth while paying half a million a year only to get thinking about it.

Besides, look at the other advantages! We must have some one to set the fashions. I remember in my boyhood wanting a pair of brown boots, only to be told that King Edward would not wear them—"They were no boots for a gentleman", he had said, just as his predecessor Charles had declared Presbyterianism to be no religion for a gentleman. And that settled it.

The King business is an anachronism: a survival from more superstitious times: a chip from the medieval raree show with gilt coaches and outriders and ermine cloaks and gold-sticks-in-waiting, and keepers-of-the-green-wax-in-expectation, and a whole army of political spongers and mouchards looking for a share of the half-million sterling that an educated British people pays for the upkeep of the Royal Family.

You wonder, perhaps, why Feudalism keeps a mascot, and why Capitalism should encourage and pay for costly Royal Goloshins.

The landowners allege that they received their landed "rights" from the King: therefore the King must be maintained and exhibited to the groundlings at periodical intervals. Properly advertised, these exhibitions have a hypnotic and mesmeric effect upon the ignorant.

Capitalism, again, is willing to tolerate Royalty, because it stands as a great bulwark against the ideas of the equality of men. Capitalism demands servitude, and Royalty, in its essence, means that the many must serve the one. Landowners and Capitalists are interested in maintaining the corner stone of an economic system which permits Privilege to pick the pockets of the poor.

I do not envy the King his job. Poor old chap. One day they dress him up in a naval uniform with a three-cornered hat and a sword (which must be a beastly nuisance, a long chunk of ironmongery dangling at one's legs): that day they tell him he's Lord High Admiral of the Seas, Ruler of the Waves and Storms and King of the Tempest.

Another day they dress him in khaki and stick him upon a horse. But in France he had an accident at the back of the front: he fell off the horse and was hurt, whereupon they put up prayers in the churches for his recovery, as was right and proper, for he is so good that he is head of the English Church. Nowadays he does not lead the armed nation into battle; he simply reviews the troop's for he's Commander-in-Chief of the Army. But it's a tiresome business saluting on a hot day.

Another time they deck him up fancy, knee-breeches and all the rest of it, and give him a speech to read at the opening of Parliament. This is called the King's Speech from the Throne. But for the most part his job is opening bazaars in aid of the British and Foreign Society for the Propagation of White Mice, Indigent Tea planters, or what not. He also opens libraries and has been known to lay a memorial stone of half a hundredweight, whereat there is great and justifiable comment in the Press, for no bird that ever flew or swam could lay anything half so heavy. Thus man triumphs over Nature.

But the drawback to the job, and the reason why, despite the high wage rate per hour, there is no competition for his billet is the awful and sickening aura of snobbery and lickspittling that is attached to it. Mayors and Provosts and Town Clerks and Bailies, and Common Councilmen, all in their Sunday best, bowing and scraping and sliding out of The Presence on their hams. And their wives loading themselves up with imitation jewellery and laces and feathers, practising the proper curtesy before mirrors for months beforehand. And every pawnshop and pub. with its Union Jack and emblem calling upon God urgently to save the King. And the loyal address which is tiresomely read out by the pompous personage whose wife is in the nerves (for her man's trouser foot has stuck in his boot top). And the aged slave foreman who is "introduced", having been in the employ, your Majesty, for sixty years and has never asked a rise, and whose tongue cleaves to the roof of his mouth at the honour, and who never thereafter washes the hand that has touched fingers with Royalty.

He suffered cruelly during the war because of a disloyal Press, which suggested that his cousin was a degenerate and his (the cousin's eldest son) had 500 wives.

If, as appears to be the case, the old gentleman is the average decent, kindly-intentioned father of a family, doing his day's darg in the situation in which without effort or struggle he found himself, and knowing no other way of making an assured bed and board for his dependents, how he must laugh at the snobs, how he must chuckle at the Bailie-bodies waddling forward in due order of precedence to be "presented."

He must laugh. A job like his without a sense of humour would be unbearable.

T. J.

The heading was spread across two columns. We ask: Did Thomas Johnston mention this article to His Majesty, King George VI? Does Mr. Churchill consider that the writer of such an article ought to have a place in an Imperialist, Tory Cabinet? Does Mr. Churchill believe that men who fought in the last war, were wounded, and received at The Palace to be honoured, ought to be rotting in jail, whilst "Tom Johnston", in his own super-elegant phraseology, is received at The Palace, and treated as a patriot and a citizen of distinction?

We do not think that Tom Johnston qualifies either as a patriot or a pacifist. He is a politician who has risen by vulgarity, and vulgarity only, to a place in the world of political pretence. He has never suffered for his principles and he now proves that he never possessed any principles for which to suffer. But he has made a parade of principles and so has advanced himself to his present position, persuading the workers that he was the enemy of Churchillism as when he stood for Dundee, and that it was most urgent, in the interest of proletarian emancipation and Socialism, that he be returned to Westminster. Such are the vagaries and the vulgarities of parliamentary Socialist Careerism.

The workers' business is to show contempt for Thomas Johnston whenever he appears in public. Every decent man, irrespective of class or opinion, will be able, after reading this article, to take the man's measurement and to show contempt accordingly. The man should be impeached and driven from public life as an exploiter of oppressed passion and a political trader in human suffering; a mean, contemptible careerist, who insults the common people with his lewd commentary that he might rise by sycophancy to public position. The man stamps his career as that of a political cheat and a fraud.

of Lord Elphinstone and also of Mr. Maitland and Mr. Barron. The tone of their questions, and the manner of putting them, expressed understanding and ability to vision the pacifist objection. A very great thing in war-time. Mr. Grant, the Clerk of the Tribunal, in the Fisher case, showed great courtesy and made special enquiries concerning the facts so that these could be considered accurately by the Tribunal. The proceedings were thoroughly democratic and judicial.

EDINBURGH APPELLATE TRIBUNAL

The editor attended before the Appellate Tribunal, Edinburgh, on Thursday, December 17, as the friend of Leigh Fisher, of Burnbank. Fisher was brought from Saughton Prison, Edinburgh, by a warder who treated him with every consideration and who had served as a warder, at one time, in a jail in which the editor was confined for his political principles. The editor was then doing "a stretch"!

The Tribunal consisted of the Rt. Hon. Lord Elphinstone, K.T., LL.D. (Chairman); Alexander Maitland, Esq., K.C.; and Thomas Barron, Esq., J.P., Hon. A.R.I.B.A.

We do not wish to discuss the details of Fisher's case in this report, as the facts call for a clear and thorough statement and analysis. In our view, as stated to the Tribunal, Fisher ought never to have been sentenced, and his conviction ought not to have been upheld by the High Court of Justiciary. We are confirmed in this opinion by one item of fact stated by Lord Elphinstone.

The Tribunal discussed the case with great courtesy. The questions were scrupulously fair; and although the members of the Tribunal clearly believe the war to be right, they permitted no prejudice against pacifism to move them. The questions were clear and to the point. Finally, Fisher was registered as a conscientious objector on condition that he returned to the work in which he was employed when sentenced, or undertook work in the building trade.

The following day, Friday, the editor accompanied comrade John Lambert, of Paisley, before the same Tribunal. Lambert received a good and long hearing. Finally he was registered as a conscientious objector on condition he remained at his trade as a shoemaker, and did part-time A.R.P. Lambert's appeal was against the decision of Glasgow No. 2 Tribunal. In the first instance, it was this local Tribunal that removed Fisher's name from the register.

In our view, fair consideration of cases by Tribunals are important contributions to the well-being of humanity. They maintain and define principles of justice which should be upheld in war-time, not only on ethical grounds, but on grounds of wise social policy. Principle is more important than power. It is not merely a question of releasing, conscripting, or imprisoning a certain individual. It is a matter of sound jurisprudence and understanding upon which society must rest if ever a commonweal of mankind is to be established. One day this will be achieved and the just behaviour of Tribunals to-day, no matter what errors may be made, contributes towards the realisation of this ambition.

Tribunals are not to blame always for erroneous decisions. Many conscientious objectors are moved by a kind of inferiority complex, which causes them to evade answering some questions, because they seem afraid to look stupid; and also causes them to be unduly aggressive in reply to other questions, with the result that their stand is falsified. They make their case appear like one of ugly selfishness. What is needed is to tell the truth very simply. Naturally, the atmosphere tends to be somewhat against the objector. That is inevitable, in view of the war situation. The conscientious objector minority, however right it may be or may feel itself to be, must face this fact. Every member of this minority, when called upon to do so, must consider his position in relation to such possible bias.

In the two cases mentioned, the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal was most just and betrayed no prejudice. This characterised the conduct

THE DREAM

By the Rev. R. H. LE MESSURIER, B.A.

(Vicar of Holy Cross in St. Pancras, London).

"Same again, Miss."

"Golly! Whot d'ye think ye're mide of? Blottin'-piper?"

Harry Harman forced a smile, though inwardly he was seething with anger. What business had the fat old barmaid to hint he was drinking too much! He'd have what he liked. And as long as he paid for it, there was no need for her to pass remarks about it. Anyway, he hadn't had much. Only two pints. And beer was like water nowadays.

She deposited the overflowing, third pint on the counter, swept up his florin with wet hands, rung up the amount on the cash-register, and clapped his change in a pool of beer by his glass.

"On leave?" she queried, affably.

"You ought to know better than ask."

"Orlright, orlright. Keep yer 'air on. Only tryin' ter be civil."

She turned away. Harry picked up his pint, crossed the bar, seated himself by a small table, and commenced his drink.

He was fed-up—fed-up with himself—fed-up with everyone and everything. Curse it, what was wrong? He'd never been like this before. Of course, he'd been always highly-strung. That meant he got irritable at times, and sometimes even lost his temper for a bit. But he soon recovered.

This was different. It was a black mood he couldn't shake off. He'd got up like it. He'd got angry because his bath-water wasn't hot enough. Then his bacon hadn't been properly cooked, and the tea was too weak.

But Eileen's letter had been the last straw. She'd come dashing in with it just when he'd discovered there wasn't enough marmalade.

"Oh, Harry!" she cried excitedly, "Look. It's from Mum. She's coming up to Town this afternoon, and wants to stay overnight."

That finished it. Harry lost his temper completely, and shouted at Eileen. He could still see the surprised look on her face when he began, and the dismay in her blue eyes as he said cruel things, spiteful things, hurtful things to her. In all the two years of their married life they had never had a quarrel.

"What the hell does she want to come here now for? Why can't she have the decency to stay away? I've got only a few days leave, and I want my home to myself. Why does your mother want to come barging in for?"

"Harry!"

"You're just as bad yourself. I come home for a few days fest and quiet. And you're more excited about having your mother than you are to have me. Oh! yes, you are. I'm supposed to be fighting for my home, and when I get back to it, it isn't my own any more."

"Harry! Don't shout so. The windows are open. The neighbours . . ."

"Dam the neighbours. Let 'em listen if they want to. I don't care. Can't a fellow say what he likes in his own home without having a crowd of curious neighbours listening to every word? The neighbours! All you care is about everyone else. I don't come into the picture at all. You don't care anything about me. . . "

"Oh, Harry! That isn't true. You know it isn't true."

But he went on raging and storming at her, lashing himself into a furious temper, shouting more and more loudly. Eileen grew white and cold before his eyes. Like a mad dog he attacked the one he loved best. Then, to end it all, he stamped out of the flat, down the staircase, and out into the street.

It was only after he had walked for miles that the storm died down at all. Then he had turned into a public-house and drank two pints of beer, defiantly, in a vain attempt to bolster up his self-pity.

Curiously, the drink soothed him, and gave him a detached sort of feeling. It seemed as if he were watching someone else. He was looking at another Harry Harman losing his temper and quarrelling with his wife. This observer-part of him knew that he was in the wrong, that there was no truth in his wild extravagant accusations, and that Eileen was the best wife any man could possibly have. This rational part of him knew he would have to apologise to Eileen sooner or later.

Still, another part of him was pleased over the whole business. He had asserted himself. He had fought for what he wanted. He had increased his self-importance. He was somehow more manly. And to climb down now would be to revert to childishness.

So he was restless and divided, torn between reason and passion. And the cool drink helped to reconcile the conflicting tendencies in him. He wanted to go home and make it up with Eileen. But he wanted to give her a lesson, too. Yet the sands of his short leave were running out. To-morrow he would have to report back to his unit. And he knew that before long they would be off on another raid on occupied France.

The last one had been thrilling. Harry recalled the quiver of excitement, the funny little thrills in the pit of his stomach, the quickened breathing he had experienced as their barge grated quietly on the French sands, and the men had leaped silently on to enemy territory. Each knew his job, and went about it silently and efficiently. Harry's job was to find and dispose of any sentry who might be guarding the radio-location building near the town which was the Commandos' main objective that night.

Crawling quietly in the darkness, Harry had quickly spotted his man. Making a detour, he had come up in the shelter of a side wall and approached the corner at the end of the sentry's beat. He waited quietly till the German turned about to retrace his steps. Then he sprang.

Unfortunately, the Nazi heard him, and turned in time to knock the upraised knife out of Harry's hand. The two closed, and now were fighting desperately in hate-filled silence. Harry knew that one shout of the sentry would give the whole game away, and he sprang for the German's throat. They fell, clutching each other in a fierce embrace. But Harry was on top. In spite of the German's struggles, Harry felt his fingers close about a hard throat. He pressed and squeezed, forcing his knees into the other's stomach in order to wind him. A fierce feeling of power swept through Harry as he noticed the German's struggles were lessening. He renewed his grip on the now softening throat, shook it violently, and almost cheered as the creaking, gasping breath died down to its last death-rattle. It was the first man Harry had killed, and the wildly exulting sense of superiority upheld him for the rest of the raid.

Funny, it was the same feeling which had flowed into him when he was shouting at Eileen.

He returned to the flat at six o'clock, after spending three hours aimlessly wandering about the streets. All the time he was fighting himself.

Apologising to Eileen was easier than he had expected. He just went up to her, knelt by her chair, put his head on her lap, and said, "I'm sorry."

Her forgiveness had been instantaneous, too. "That's all right, Harry. Let's forget about it."

"I don't know what came over me."

"Never mind, darling. I expect you were tired."

Her arms were about him. They kissed passionately.

"Forgive me, Eileen?"

"Of course, darling. As long as you love me, I don't care what happens."

"I do love you, Eileen. I don't know what . . ."

"Hush, darling," her hand closed his mouth. "It's all right now. We're together again. Besides," she giggled almost gaily, "Mum decided not to stop, after all. So forget about it, and let's start again."

They did. Eileen was brighter and gayer than he had ever known her. And soon he was laughing and joking just like old times.

Then they went to the cinema.

"I'd like to see 'Next of Kin,' Harry," said Eileen after a riotous supper.

"What on earth do you want to see a picture like that, for?"

"Well, it's all about a Commando raid, and I want to see what you boys do on a raid like that."

He smiled grimly. No cinema could give all the details. Still, she wanted to go.

She clung to him very tight in the cinema.

"Oh, Harry!" she said afterwards, "I'd no idea it was as dangerous as that. Anyway, thank God there weren't any spies to spoil the two you were on. And you came back safe and sound."

Home once more, Eileen was gay and loving, Harry penitent and at peace. Their love swept them along, lifted them to pinnacles of bliss, and at last brought them, exhausted to sleep in each other's arms.

Harry dreamed. He saw again the spy he had seen in the film. Saw him creeping up to Eileen, who didn't know he was there. Harry tried to warn her, tried to shout. But he was held fast, and no sound would come. The spy reached Eileen. She screamed. Harry fought with whatever was holding him. At last he was free. He jumped on the spy. Grabbed him by the throat. Eileen still screamed. Harry fought harder. Again he felt his fingers in a throat, felt the ridges become soft and limp, heard the agonising breath of the man he was killing. Then Harry seemed to roll over, exhausted, as the man died.

He woke up, trembling. God! what a horrible dream! He wiped the sweat from his face, as he realised he was safe at home with Eileen. Dear Eileen! how he loved her!

What time was it? He reached up and snapped on the light. One o'clock. He looked at Eileen beside him.

God in heaven! What had happened? Swiftly, sickeningly his mind took in the details of what he saw—the swollen, purple face . . . the crushed and bruised throat . . . the protruding tongue. God! What had happened?

He tried to rouse her. Failed. Called her name wildly over and over again. Looked round the green-and-yellow bedroom to see who had done it.

Then, suddenly, he knew. The dream had been no dream, after all. In his sleep he had . . . he had . . .

God! O God! This is terrible. God! what could he do now? The police! . . . But they wouldn't believe his story . . . The neighbours, they'd heard the quarrel—was it only yesterday morning? They'd tell the police. God! he would be hanged. Even if they believed him, they would think he was mad.

Suddenly he knew what he must do. He got up, closed the window and the door. Working feverishly now, he tore up his shirt and stuffed the pieces into any crevices. He pulled the gas-fire away from the chimney and closed the register. He turned on the gas without lighting it.

Then, with a terrible, ghastly sob, he threw himself on Eileen . . .

The Pulpit to the People

Our comrade, the Rev. R. H. Le Messurier, B.A., Vicar of Holy Cross in St. Pancras with St. Jude, adds to his fearless exposition of Socialism and Pacifism in his "Weekly Leaflet" to his parishioners for December 6th, 1942.

Dealing with the Reformation and the Higher Criticism, he says:—

My Dear People,—The Reformation in the sixteenth century was as much a political and an economic movement as it was a religious one. The abuses within the Church were conveniently used as an excuse to revolt from her steady, unifying and international influence. So the main attack was directed against the authority of the Church. But the Reformers were sufficiently astute to see that the new form of Christianity, which was to be used to support the nascent nationalism and capitalism, must have some form of authority.

It was in the Bible that such authority was now found. Up to the Reformation the Bible had been considered as the Church's book. It had been written by churchmen for churchmen, as the result of the Church's corporate experience of God in Christ. The books had been selected by the Church. In fact, the slogan "the Church to teach and the Bible to prove" was the rule for sixteen hundred years.

Now that was gone. The Bible—thought of as somewhow mechanically and verbally inspired, was to be the front of all authority. And its interpretation was now to be left to the individual, whether he knew much about the Bible or not.

It is obvious that such a position is illogical, when one considers what the Bible is. And so the advent of Higher Criticism in the 19th and 20th centuries easily destroyed this unnatural view of the Scriptures. The result has been the discrediting of the Bible and the decline of all authority in Christianity whatever. Indeed, this was quite inevitable from the assumption that anyone could wrest from the sacred writings whatever meaning they liked.

It cannot be too clearly stated to-day that no one can appreciate and understand the Bible unless he is in some sense sharing that Christian experience from which the Bible sprang. No non-communicant, for example, can possibly understand the 6th chapter of St. John's Gospel. No man living as a member of a privileged class in our modern society can enter into the meaning of the prophetic writings. No man who does not to some extent know and love God can appreciate the full meaning of the Pauline Epistles, to say nothing of the Gospels themselves.

What then is needed? First a clearer understanding on the part of the Church of both her experience and her authority. Too often the Gospel is watered down to suit the susceptibilities of worldly semi-Christians, especially if they hold high positions in the State. The Church must recover her rich experience of the newness of the life in Christ. She must begin once again to teach and not apologise for the Gospel. Then, and only then, will the world listen.

Your servant for Christ's sake,

This is an interesting statement. The author's comments on the chaotic state of private judgment challenges discussion, thought, and criticism.

Comrade Le Messurier turns to the consideration of the Beveridge Report. He writes with much clarity and boldness. We commend his criticism to every worker:—

The publication of the Beveridge Report at this time is a symptom both of a national guilt and of the sickness of our capitalist system. The old tags "the Devil was sick, the Devil a Saint would be", is perhaps the best commentary that can be made on the Report by one who longs for a Christian social and economic order.

Two points must be remembered: (1) the Report is not law, and already the reactionary forces in the country are being mobilised to prevent this—the same forces now accepting a fascist regime in North Africa, in Spain and elsewhere. (2) no amount of ambulance-legislation can make up for the one thing needed to prevent casualties in the economic order. Nor can it be offered instead of the necessary replacement of that order by something more Christian. The full adoption of the Beveridge Report must lead to the abolition of capitalism, which is but one aspect of Nazism or Fascism.

The world struggle is between this and some form of socialism. That, at least, is becoming clearer each week. There can be no compromise between them on a world wide scale. And I am persuaded that the events of the last month have brought the spectre of civil war in this country a bit closer than ever. I believe that the Beveridge Report will appear in history as the watershed dividing the two opposing streams now struggling for world position and power.

This struggle is not against one or two men—Hitler and Mussolini—but between a class in each of the belligerent countries and the whole peoples of the world. Such a thought will clear up many of the strange anomolies which we see in the midst of the war to-day. The attempt to pin the blame for the war on one or two men will mean that the real criminals—those who have used these men and thousands of others for their own advancement—will escape to plot another day. The so-called temporary fascism in N. Africa must become permanent or lead to revolution. And Italy may be the field of our next compromise. What does our dear Lord think of it all?

HUMANISM IN AMERICA.

We have received the following interesting letter from Dr. Lowell H. Coate, M.A., Ph.D., President of The Humanist Society of Friends, 2405 West 23rd Street, Los Angeles, California, U.S.A.

Dear Mr. Aldred:

It was indeed a delight to receive a copy of the September issue of "The Word." It certainly strikes a clear note and, may I say, a Humanistic note. I will gladly exchange magazines with you, sending you our "Humanist Friend", a copy of which is enclosed herewith in response to your generous invitation to "give full publicity to the activity of each and every local of the Humanist Movement in the United States."

I shall try to contribute my bit toward further "setting you right", as Dr. Charles Francis Potter puts it in your September number. I would say that the chief difference between William Floyd and Dr. Potter is that Dr. Floyd does not claim that his "Arbitrator" is the official publication of the Humanist Movement in America, while Dr. Potter does claim that "The Humanist" is such an official organ.

"The Humanist" is the official organ of the American Humanist Association, but that cannot be said to be "The Humanist Movement", for Mr. Floyd's "Arbitrator" is appropriately designated "A Humanist Monthly" and very definitely represents an important section of the Movement.

I also may be permitted to add that the "Humanist Friend" magazine represents another very definite section of the Movement known as "The Humanist Society of Friends" (Quakers) which is incorporated under the laws of California as a "Religious Organization" and as such is authorized to issue charters anywhere in the world. It has about fifty (50) Ministers in many different states and hundreds of members throughout the United States. The "Humanist Friend" is the official organ of this Society which is enjoying a splendid growth in the midst of the serious war emergency.

There is also "The Humanist World Movement", of which more will be heard in the near future, and which is entirely separate from the various sections of Religious Humanism, it being non-sectarian and purely educational in its programme.

Again thanking you for this opportunity, believe me. Sincerely and fraternally,

LOWELL H. COATE.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I had a show-down recently with the National Union of Agricultural Workers, Surrey County Committee. A large number of C.O.s are in the Union and are fed up with their conditions, but don't quite know what to do about the land treatment of C.O.s. Am doing my best to show the way and believe that I am making some progress.

There's nothing like "The Word" for a tonic. Even the Four Square Gospellers are straying from the party line after reading it.

With best wishes for another 40 years.

Yours fraternally,

KEN BRYAN.

Croydon, Nov 11, 42.

Dear Guy,—I have read the Duke's speech in the House of Lords and also his "Why Have This War." I think "Why Have This War" is the finest exposure of British Capitalism that I have read. If every household could be supplied with this magnificant pamphlet, this war of dead-end ideas for the common people would terminate speedily enough. There would be a dead stop to the plague of murder. Never has so few deceived and betrayed so many.

The Duke's speech in that rabbit warren of scared interests and ambitions, the House of Lords, is nectar. You might as well try to talk sense in a trade union branch as in the chamber of the great. The effect would be the same.

I am critical of the Duke's failure to come to grips with the economic question. He strenuously avoids urging any semblance of equality. This naturally makes me conclude that he believes that the rich and poor will exist still in future society. I cannot agree, as I think that equality must be established, and the distinction of rich and poor abolished for ever.

The Duke is opposed to the Government ownership of the land. I may consider this merely an amelioration and I might not think that Government ownership is the same as Socialism. But there must be social ownership of basic economic monopolies and the social wealth given to man by nature. I think that the Duke is in error in not coming forward boldly in defence of Socialism. It is a pity that he does not feel the need for clear action here. With the Labour Party committed to war and capitalism, he would become the great liberator of the common people.

Nevertheless, the Duke is championing the greatest cause of mankind: stop war and mind our own business. For his splendid and uncompromising opposition to war and to this war, he commands, and will command always, my profound respect. People do not get time to live to-day. This fact enables the dictators to add to our agony. The wrongs of war are piled on to the wrongs of wage-slavery. If only we would pause to regard ourselves as individuals, we could see that we are stronger than our exploiters. Ignorance of what really exists and occurs constitutes our real chains of captivity. We are the shackled prisoners.

Yours Sincerely and Fraternally,

WM. JENKINSON.

Hanwell, London, W.7.

Dear Sir,—Thanks for publishing such a cheap, interesting, and open-minded paper. Best wishes and kindest regards.

Yours sincerely,

A. J. H. SANWAYS.

London.

Dear Comrade,—Allow me to pay a tribute to "The Word." I have taken it for a long while now; and as an Atheist-Anti-War Socialist, I greatly appreciate the publication of such a fine journal. May you go from strength to strength. Best wishes in the struggle.

Fraternally yours,

DARYL HEPPLE.

Gateshead, November 23.

Dear Comrades,—Guy Aldred's ideas are so full of truth, that all his writings are worth reading again and again. Particularly did I like "Dogmas Discarded", where his evolution of thought during his younger days so closely corresponds to my own.

With best wishes in the common struggle.

Sincerely yours,

WILFRED H. SHIPWAY.

Southall, Middx., 13/11/42.

Dear Sir,—I have come into possession, recently, of two issues of "The Word", and find them so eminently satisfying and stimulating, that I wish to become a registered subscriber. The two issues to hand I regard as the finest value for money ever known.

As a non-party student of politics-finance-economics and sociology. I do not particularly like your status as "an organ of the United Socialist Movement." I want to know what is a Socialist, who and what are the United Socialists, what precisely and exactly are their objectives and by what authority your paper is constituted an organ for such movement. I prefer, in fact to regard "The Word" as your own organ, in the words of your own claim, owned, edited and published by Guy A. Aldred.

The words of your Slogan, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity are to me as meaningless abstractions as "Socialism", "Fascism", "Communism", etc., etc., around all of which there is so much woolly and wishful thinking.

However, having read very closely and carefully the two issues in hand, I find myself in almost perfect agreement with the views expressed. Whilst, as I have indicated, I have no party allegiances or leanings, I have a considerable respect and regard for the views and philosophy and for the splendid courage of the Duke of Bedford, whose Social Credit views and ideas are shared by myself. I greatly admire his firm Pacifist stand. I have also a considerable admiration for that gallant fighter for true Democracy, Mr. F. W. Jowett and regard him and Maxton as being representative of a very small minority of our professional politicians who have any sincerity. As for the so-called Socialists, who are, or have been leaders of the Parliamentary Labour Party, I have nothing but contempt and pity; contempt for their lack of principle and pity for their lack of moral courage and strength of purpose.

Whilst I am an Atheist, a Sceptic, a Secularist and a Rationalist, I can respect the Christian views of his Grace the Duke of Bedford, because, unlike the mass of professing Christians he takes a stand consistent with what are generally claimed as Christian principles.

As a Pacifist—on logical, humanitarian and political grounds as distinct from religious grounds, I have had the unusual experience of being dismissed from the Army during this period of hostilities. As a Regular Reservist Officer I was recalled to the Service shortly after the outbreak of war. I had thought that my liability was terminated by reason of age limit, or would have resigned my commission.

Without seeking deliberately to be a propagandist, I determined to express and to defend my pacifistic and humanitarian views whenever and wherever involved in discussion and conversation. After many months, I was brought before a General Court Martial on several charges, including sedition, incitement to disaffection, political agitation, propaganda, conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, etc. In spite of my objections, the Court was held in camera. After two days of proceedings, almost entirely taken up by the prosecution, it was impossible to sustain the more serious charges, but I was found "guilty of making a statement calculated to create unnecessary alarm" and "guilty of conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline."

During the final opportunity afforded me by the Plea in Mitigation. I took the opportunity to conduct pacifist propaganda, pointing out that, at all times, as a Rationalist and a Freethinker, I was primarily concerned with the search for truth and determined to stand for the truth as and when I knew it. I intimated to the Court that their finding as conveyed to me, indicated that I had been found "Guilty of telling the truth." I was Cashiered.

I shall look forward to reading further the lucid and logical expression of pacifist opinion from your excellent contributors.

Wishing you health to continue the great work you have undertaken, and to your organ the success it deserves in opening the eyes of the blind to the utter futility and insanity of war, and to its inevitable consequences and aftermath of hatred and enmity, and of political and economic intrigue.

I am, yours faithfully,

H. DAY.

Bradford.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have been most interested in reading two issues of your excellent paper, "The Word." I bought one copy at a recent "Famine Meeting" at Trafalgar Square, and another at the South Place Ethical Society, Conway Hall. Unfortunately, in London, it is very difficult to secure regular copies of "The Word", and I am, therefore, enclosing one year's subscription for 3 copies to be posted to my address.

I have been interested in the fine courageous efforts on the part of the Duke of Bedford in his uncompromising stand for the pacifist way of life. I read his first two speeches that he made in the House of Lords, and was impressed greatly by the noble efforts to spread the pacifist faith and secure a saner outlook from the public, that is being constantly weaned by subtle propaganda from every direction.

Wishing you every success.

Yours sincerely,

WILFRED E. BEDFORD.

Upper Tooting, London, S.W., 12th Nov., 1942.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—For some time and for some strange reason I have been receiving from somewhere your wierd publication called "The Word." At first I didn't mind because I figured that each copy sent to me was one that would not reach someone more susceptible, but now I have begun to think of what it might mean to be known to receive such a subversive paper and feel that it would be better if I did not receive any more copies.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD B. KING,

Minister, First Universalist Church.

Junction City, Kansas, U.S.A.,

Oct. 29, 1942.

Whoever has mistaken Mr. King for a man and a thinker will please note his request. A Christian Minister should give no heed to the opinion of the world of Caesar. He should fear neither the Gestapo nor yet the F.B.I. Surely, in a democracy, one has the right to read all literature! Is not such freedom of thought and reading the essence of Christian thought and an expression of democracy? Mr. King sends me a manifesto he issued on December 17, 1941, after the United States had declared war. In this manifesto he speaks of the adoption of the American Bill of Rights on December 15, 1791, and dares to write of free speech, free press, religion, and assembly. Mr. King should read the great and immortal Jefferson on subversive literature and he should endeavour to be worthy of the fathers of the American Republic whom he quotes with approval precisely because they are dead and enjoy static reputation. He has lost touch with their dynamic spirit. He should re-read Jesus on the dead burying the dead.—Ed.

Dear Sir,—Could any of your readers enlighten me on the question "What are we fighting for?" Everytime I switch on the wireless or open my paper, I am led to understand, it is for freedom. Yet, in the last war I shed my blood, and helped to kill other human beings, on the Flanders Fields, not only in the belief that I was fighting for freedom, but that the rising generation should never know the horrors and bestiality of war. Now I find my own son, torn from my side, conscripted and crucified in a like manner, his soul not his own, but just the property of the Government. The same dope is being served out to him in the shape of "This Freedom" and the promise of a better world.

As a disabled ex-Serviceman, my experience of war, has left me a comfirmed pacifist. God never intended man to kill, maim or destroy, that which he has created. The attitude of the clergy in war-time is beyond my comprehension and one cannot but admire the faithful few who still cling to the cross instead of the sword.

Retribution will overtake the church, when men return and settle down to sanity. They will have no room in their hearts for the hypocrisy being preached at the present day. I am convinced that if the church had made the stand she should have done in war-time, we should be much nearer a better world than what we are to-day. There are many who, having passed through war, have the courage, and courage it does need in these days, to denounce that which is a crime against God and man. Yet war receives the support of Archbishops and the blessings of the Church.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I am rather interested in how "The Word" is the focal point for all sorts of apparently contradictory interests, ranging from atheistic anarchism to hierarchic Christianity.

Everyman has to live according to whatever revelation is permitted to him according to his family social contacts. Your own conception of the universe for instance is derived largely from Christian philosophy. Yours is a nature which needs no fetters to keep it from going astray. Your freedom is really limited by the ideas of justice and brotherhood, which as I have opined, are outsprings from the teaching of the Church. To come round to the opposite end of the circle of thought, there is much to be said for the Catholic idea of conscription of religious thought by means of dogma, ritual and Papal authority, when applied to the average man, who lacks the rational outlook, and if un-guided would drift into the chaos of war and international anarchy—which he has done.

I believe that if mankind followed sincerely and with faith, the teaching of the Church, then social justice, or the Kingdom of God upon Earth, would follow.

I have been studying the Catholic point of view and have been impressed by the insight of the Papal encyclicals into the problems of war and individual freedom. For instance, the danger of State control is recognised, and in place of the Marxian idea of making everyone proletariats, so that no one has anything except through the state, the Catholic believe in the necessity of private property, because it is only by the individual having something that he can call his own, that he can resist the power of the state. Of course to say private property to some socialists is to wave a red rag.

I believe in private property and the importance of the family. For this reason I am much attracted to the socialism which aims at public control over the big monopolies such as finance, transport, minerals and land but also allows freedom for industry and commerce to develop with the freedom, variety and elasticity which can only be secured by private enterprise. Profit in the sense of the securing increments which really belong to the community, would be abolished by private control—but the true profit which is the reward for enterprise and hard work would remain and be the touchstone of whether or not a business was successful, i.e. whether it served a demand or not.

I am thinking in terms of a man who has struggled to get a small factory going, and not the man for whom enterprise means a successful swindle on the Stock Exchange, or those hereditary classes who live out their lives on per cent. from investments.

I can see now the dangers of a certain type of socialism whose cry is nationalise this that and the next. It is possible to learn from experience.

I do not know why you deny God, when there is all the evidence of his power working in you. It may be a reaction from certain unrealities in human conceptions of religion. It is a revolt against a society which used the other-worldness of religion as a sanction for their material progress. In other words, by surrounding religion with a mystery which promised the poor suffering here and heaven above, they could get on with their materialistic schemes. I have often felt this. I have been studying the Catholic theology and philosophy, and it is only necessary to read what Leo XIII. said about the working classes in the '90s to realise that in the Church we have a strong bulwark against oppression.

In England the Church has been too much entangled with the State, and in fact become part of the great profit-making system, to be taken as the type of Christ's Kingdom. The Catholic Church on the other hand is independent of the national State and universal. In its published writings it is possible to find a complete answer to all the social problems. If the lives and works of the Humanists such as Thomas More, are studied it will be seen that it is possible to combine rationalism with faith which is beyond reason.

Reason can never establish the basis of faith, it can only work out the implications of it. It is possible to work out a rational case for war but the faith basis would be power, not love. You have made out a rational case for freedom and brotherhood, but the only basis I can see for that lies in the Christian conception of the fatherhood of what we call God, and as a corollary, the brotherhood of man.

With best wishes.

THOMAS MILLAR.

Norwich, Nov. 16.

Dear Guy Aldred,—It seems a far cry from the rural quietude of the Lincolnshire Fens to far off Glasgow which sounds such a busy hive of industry (and, incidentally, suggests a spot where comrades may meet and talk and plan for a better future); but, thanks to you "The Word" steps in and links us up making us a part of the great chain that is, at once, a power now and a challenge to the future.

A friend sent me "the Word" for a year as a birthday gift and now I am asking you to send it for the coming year.

When "The Word" first arrived I was a war-weary and disillusioned person, sick of the shams of the Labour Party, for which for so many years I had toiled, and from which I had expected so much, and feeling there was neither faith nor sincerity in any movement.

This was intensified by the attitude the Churches took, as I happened to be a member of the Methodist Church here and act as organist.

Well, along came "The Word" and by the tone of sincerity and the commonsense articles contributed by the Duke of Bedford, your own numerous contributions breathing out truth and hope to despondent comrades and last, but not least, the letters from comrades everywhere I am lifted out of the Slough of Despond and feel I am, once again, part of a living, fighting movement.

I was reading, last night, of your musings on looking back over the years and I mentally compared your humble summing up with the words of St. Paul as he sums up his past "I have kept the faith." Don't you think the Labour leaders of to-day (if they have the courage to look deep into their own hearts) wish they had your vision and your conscience. I am sure they do.

This letter is a humble attempt at thanking you for what you and your paper mean to an isolated comrade; for through the medium of "The Word" I am inspired to a greater belief in the future and am cheered by the knowledge that there is, with me, so great a crowd of witnesses.

A scribe of old tells us — "the word came and dwelt amongst us." Please, Guy Aldred, will you bring this quotation up to date by sending "The Word" to dwell in a humble Lincolnshire cottage?

Thank you so much for your gifts, and the uses to which you have put them, and thank you for "keeping the faith."

Yours most sincerely,
(Mrs.) MABEL HOWARD.

Boston, Lincs., 7/12/42.

Dear Sir,—Your mention of a woman conscientious objector, a Catholic, serves as a reminder that there exists a considerable body of Catholic opinion in Britain, wholeheartedly opposed to the present conflict.

The Catholic Principle, if put into practice, would necessarily imply both Pacifism and Social Reform. Unfortunately the hiatus between principle and practice is apparent in this as in other matters. Catholics who realise the issues involved should vigorously support any genuine form of Socialist or Pacifist effort, thus helping to counteract the propaganda of a type of person, all too familiar, who uses and dishonours a name to which he is not entitled. Petain, Franco, Mussolini and their gang are good examples of the type I have in mind.

I am quite aware that your excellent paper is unsectarian in outlook, but as you are also an impartial "forum" I trust you will find space for this expression of opinion.

Yours fraternally,
F. R. MORRISON.

UNDERMINING WAR PROPAGANDA

The most important problem at present confronting men and women of intelligence and good will is that of finding an effective method of undermining war propaganda. Many have at times felt tempted to regard this task as almost hopeless. It has seemed as though events must be allowed to run their course, since only through the hard lessons of experience will light be made to penetrate into minds darkened almost unbelievably by the poison of Press and radio.

Yet when "events running their course" means the sacrifice of many splendid and useful lives, we cannot rightly sit back as mere spectators of the tragedy. A considerable percentage of the victims of propaganda-poison were, in pre-war days, not only kindly but also sensible people. Unless we are prepared to acknowledge evil as a greater power than good, there must surely be an effective antidote to propaganda and it is up to us to find it, for most certainly we have not found it yet.

I should welcome from readers of "The Word" practical suggestions based on the test of experience, of lines of approach which have proved successful, so that in time we may be able to fashion an instrument really adequate to our task.

I should be also particularly glad to hear criticisms, especially hostile criticisms, of the policy of wise diplomacy which I have advocated in some of my recent writings.

"THE ABSENT CHRIST"
by The Rev. R. H. Le Messurier.

In "THE ABSENT CHRIST", Mr. Le Messurier offers his readers poems which give the impression of having been written out of the very heart of war, revealing its true nature as a Christian should see it. He speaks out of the shattering hell of the blitzing of a big city, without bitterness, but also without "drawing the blinds down" against the hideousness and stark tragedy of its effects. He beholds this flaming, insensate fury, and looks at it steadily, with the deep-seeing eye of the spirit, and knows that Christ is not "Supporting its efforts, inciting to madness, Counselling slavery that men might be free."

Writing during a raid:—

No God above
Created this unhallowed hell,
To torture His creation dear.
No God of love
Designed for man a fate so fell
As man himself, close gripped by fear,
Invented on his own.

Mr. Le Messurier makes it very clear that, having faced and experienced this ugly, evil thing, the only way to conquer it is by love and never by revenge. In "The Spirit of War" he writes

Begone, foul spirit! Not with earthly force
Will I attack thee. That were but to spread
Thine error, and increase thy bloody sway.
For love alone will change thine evil course,
Abate thy power and crush thy brutish head.
So will I love, and dare to love, for aye.

I can gladly recommend "THE ABSENT CHRIST" (Price 1/9, post free, from New Vision Publications, 47 Argyle Square, London W.C.1.) both to pacifists and to their non-pacifist friends.

SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN

The Government of Britain
A war for Freedom made;
To help the Poles beat Hitler
Our forces are arrayed.
So—they bomb the little children,
The women and the children,
They murder little children—
And call it a Crusade.

Our lads are sent on night raids
To give the Nazis hell;
To smash their war production,
And smash their wills, as well;
So—they bomb the little children,
The women and the children,
The little German children,
The tyrant's power to quell.

"And how does this help Poland?"
The thoughtful may enquire.
Our P.M. says it's bound to,
And surely he's no liar!
So—they bomb the little children,
The women and the children,
The old, the weak, the children,
And set their homes on fire.

O gallant men of Britain,
So plucky, brave and true—
Our hearts are well-nigh breaking
For what you're made to do!
You bomb the little children,
The women and the children,
You murder little children—
What does it mean to you?

And when the war is over,
Its furies passed away,
The hideous bombing silenced,
Will men of Britain say:
"We bombed the little children,
The women and the children—
But WHY did all these children
Have such a price to pay?"

EDITOR'S REPORT

In our appeal last month, we stated that £1,500 was needed to keep the paper and press going. Unless that was forthcoming, the paper would have to close down. If it was given, no more appeals would be made for 12 months. The actual sum during December was £80. With the £50 acknowledged last month, this makes £130. We wish to end this appeal and we do not want to waste space on a long story. We are struggling on for another month, since our paper was exhausted last month, and there are continuous calls for issues long sold out. Will every reader PLEASE MAKE AN EFFORT and so give us what we need this month: another £1,370. Our circulation is large and this could be done. Either this help must be forthcoming or our work must cease.

VICTOR WALKER

Dear Comrade,—I am writing to you in connection with the death of my brother Victor Kenneth Walker, following shortly upon his release from Prison, where he served a sentence of 12 months as a result of his conscientious objection based on Socialist grounds.

The Central Board of Conscientious Obectors published a statement on the subject, in their "Bulletin" as did "Peace News."

The original Medical Report contained a passage in which the Doctor stated, "in my opinion Victor Walker has had heart trouble for a number of years."

We, who knew Victor, were sure that this was not the case, and as a result have been challenging this "opinion" We now have a very different report in our hands from the doctor who carried out the Post Mortem.

The whole case is a great outrage and demands the greatest publicity. Victor age 25, was a real stalwart fighter in the Socialist movement. He entered prison vibrant with life and vitality and was released a human wreck, just able to crawl home into bed where he stayed till he died 3 months later. During this time he had 2 doctors, 1 specialist, and was in 2 hospitals. I might add that while in Prison I, personally, complained to the Governor, but nothing was done. These brief notes do not in any way do justice to the case, and I suggest that if you consider dealing with the case, you should publish the full details.

In passing, I would like to mention that I have seen some statements from C.O.s, recently gathered by Charles Harding, of Catford. They show up the prison Medical system in a way that has made my hair stand on end. They are so bad that several C.O.s have decided to form a new organisation to be known as the prison Medical Reform Council.

This Council is taking charge of all the statements in my brother's case. I suggest that all who are interested in the facts, should write to The Secretary, Prison Medical Reform Council, Roger Page, 12 West Park, London, S.E.9.

Yours sincerely,
HAROLD WALKER.

THOSE BOLSHIE FIGURES!

In my article in "The Word" for December, what appears to be a printer's error is found in the fifth last paragraph, thus, "Thus Stalin says 3,500 Germans dead, Churchill says 2,000,000 German dead, and Hitler says 271,000 German dead."

The figure as from Stalin should read 3,500,000, and NOT 3,500.

Since that article was written which gave the official Soviet figure of German dead, wounded and prisoners in the German-Russo war from June, 1941 to June, 1942, as standing at 10,000,000, there has appeared in the press MORE AMAZING NEWS. In the STOP PRESS of the evening papers for 3rd November, 1942, and in all the morning journals on the 4th November, it was reported that "George Alexandroff, Propaganda Chief of the Central Committee" had stated in "Izvestia," that "Ten million Germans have been killed or put out of action on Russian Front since the war began."

Ten million was the OFFICIAL figure at end of June, 1942, and now at the beginning of November it is still ten million, no more, no less. All of which is an OFFICIAL ADMISSION BY THE SOVIETS that since June not a single German has been killed, wounded or taken prisoner by the Bolshies.

What will Communist propaganda in this country be telling us next?

ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE.

THE FUTURE:

Resolutions or Revolution?

By ANNESLEY G. ALDRED.

Once again the fulness of time brings us to the threshold of yet another year. And as we stand there, well into the fourth year of yet another ghastly war, we may well wonder just where we are going to head for during that year. It may be that the events of this year will decide the future of mankind for many years to come, and, if that be so, it is imperative that we should throw off our mental lethargy and spend some time in considering who is going to have the say in the shaping of that future.

It is traditional, with the advent of a New Year, for one to make a number of most pious resolutions with the object of ensuring that one's life shall, in future, be quite blameless. Nor does the knowledge that there is not the slightest intention of adhering to them detract one iota from the feeling of righteousness which pervades as they are made.

Strangely enough at the present phase of the war, with war-weariness creeping over even the most perfervid of "patriots" it is becoming almost equally traditional for the political "New Era" resolutions to be placed before us also with a great show of unctious righteousness. And so they have, once more, been carefully dusted and polished and placed on show so that mankind may take a glimpse at the wonderful world we are to have once the war is won.

Unfortunately in spite of the spring-cleaning these resolutions still bear a tarnished and faded appearance. Then too there are those who recall that those same pledges are still owing from the last war, and perhaps the war before that. There are even some who have had the temerity to ask for some clear indication of the Government's intentions after the war.

And so, on Sunday, 29th November, Mr. Churchill replied:

"Certainly the most painful experiences would lie before us . . . if we fell to quarrelling about what we should do with our victory before that victory had been won."

No doubt it was his considered opinion that such a solemn warning should be sufficient to stop anyone from asking again for some indication of the basis of the peace which, we are to believe, is to prevent the horrors of war from being visited again upon mankind.

Nevertheless one cannot help feeling that the picture thus presented is over full of contradiction. On the one hand we have the picture of the "Knights of the Round Table" fighting for the freedom of the peoples of the world—Britain, America, Russia and, in a small voice, China. The champions of liberty marching forward shoulder to shoulder. Then we have the picture of those same champions quarrelling amongst themselves how best to share the produce of the world amongst its inhabitants so that all get a fair share. Surely a strange reason for quarrelling — or could it be, perchance, that what they are really discussing is how to share the loot?

With such a vision before one it would be excuseable to begin to doubt how, then, a peace treaty which is a basis for a lasting peace can be framed. But, fear not, for has not Mr. Churchill anticipated that doubt and, before even it could be expressed, replied to it too. Here it is, from later in the same speech:

"It may well be that the war in Europe will come to an end before the war is Asia . . . It seems to me that should the war end thus . . . there will be a far higher sense of comradeship around the council table than existed among the victors at Versailles. Then the danger had passed away. The common bond between the Allies had snapped. There was no sense of corporate responsibility such as exists when victorious nations, who are masters of one vast scene, are most of them still waging war side by side in another."

Behold the solution! Perhaps the greatest political conjuring trick of all time. The way to make a lasting peace is to make the peace treaty whilst still engaged in fighting somewhere else. Of course, that means that no lasting peace can be made in the Pacific because by the time that Peace Conference comes the rest of the world will be at peace!

It is, however, a pity not to give such a magnificent effort a second chance so perhaps it is not too late to suggest that the alternative would be to frame the European peace aims whilst the Pacific war is still on and frame the Pacific peace aims whilst the European war is still on.

The logic of his own argument is, in fact, irrefutable. If there were the slightest intention of making a peace for the benefit of the mass of the people now would be the time to state those aims. But, of course, there is no intention to state such aims for the whole business is a shoddy, shabby fraud and deception.

Somehow, then, we have got to make it clear that we want our full voice in the shaping of the world that we, and our children, and our children's children, will have to live in. Somehow we must make certain that we do have that voice.

But as certain as it is that we must have it, so certain is it that the Government are determined that we shall not have it even through the medium of the completely petrified machine at Westminster.

It has long ben inferred that there will be no election for at least two or three years after the end of the war. The feeble remnants of the Labour Party are finding that their leaders are, one by one, being bought over, used, discredited and discarded—a double insurance that when the time comes there will not be any voice powerful enough to raise itself in protest, nor yet will the Labour Party be able to disown a share of responsibility in the sell-out.

It is true that two days after Mr. Churchill's speech the ragged rump of the Parliamentary Labour Party made a belated effort, under the third-rate leadership of one of its ex-Cabinet Ministers, to restore some of its lost prestige by moving an amendment to the King's Speech, demanding a statement of the Government's war aims. But even that motion was not pressed, and in any case the size of the majority, ensured if need be by the Tory Whip, made it a very safe thing to do. For it is already nearly twenty years since the Party learned, under the leadership of their arch-prevaricator Ramsay MacDonald, the tactics of demanding when in opposition reforms which they would not dare to sanction when in power.

It was during this debate that Sir William Jowitt, whose political cloak must now seriously rival Joseph's coat of many colours, outlined what one Tory rag was pleased to call "The Shape of Things to Come after the war."

And it was also whilst the debate was still in progress that the Beveridge "red herring" was finally brought into the light of day.

"Capital", said Jowitt, "must be ready to seek new opportunities, labour to be more fluid, the Government to help in both directions." And then, after foreseeing "years of very good employment" he added "After the period of brisk employment in war the people will not accept the view again, that a prolonged period of unemployment is inevitable."

Meanwhile Sir William Beveridge was piously recommending an insurance scheme guaranteeing a minimum basic existence for all. He fixed the £2 per week for unemployment, so we are told, because he thinks it is the very least a man and wife can live on!

One London evening paper commenting on the report gave "some representative opinions." These emanated from the following:

Sir John Wardlaw-Milne, M.P.
Sir Edward Mountain, Chairman of the Eagle Star Insurance Co.
Mr. Percy Rockliff, Secretary of the Joint Committee of Approved Societies.
Lord Latham
Sir Harold Webbe, M.P.
Mr. L. C. White of the Civil Service Clerical Association.
Sir Ian Fraser, M.P.
Dr. A. Welply, Secretary of the Medical Practitioners' Union.
Captain Somerset de Chair, M.P. (Parliamentary Private Secretary to Mr. Oliver Lyttleton).

The opinion of Mr. "Billy" Brown, much published during the "London can take it" campaign, one of the chief "benificiaries" under the scheme was, presumably, held over owing to lack of space.

Captain Somerset de Chair gave a most interesting comment:

"This plan promises what we young Conservatives have always demanded—a square deal for the working man within the existing social and economic framework, instead of some Utopia on the further side of an economic torrent."

Therein lies the crux of the whole matter. With every lie and trick and decoy the workers must be fobbed off until the "old firm" has securely re-established itself. You will get a square deal "within the existing social and economic framework." The same old business but, just to cheer you up, they will put an "Under Entirely New Management" notice in the window.

The Governing class knows, only too well, wherein their moment of danger lies. For centuries the workers have, literally, marched shoulder to shoulder to fight wars they do not want and which bring them nothing but degradation, misery, starvation, disease and death, as the masses of Europe know only too well at this moment. For centuries they have allowed themselves, in peace-time, to be divided by all the artificial barriers of race, creed, colour and craft. It is the transition period from peace to war which, without doubt, provides the greatest menance to the present rotten economic structure. The danger that ere the workers forget that they have died shoulder to shoulder they may decide that ". . . we no master need;

To live upon this earth our own
In fair and manly deed."

Time presses and soon the choice will have to be made. A choice that may well mean the difference between stepping back a hundred years or moving forward a hundred years. The choice between a real peace or the ever-recurrent horrors of war. The choice, in brief, between the shallow, deluding Capitalist Resolutions and deep, purposeful, all emancipating Workers' Revolution.

OF HUNGER LET US SING

Of Hunger let us sing,
Praise the Lord for its mad pain.
Not the Hunger of the belly,
But the Hunger of the brain,
The Hunger that makes Mortals dare
To build a world that's bright and fair.

The Hunger that makes pale men strive
To solve great mysteries,
The Hunger the reformer feels
To build his Paradise,
The Hunger of the poet
Who would deathless Beauty make,
Ay, thank God for raving Hunger,
And the pain that makes hearts break.

THE SOWER

"OUR CAUSE"!

A STUDY IN "COMMUNIST" CANT AND RANT

"The Daily Worker" does not like the Strickland Press. But then it never liked the Bakunin Press, of which the Strickland Press is but the direct continuation, without any break or interruption of Socialist, Pacifist, and Revolutionary activity.

"A Worker's Notebook", in its issue for December 22, 1942, devotes its opening paragraphs to a denunciation of our activity. We make the following excerpt:—

Among those sources of anti-Soviet propaganda, whose efflux seems to seep around pretty widely, is the Strickland Press, of Glasgow.

This institution, which owes its existence to the legacy of Sir Walter Strickland, is administered by an anarchist-pacifist, Guy Aldred—of repute not unknown at least to older members of the Labour movement.

The Strickland Press publishes a periodical entitled "The Word." Its remarkable variety of propaganda lines include pacifism, anarchism, Trotskyism and social credit.

Here is a collection of samples from the current issue:

"The recent Moscow celebrations, and the references, for war alliance purposes, in the capitalist Press, throughout Britain and the United States, to Stalin as though he were creator of the Red Army are nauseating to those who believe in truth as a pearl beyond all price."

Unsigned book notice.

"We are entirely opposed to Stalin and do not believe the enemies of Stalin are, of necessity, the enemies of Soviet Russia."

The editor (Aldred).

Compared with past attacks upon our activity, this comment is mild. The unsigned book notice clearly, as the paper states, was written by "The editor (Aldred)." Our contemporary omits all reference to the book reviewed. Why? Was the work unanswerable. The quotation from "The editor (Aldred)" was a necessary introduction, very brief, to a long essay from the pen of our comrade, F. W. Jowett, defending the Soviet Union against a short comment on the Soviet-Nazi pact we had published in an earlier issue. Jowett was allowed the final word in defence of Stalin and the Soviet. Our explanation was to make that fact clear. Why did not our critic say so? But does the fact that we permitted comrade Jowett to defend the Soviet, without replying, make us a Stalinist?

"The Daily Worker" proceeds to quote from Alexander Ratcliffe's criticism of Soviet casualty figures in his article "Falsehood in War Time." It styles Ratcliffe the leader of Protestant Action and states that his propaganda appears little different from that of Catholic Action. If Ratcliffe's analysis is false, or if his facts are stated wrongly the columns are open for a reply. This is a free and democratic journal. Not one of the contributors is sacred. We want the truth and if the truth is with the Soviet in this matter, our columns wish to record the fact.

Under a sub-heading "Defeatist Duke", the critic turns from Ratcliffe to the Duke of Bedford. He says:—

Defeatist Duke.

Defeatism is represented, in the organ of the Strickland Press, by the writings of the Duke of Bedford. In his "War Commentary" in the current issue of "The Word", he unashamedly uses the Allied success in North Africa as basis for advocating negotiation with the Nazis.

Then follows a quotation in which the Duke pleads for the forces of reason to make a peace approach. The critic adds:—

In his summing-up of the situation which fills him with such hope, the Duke complacently counts Russia out, as "largely crippled!"

What, ho! cripples of the Don!

A Lavish Press.

There's money in this Strickland Press. I have an interesting collection of half-a-dozen of its pamphlets, printed, in these days of paper scarcity, in astonishingly expensive style.

The heaviest, glossiest paper, in covers of high quality, is used to embalm the views of the Duke of Bedford—truly ducal style, in fact.

And just why should wealth be free now to sabbotage our cause?

We have nothing to say against the tragic heroism of the Soviet defenders, who, by the way, are becoming quite an orthodox army, with commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and signs of rank on their uniform. But when the history of the struggle is written, might it not be discovered that British and American supplies have played a tremendous part in the Soviet battlefield? The heroism is there, and also the tragedy. But how much thanks is due to the bureaucratic dictators and organisers of the Republic? Also, let it not be forgotten, that the Nazi host is entrenched still in Soviet Russia, even though its days may be numbered.

The remark about money comes ill from the Communist Party, whose remarkable changes of point on all questions, from tactics to principle, have been dictated by subsidies. We need not go into that story now, which has been discussed thoroughly in the past by the present Conservative Capitalist colleagues of the "Communists."

If our press is lavish, it is as our press has been since we started it in 1906, unsubsidised and uncontrolled. Our propaganda is above bribery and cannot be corrupted. Our press is not lavish in itself but only in relation to our means. Actually it is today as it has been always, a rather poor affair in actual staff and machinery.

We like "The Daily Worker's" phrase about wealth sabotaging our cause! Was "The Daily Worker" suppressed for its loyalty to our cause? Did it support our cause so long as the Nazi-Soviet Pact was not violated? The answer to these questions are known. They are factual and present a daring study in zig-zag opportunism and corruption. Why has not "The Daily Worker" consistently supported our cause since the declaration of war in September, 1939?

We have on our desk, as we write, copies of "The Scottish Daily Worker" for these dates: December 7, 9, 11, 12, 1940; January 13, 16, 17, 1941. Would our critic like us to quote from these issues at length to prove how little loyalty was shown to our cause by "The Daily Worker" and the "Communist" Propagandists?

And here is a quotation from "The Daily Worker" for May 14, 1940, attacking the landing of British Forces in Europe:—

On this day British working men, on the orders of the capitalist Government, face death and wounds in Belgium in the biggest and most murderous international gang fight of capitalist society that has ever been seen.

Was this loyalty to our cause?

In the "Labour Monthly" for December 1940, Harry Pollitt wrote:—

Labour's own daily ("Daily Herald") hails Churchill as Britain's man of destiny. That is the measure of Labour's shame, a betrayal of every principle of Socialism and Peace.

He wrote much more to the same effect. This extract is sufficient to demonstrate Harry Pollitt's loyalty to our cause!

Those who wish to know how well "The Daily Worker" and the "Communists" have defended our cause should read the I.L.P. pamphlet by Thomas Taylor, "Defend Socialism from the Communists." At no time has the Communist Party stood for principle or pursued a policy of service to mankind. The Communist Party is the most disgraceful and most corrupt episode in world politics. Its members are the most despicable and unprincipled hirelings the struggle of the classes, and the oppressions of Imperialist society, have produced. They pioneered the terrorist mentality of Fascism and they reduced the propaganda of Socialism to a verbiage of cant and hypocrisy. They combine the gifts of parrots with the instincts of vultures and so prey ceaslessly on human suffering. The Communist Party is the Russian Counter-Revolution retarding the struggle against capitalism. It has spread disease throughout the working class movement. Decent men and women everywhere should view its activity with horror.

To-day, we offend the subsidised organ of that party of corruption because we have "a lavish press!" Actually, as stated already, we have nothing of the kind. Let any worker inspect our press and see for himself. One monthly paper. A lavish press! What nonsense! But does "The Daily Worker" columnist recall the attack he made on us on September 13, 1930, under the caption, "An Anarchist's Epitaph?" It rejoiced then in the fact that we were without money and bankrupt. We were very poor because of our quarter-of-a-century of tireless propaganda, and so the stooges sneered! Now they think we have "a lavish press" and write, in opposition, but more politely. What knaves! What sycophants!

THE IMAGE OF GOD

[The following poem was published during the last war. Its author only became a Labour M.P. many years after the war, partly because of his opposition to war. We reprint the poem without permission as a reminder to poets not to inspire anti-militarism ideals and then, with dull careerism, turn pro-war.—Ed.

I slaughtered a man, a brother,
In the wild, wild fight at Mons.
I see yet his eyes of horror,
I hear yet his cries and groans.
We met on the edge of the trenches,
Where murder, in crimson, rode.
When swish went my blade to his stomach.
I'd slaughtered the Image of God.

We'd never in anger quarrelled.
We never had met before.
But someone had dreamt of conquest,
And we had to buy it with gore.
Perhaps he'd a wife and children,
Through whose hopes and dreams he strode,
With the pride of a king in his empire.
An heroic Image of God.

And I asked myself the question,
As I saw in his glazing eyes:
"Am I my brother's keeper?"
Till the sod I trod on cries:
"You made his wife a widow,
Made desolate her abode.
Your thrust made his children orphans.
You slaughtered the Image of God."

The cold, cold stars keep blinking,
And the winds make moaning sighs.
Men worship me as hero, and laud me to the skies.
But I keep on thinking dully, till my heart gets like a clod,
Of the thrust I made in the trenches
That slaughtered the Image of God.

SOCIALISM AND MONETARY REFORM

Dear Guy Aldred,—As a Socialist there are one or two things I would certainly agree with in Sir Alliott Verdon-Roe's suggestions for monetary reform. There is no doubt that the banks with their financial prestidigations have a powerful stranglehold on the life of the community and the taking over of the banks will be a very necessary step on the part of any Socialist Government. But the banks like any other essential feature of our community lie in the hands of the ruling class, and the Government to-day is there to protect and safeguard their control and privileges, a control and privilege which has its basic expression in profit-making. Now as I understand—the labour theory of value is that surplus value is created by the worker and stolen from him by the ruling class. Now actual wealth—money has no value in itself—is raw material plus labour power, which can be used either in transforming raw materials into things useful and necessary to the life of the community, or expended in labour service necessary to the running of that community. What is the relation of this actual wealth to so-called money wealth? My knowledge of finance is confined to my pay envelope, but still I would like to ask a few simple questions about it.

When the gold standard crisis was at its height, prominent statesmen and so-called responsible editors were shivering in their shoes at the approaching, as they thought, national disaster. All this terror and gloomy prophecy was occasioned by the separation of the pound from the gold standard. When this threat did materialise without the subsequent catastrophe, the very gentlemen who had shivered in their shoes so much, now expanded their chests and shouted financial hallelujahs, crying "It's the best thing that could have happened to the country." Curiously enough whilst this grave financial problem was being decided, the railways continued to run, the mines to turn out their usual quota of coal, the baker's ovens their supply of morning rolls — this before and after the prophesied catastrophe. Apart from its affect on foreign exchange, which is merely finance again, this crisis of the gold standard, had no real basic connection, apart from superficialities, with the capacity of the community to produce real wealth and to run the necessary services. The pound was once based on gold. What was the connection between gold and real wealth? The gold was taken away, what is the pound now based on? And if it was on any new measurement, what is the relationship, between this new measurement and ultimately the pound, with real wealth?

It seems to me that if money is to have any real value it must be based on real or potential wealth, and as long as that real wealth is kept in the hands of a minority, and assuming, that money is actually based on real wealth then it is difficult to see how the ruling class would allow its representatives to create new money for the purpose of enabling the community to buy the surplus products, which glut the markets and fill the warehouses to overflowing, far less clear the debts of approved enterprises, unless that new money in itself was again based on real wealth, so that the capitalist would feel that instead of getting a lot of useless pieces of paper in return for his goods, he was getting something of real value. It is only a Socialist Government, as far as I can see, that can adjust a sane and serviceable system of exchange between producer and consumer, whether in the form of a pound note or a labour note, because the wealth of the country being in the hands of the people, and a Socialist Government being the real representatives of the people, it is only then by a proper assessment of supply and demand, that a Socialist Government by creating new labour notes, credit notes or any other kind of note, can solve the problem of overproduction, thus allowing the wealth produced by the community to return to the community. The new notes would be based on the actual surplus wealth of the community, and there would be no danger of obstruction from a minority of interests who controlling the actual wealth of the community, would regard the issue of new money as worthless pieces of paper, giving them no return in real wealth.

As I said earlier in my criticisms of monetary reform, I am not a financial expert and these are just a few of the problems which present themselves to my mind as a Socialist.

With best wishes, I am, yours sincerely,

A. FRASER DUTHIE.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Guy Aldred,—You and the Duke of Bedford have your kingdom right at your hand when you require anti-war propaganda. Indeed your office itself is in a slum building which I believe in all conscience to be one of the very worst in Europe. So that if you begin to develop the slum-problem here you are in on a vital theme which in the nature of things is bound to outlast the war. Thousands of people are interested in this housing problem. Indeed there are thousands now undergoing sleepless nights thinking of it.

Why should house-building be left till after the war? Surely it is an immediate war aim? Why not invite the bombed-out survivors of Clydeside to write to you for publication in "The Word?" They could and would tell us all something. In a week or two the agitation should assume such proportions as to counteract the war-propaganda effectively and progressively.

Even before the war the housing problem was a grim one here, and now it is something of real importance to the entire community. I'm certain myself it is the most important problem for the people here and elsewhere. Nearly everybody would be immediately interested here if only you'd set the demand in motion. That is, perhaps, why I doubt, with all respect, if you'll touch the housing problem here with the proverbial barge-pole.

Fraternally yours,

ALEXANDER McARTHUR.

Glasgow, C.5. January 5, 1943.

Dear Sir,—Please discontinue sending any further copies of "The Word" to my house — cancel the remainder of my order.

I cannot tolerate your unkind attitude to Russia any longer, and far from distributing the copies received this morning, I have handed them over for waste to the refuse man.

No wonder your appeal for funds finds no support —when you understand that the people's heart and mind is with Russia, and that Russia alone is fighting this terror of Nazism—when you stick to your guns as an atheist, and not allow the publication of the religious dope, but use your paper to remove the silly superstition and rot from the people's minds, encourage the sensible and only way—then and then only will we rally and support you.

Meanwhile I have stuck it as long as I can, please strike my name from your lists.

Yours faithfully,

H. J. GRIFFITHS.

Rhyl, Flintshire, June 6, 1943.

P.S. This article by Kaikhorsu Shapurji Sorabji is about the last straw—if you cannot help Russia, you can at least keep quiet, still I do not think your paper now carries much weight amongst the masses.

[This sort of thing happens to all radical journals. We are grateful to our friend for his intolerance and inability to reason. It provides an admirable study in "Communist" and military psychology. The refuse men made good use of "The Word." As a result of their research, we now have 20 personal subscribers in Rhyl that we did not possess before the public employees of Rhyl took a hand in the game of circulation. And one comrade has ordered 50 copies to be sent to him for circulation. Congratulations, Mr. Griffiths!—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—As one of the subscribers to "The Word", I would like to say how much I appreciate its fine matter and stand against the most horrible violence of these days. The contribution, "The Cure", by the Rev. Le Messurier was terrible beyond imagination. Had he indeed such a revolting experience in his own memory? War is a series of such things. Is it more wicked or more absolutely silly? That is what I am asking myself always.

I should like to know how you regard the question of vivisection and animal research, of which the most advertised branch, just now, perhaps, is Immunisation —so-called.

You will remember, perhaps, the Tail Waggers' Case. I was the defendant. But I shall know, to the end of my days, that I ought to have brought it off.

Do you not think that our exploitation of these living beings—animals subject to experiment and then slaughter—is fundamentally allied to all human exploitation. We have grades of importance: animals; less important humans: then the experts and the great. But it means greed, selfishness; in short, materialism!

Yours sincerely,

BLANCHE A. WATSON.

Hull, Yorks.

Dear Guy Aldred,—"The Cure", by the Rev. Le Messurier, is terrible, but needed to be said. I feel that the crime and horror of war hardly can be exaggerated, when we consider the awfulness of the weapons employed, and the blasphemous hatred and the violence of the thought that is being broadcast today.

I feel dreadfully sorry that "The Word" should be jeopardised for want of money. I only wish that it were in our power to help. Alas! it is not. I do think, though, that it might be better known in Hull and neighbourhood.

My sister and I wish you every success in the great work you are doing, and we hope that many who are able to come to your rescue will do so.

Yours sincerely,

Hull. ELEANOR WATSON.

Dear Friends,—The literature I received from you recently—i.e., "Richard Carlile", "The Devil's Chaplain", and 'Dogmas Discarded"—has proved most interesting. One point has puzzled me since reading Carlile. How is it, that, although Richard Carlile and Robert Taylor, were persecuted for propagating their views and publishing banned works, they were allowed, when in prison, to continue their writing, and to have published, material similar to that which had led to their prosecution. Can you explain?

With Best Wishes to you all.

Yours sincerely,

STANLEY H. ELLISDON.

Ilford, Essex, 17/12/42.

[This matter has been dealt with in "The Word" and also in "The Spur." Our comrade ought to read Leigh Hunt's account of his imprisonment. Carlile was imprisoned before the Reform Act. It is absurd to think that, in these days of alleged democratic parliamentarism under alleged "Socialist" Secretaries of State, political prisoners and prisoners for heresy and blasphemy should be treated worse than such prisoners in the days of Castlereagh and Eldon. It is a fact, however, and an indictment of our "Socialist" parliamentarism.—Ed.]

Dear Guy,—I was discharged from Lincoln Prison yesterday, December 19th, after serving 4 months of my 6 months' sentence. I served the whole of the sentence at Lincoln.

I wish to thank you for the publicity you gave to my case in the October and November issues of "The Word."

During my imprisonment, I had plenty of time for thought and I left prison more convinced, than ever, of the righteousness of our cause. Yes, I am a firmer Socialist and Pacifist than I was at the time of my sentence.

Prison is a most unpleasant experience. It is very, very unpleasant at times. But I have found that, inspired by a good cause, one's principles prove firm and confidence develops in oneself. The inconvenience and persecution promote an understanding sense of humour, and soon there is nothing to fear.

Until my imprisonment, I felt that it was a privilege to be associated, in a very small way, with the many grand comrades, of both sexes, all ages, and all ranks and conditions, who constitute our great movement of witnessing for the sacred cause of humanity and peace. To-day, I feel more privileged, as having a real place in this movement, since I have been called upon to suffer for our principles. Yet I am aware that, by comparison, my experience is mere dust and ashes. Still, I have witnessed and I am honoured that you recorded so faithfully my stand. I will try to deserve the publicity you gave me.

I do not regret having taken my definite stand as a Pacifist and a Socialist and an opponent of all war.

I remain, in the struggle

Yours fraternally,

NORMAN LEVERITT.

FATHER & SIX SONS ALL CONCHIES

On page 76 we publish a letter from our Streatham Anarchist comrade, Alfred C. Toye. Comrade Toye and his six sons were all born, in a manner of speaking, to the profession of optics. Each served an apprenticeship to Sight Testing and Spectacle Making as City of London Apprentices, and have received the Freedom of the City in recognition of service to the craft. Alfred, Charles, John, Albert, Henry, Stanley, at the outbreak of the present war, each had his own Professional Practice at Streatham, Dagenham, Twickenham, Wembley, Hounslow and Putney. Their professional status did not cause them to repudiate their principle of war resistance and opposition to capitalist Society when the time came to avow their views.

Dear Guy Aldred,—The enclosed letter I received from an anonymous writer who as you see signs himself as an "Englishman." It shows you to what extent victimisation will go even in these days of so-called enlightenment.

Amongst the more obvious mistakes the writer has made, is the fact that we are by no means a "safe" area having received our share of bombs and casualties, etc. Also, he seems ignorant of the fact that I am a lorry-driver pressed into National Service, i.e., Agriculture, and that I had to get the shop managed as best I could under the utmost difficulties. The fact that I have been on the dole twice and experienced pawn-shops, etc., perhaps accounts for the fact that I am disinclined to close down a business I have built up through much travail, much as he would be overjoyed to see me do so. Needless to say the letter came without a stamp (5d. to pay).

This letter from "An Englishman" will give readers an idea of the sort of people they may come up against in "The New World!"

Yours sincerely,

W. S. KAY.

Bramley, Surrey, December 17, 1942.

LETTER RECEIVED BY COMRADE W. S. KAY.

Dear Sir,—I understand that you belong to the Peace Movement and have been exempted from National Service on grounds of conscience. I would like to make it clear to you that almost everyone in Britain is a Pacifist by nature and outlook—but, when a race of brutes in Europe rise and would rob us of our lives and freedoms, we are justified in resisting them. When this same race massacres and mutilates tens upon thousands of men, women and children, we are doing a Christian act in bringing them to book.

If, however, there are amongst us a few—a very few—thank God—who have no courage, who have weak and flabby minds, who hide behind protestations of disturbed consciences at the thought of physical war—then those few miserable and useless persons should hide themselves with their shameful and cowardly thoughts.

That you and your family have the audacity and hyprocrisy to keep a shop open and make as much money as you can from the outcome of war, is surely an indication that your blood is of water and your colour yellow.

To add to this infamy you do not hesitate—with your family—to broadcast your wretched little ideas to your customers.

The writer is taking it upon himself to inform the authorities on the matter. Not the local ones—but those actually in authority in the highest places.

In conclusion I would consider it a salutory lesson if you were transported to an area where death and desolation reigned, where lives and homes were destroyed frequently, but where the inhabitants shewed infinite courage and demanded retaliations, e.g., Plymouth, Coventry, etc.

There your miserable little souls would surely find shame, and perhaps a very latent spark of manhood and womanhood assert itself.

I do hope that you do not also degrade the name of Christ by dragging Him in to cover your weak and cowardly professions.

In the meantime thank your lucky stars that you are in the safest area in England and that millions of our men are protecting you.

From "AN ENGLISHMAN."

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I would like to tell you that my wife and I are reading your book "Why Jesus Wept." It is a fine piece of work, splendidly written; and there are many passages of nice perception and subtle expression. The section—"The Philanthropist", which I read aloud to my wife last night, is, we think, the most true and beautiful tribute to the real greatness and goodness of Jesus that we have read.

All good wishes.

E. E. BRISCOE.

Hever, Kent, December 16, 1942.

Dear Comrade Guy,—I must thank you for Strickland's "March of Homicide" and Carlile's "Jail Journal", which I am now reading. Both authors are powerful champions of Liberty, and your own life follows closely in the footsteps of Richard Carlile.

I am much inspired by reading "Jail Jottings." Carlile undoubtedly had much understanding.

I should like to see more space given to Anarchist thought in "The Word"—articles on Bakunin, Malatesta and Durruti.

With all good wishes for the coming New Year and sincere Socialist Greetings.

SIDNEY KAYE.

Rickmansworth, Herts, 28/12/42.

Dear Comrade Guy Aldred,—I have received the beautifully bound copy of "The Word." It is a wonderful book and I wish that every worker might have a copy at his or her elbow: what a storehouse of wisdom and courage. It is a treasured volume and I turn to it again and again with real happiness and pleasure.

Last night I read your article on "Militarism and Woodlands", and I was so moved by it that I re-read it to my husband. There was no need for apology in reproducing such an article. I felt the pathos and the pity of your position at the time when you wrote. And I was moved almost to tears by the beauty and sadness of your reverie; but at the same time I felt filled with the bitterest resentment against the puffed up fools who could shut away genius and attemp to break its spirit. Surely you, as well as Jesus, have known the bitterness of Gethsemane and almost the loneliness and friendlessness of Calvary.

When I read the shoals of letters you receive I am so glad you have so many appreciative friends but what a pity that when you needed help the most, your so-called comrades were missing!

This brings me to my reactions to your ideas expressed in your essays, especially "Why Jesus Wept."

I don't think I'm so much shocked as annoyed, yes annoyed at myself for my laziness in not thinking things out more honestly. I don't think I've ever really thought seriously about Jesus as a revolutionary simply because he has never been presented in precisely that light to me.

My real idea of Jesus has been some one to whom I could reach out when needing inspiration and solace and I have felt (rather as the Duke of Bedford suggests) that without the living Jesus, I could never achieve anything worthwhile or be able to deal with tiresome people with kindliness and justice or overcome my shortcomings; he has been, and is, what you would term a "prop" to bolster up my acknowledged human frailty.

I find, on re-reading "Why Jesus Wept", that I like the portrait of Jesus you present there much better than the hazy one I had formed before. When stripped of the foolish fripperies which have draped his life and character, your Jesus is a lovely and lovable man, and I like him with his understanding of the poor and downtrodden, and his desire to give them a fuller life, much better than the ethereal figure we have been accustomed to.

Your words and phrases are inspired by the understanding of one who, too, is inspired with love for suffering humanity and it is only one who has himself known the bitterness and loneliness of sacrifice who could deal so sympathetically with the character of Jesus,

I haven't bothered much about God for a long time. I have thought, I must admit, what a horrible person he must be if one has to lie down and fawn at his feet promising to reward him for a life that is none of our own choosing for the air we breathe and for all the things which are part of our human life, but most of all his failure to respond when we approach him and his general air of aloof superiority.

Curiously enough, I hadn't pictured him as an earthly king sat upon a throne with a few favourites round him, deaf to the cry of the poor and oppressed as you portray him. But I realise that is the kind of god we have had thrust upon us, an exact replica of the human kind: as you suggest in your quotation from Emerson, a picture of the meanness of man's mind in its most corrupt form.

I thought your definition of tears was most beautiful. It brought home to me the tragedy of the life of Jesus more forcibly than I have ever known any account of his life to do. Bitter tears are the symbols of pity and understanding and I feel that your essay has made me realise the significance of that terse sentence "Jesus wept."

I have to confess that I have never read Carlile, and I do not know much about his character and works. I am anxious to read your biography of him.

May the blessings of the workers bear you up and keep you, never lonely but aware of our thoughts of you is the warmest wish of yours most sincerely,

MABEL HOWARD.

My Dear Guy Aldred,—The Glorious Gospel of Discontent, has been my love since a boy. I recall the days of Karl Marx, William Morris, Prince Kropotkin, Louise Mitchell, Blatchford, Ingersoll, Annie Besant, G. W. Foot, John Burns, when we met and sang in chorus "The Carmagnol," William Morris's inspiring songs, and "Bonny Annie Lawrie", in memory of the 7 Anarchist martyrs of Chicago. That rebel Gospel of Discontent was my life's young blood and now in my declining years it inspires me still. I feel sure I shall be true to the gospel till death and I am no less sure that, one day, mankind will dwell in commonweal and freedom.

I am the proud father of six sons, all Conscientious Objectors. I enclose a picture of them together with myself taken by "The Daily Mirror." We are all opticians.

As paradoxical as it may seem, my adherence to the Gospel of Discontent has given me in my old age a contentment that passes my understanding. When I die, I shall leave behind eight confirmed anarchists, six sons and two daughters. One of the girls is also an optician in her own practice.

My attention was drawn to your publication "The Word" at a family Christmas party. We all went out for a drink when one of my sons said, "here is an old Socialist, dad", introducing a stranger. It took but a very little conversation for me to learn he was one of the old school—an Anarchist. On leaving we invited him home for a song round the fire. He sang two good old comic songs, and then said: the price of the books is two pence," and brought out about a dozen copies of "The Word." Midst our laughter and jokes he soon sold out. Then I discovered he knew the tune and the words of an old song that I knew well. So we sang a duet and this was it:

Steer wide of the poison of the press,
Leave your grand old mass-leaders alone.
It will pay you for your pains,
If you'll educate your brains,
And do a little thinking of your own, your own, your own.
Yes, and do a little thinking of your own.
When leisure and pleasure will be free,
When hardship and hunger will go,
When the worker has his place at the top of the tree,
And the landlord is somewhere down below, below, below,
And the landlord is somewhere down below.
Then it was the boys' turn.
A jolly good song jolly well sung
Jolly good company every one.

That took me back to the old days for a few minutes. My musing must have been noticed somehow, for one of the boys pointing at me, said: "Die-hard is himself again." Then came a great big Christmas laugh from all the company.

Yes, I have had a jolly Christmas and I feel grateful to "The Word" for reviving old memories. With an old man memories are the real thing on which he lives. For the young man, potentialities constitute better fare.

Let us hasten the day when the vision of "The Word" will be translated into visible creation of a new and true society. I enclose my subscription. Please see that I get "The Word" regularly. Put me in touch, if you can, with any Anarchists, Pacifists, and genuine Socialists in or near Streatham.

Fraternally and eternally yours,

ALFRED C. TOYE.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have been in the habit of regularly reading "The Word" for some time now, and I must say I thoroughly appreciate this astonishingly outspoken organ of the United Socialist Movement. But I understand from your appeals that you are desperately in need of funds if you are to continue to publish this paper. Now, I would not like to see the publication of this unique paper suspended for lack of funds. But the unfortunate truth is, that being only a common or garden land worker, I just haven't any spare money to give to your cause. But what I do suggest is that you raise the price of your paper to cover the cost of its production. Personally, I would be quite willing to pay anything up to 6d. a copy, although I am poor. I honestly think it is worth more than we pay at present. I think you will be forced to do this, unless some wealthy Pacifist admirer of the paper gives you the necessary funds.

Yours faithfully,

Dear Editor and Friend, — I am a conscientious objector and I wish to become an annual subscriber and reader of "The Word." I am a lover of Christ; therefore for me there is no hope for this dark world but in the Light of Christ. The Duke of Bedford, I believe, has come in contact with that Light, and in it he has found courage enough to stand against the perpetrators of war sin. Against reason, truth and sanity, which is the work of those who love darkness. Yes, I take my hat off to him and say, "There is a man who is fit enough and strong enough to lead us in the name of Christ to peace and in peace."

Oh for men like the Duke of Bedford. I have read most of his pamphlets and his speeches, and again I say: "Thank God for such men, they are few and far apart.

I must thank you too for your good work, and stand for peace. We may differ in our beliefs in Religion but for peace we are brothers under the skin So I say, if I may, keep up the good work. Believe it or not the moral fight against war, against political corruption, which involves the lives of millions is the highest moral fight possible. The moral fight is the work of Christ, for He was and still is the Prince of Peace, the Counsellor, Leader and Saviour of mankind: not excluding the German, Italian and Japanese.

Yours faithfully,

D. G. LODWICK.

Briton Ferry, 29/12/42.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Please accept my belated Xmas Greetings and also £5 (note) towards the upkeep of "The Word" which is doing such good work in keeping alive a spirit of real democracy.

During the last war, when I was a boy, whistling the jingo national anthems of the "Allies" of that particular war, any press reports of yourself gave me the impression that you were some sinister figure that lurked in the shadows to destroy everything that humans hold dear. Even the pale pink Ramsay "Mac" was called a Red Firebrand. Shades of Truth!

All this goes to prove of course that even if the grand case you put up so consistently, in "The Word", only converts one person each issue it is doing good work, especially if every convert is a live wire. I personally maintain the Christian Pacifist position and appreciate the fair way you deal with all expressions of opinion however contrary to your own.

I must remain anonymous while giving money, and as a receipt you can acknowledge through "The Word" to:

Yours sincerely,

A PATH TO WALK ON

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

It has been pointed out earlier in this article that a peace-settlement reached as a result of wise diplomacy would secure for each party important gains but would of necessity also involve some sacrifices. The Democracies, in addition to preserving the lives of thousands of their finest men and, it may be, of many women and children as well, would secure the deliverance of conquered and occupied countries. They would also have an extremely effective fourfold defence against possible future acts of aggression—the defence of just treatment of the Axis people which would deprive their rulers of the propaganda weapons necessary to secure support for a new war; the defence of a capacity to exploit to the uttermost the unpleasant memories of war-sacrifice in the minds of the Axis people; the defence of very thorough safeguards, based on adequate facilities and supervision and on the actual performance of undertakings; and the defence of the power of their own armaments to give protection or enforce a threat in the event of treachery or misconduct. (I am of course aware that Pacifists, of whom I am one, are sceptical as to the value of such "defence" but non-Pacifists attach the utmost importance to it.) In regard to the freeing of conquered or occupied territories, the point is perhaps worth bearing in mind that the inhabitants of some of these territories might prefer not to be under the control either of their present or of their former masters. The people of the Ukraine, for example, might wish to be independent alike of Soviet and German rule; but, provided that they were not exploited, an arrangement might be reached which allowed Germans and non-Ukrainian Russians facilities to assist in the development of the natural resources of the country and to obtain thereby reasonable advantages for their own people in accordance with the general plan for the fair sharing of the world's economic resources. An important point often overlooked is the fact that, provided natural wealth is developed, the actual ownership of an area of land is a comparatively minor detail; what do matter infinitely more are the arrangements which decide who is to be allowed to buy the goods produced from the land, when these are placed on the market.

A somewhat similar arrangement to that suggested for the Ukraine might possibly be arrived at with regard to Burma, that country being granted her independence, but facilities being allowed both to the British and to the Japanese to assist in the development of the country with a better regard than has hitherto been shown for the rights and welfare of the native inhabitants.

Some conditions might even be laid down with regard to the liberation from the worst forms of injustice and oppression of minorities living within Axis territories, but if this were to be attempted, it is clear that the Democracies, also, must be prepared to show equal consideration to minorties under their own control.

So much for the very real gains which the Democracies might achieve—gains embodying the most essential elements in practical victory. They would, however, need to make certain sacrifices, not unreasonable in view of the gains. Their offers of fair treatment in the economic field would have to be genuine offers and once and for all they would have to cut adrift from men and policies restricting, in the interests of money-lending financiers and Big Business monopolists, the production and distribution of the world's wealth.

They would also have to be prepared to forego the exaction of reparation payments. These, however superficially attractive to the moral sense, have in practice proved difficult to collect and very unfair in their incidence, falling most heavily on persons with little or no responsibility for the war. Moreover, if the choice were offered to the citizens of the conquered or occupied countries whether they would rather have peace and freedom now on fair conditions but without reparations; or further years of war with a doubtful chance of reparations at the finish, their vote would be overwhelmingly in favour of the former alternative. A far better arrangement than any form of reparations would be co-operation by the belligerents on both sides in restoring prosperity to countries which had suffered most severely through the war. The Democracies would also, of course, have to forego the chance of putting enemy war criminals on trial, as well as the very burdensome and very expensive "satisfaction" of occupying Axis countries and educating their youthful inhabitants.

The gains for the Axis, which would be both an inducement to their leaders to accept the proposals of wise diplomacy and a powerful weapon to use against the leaders with their own people if they decided to reject the terms, would be a fair share of the world's economic resources; freedom from the hostile actions of International Finance; freedom from the danger of any military alliance operating unfairly; relief from further war casualties and war damage; and the chance to go ahead immediately with plans for post-war reconstruction.

The Axis would, however, have to restore political independence to occupied or conquered countries and, subject, of course, to receiving the economic advantages already mentioned, relinquish some of the plans they may at present entertain for the definite annexation of areas whose populations do not desire their rule.

Citizens of the Democracies who are much concerned with the question of adequate military defence for their own countries and those of their Allies would have no cause for nervousness. They would not be required to place themselves at any kind of military disadvantage and ample safeguards would be insisted on against treacherous armed attack. The only concession they would have to make would be the perfectly reasonable one of allowing the Axis guarantees of security similar to those they demanded for themselves and for their friends.

Pacifists could support wise diplomacy as a means of bringing to an early end the slaughter of war with its attendant mental and spiritual evils and they could rejoice in, and make good us of, the restoration of those international contacts which are necessary to the promotion of good-fellowship among the nations, leading ultimately to world disarmament.

They would, however, for a time be compelled to tolerate an arrangement which retained armed force as a potential instrument of international policy.

Wise diplomacy would benefit the Jews as, in common with other people, they would share in deliverance from war casualties. If wise diplomacy brought hostilities to an early conclusion, it would check immediately to a very important extent the continued progress of Axis persecution and it would open the way to action of various kinds for the relief and assistance of the Jews. An early end to the war would also check the growth of anti-Semitic feeling in Britain and America where the hardships, irritations and anxieties of war encourage the pursuit of scapegoats. Nothing incidentally is more contemptible than the policy of those individuals who are by no means rare and who, while neglecting to support measures which would give practical help to Jews on the Continent, utilize, and indeed welcome, a continued supply of stories of persecution in order that, by atrocity propaganda, they may be aided in prolonging the war.

On the other hand, the Jews would need to show themselves willing to exercise a measure of patience. Human nature and world conditions being what they are, they could hardly expect to secure immediately the full redress of every grievance and the complete reversal of every hostile measure. Progress, it is to be hoped, would not be slow, but in some respects it would inevitably be gradual.

I have so far dealt with the gains and sacrifices associated with the employment of wise diplomacy as these would affect some of the most influential groups of people. I should like, however, to refer more briefly to other classes to whom wise diplomacy can offer benefits of infinite value and who should therefore accord it their most active support. There are, for example, the Service men enduring, it may be, years of exile from their homes and exposed to all the dangers and privations of war; merchant seamen sharing the same dangers; prisoners eating out their hearts in internment camps; anxious relatives longing for the return of those whom they love; children deprived of their parents' care by reason of war conditions; members of the medical profession whose concern is for their patients' welfare and not merely for their fees and who are now compelled to watch the steady increase of tuberculosis and other diseases; social workers who deplore the moral injury inflicted by war conditions, especially on the young; business men ruined, or faced with ruin, by the closing down of their businesses or by loss of trade; invalid and elderly people deprived of proper care by the conscription of relatives or attendants; scientists and those who are concerned with cultural pursuits who watch the gradual stifling of all that adds beauty and interest to civilised life under the deadening hand of war; men of creative ability and organising power impatient for destruction to end and reconstruction to begin.

Last, but not least, our politicians would do well to give their support to wise diplomacy lest, when their country's safety and welfare have been committed to their charge, by lack of imagination, obstinacy and a rigidity of mind which fails to adapt itself to unforeseen conditions, they end by destroying what it is their duty to preserve, wrecking all chance of a successful political career after the war has ended, and earning not the admiration of posterity, but its contempt.

The most outstanding characteristic of the nightmare world in which we are living is the unnecessary folly of it all and the simple obviousness of the remedy. A little imagination, a little goodwill, a little understanding of human nature, a little capacity to handle men, a profound distrust of propaganda—that is all we need. I said earlier in the war that if "two madmen" (Hitler and Mussolini) have really made millions of people behave towards each other as the citizens of Europe are now behaving, then the millions must be madder than the two. Is this not true and if it be true, is it not plain as daylight that an alternative must exist to madness?

If brave men had not resisted authority, even to the blazing faggots, the black pall of superstition would still lie on the face of this land as it lies on the face of Spain.

CHURCHILLISM FOUNDED ON VANSITTARTISM

By The Rev. RICHARD LEE, M.A.
(Minister, Great Meeting House, Coventry)

OUTLINE OF ARGUMENT.

There are ardent Churchill supporters who renounce Vansittart. But Churchill's policy is really bound up with the Vansittart theory. Here are Churchill's propositions: (1) Victory; (2) No Parley; (3) No Hope for Germans: crush them; (4) A Dictated Peace; (5) Germany disarmed and in chains. These items of policy imply Vansittart's articles of faith: (1) Germans the only aggressors; (2) Germans possess a double dose of original sin; (3) The Innocence of the Versailles Treaty. It is because Churchill believes in the radical sinfulness of Germans and our holy innocence that he presses for victory at all costs.

Acland once saw differently. The Atlantic Charter is inspired by Vansittart, especially Clause 8. Surrender, the result of Churchill's strategy, thus far, is not the only alternative. The constant proclamation of terms with no annexation, no indemnities, no humiliations is the alternative to Churchillism's blind crusade. Stalin's Order of the Day (Feb. 23, 1942) suggests the right attitude. Hitler MIGHT, like Churchill, pursue the phantom of victory but the proclamation of decent terms would bring the end of the war nearer. Cripps warns us of the dangers of a long war.

There are those who denounce Vansittart and all his works. They recognise the harm he does to the Allied cause and the help he gives to Goebbels and German propaganda. These very same denouncers of Vansittart uphold Winston Churchill and their leader and back up his policy of the vigorous prosecution of the war to the bitter end. Yet if we examine the Churchill policy and face clearly his general attitude, he shares the Vansittart outlook and implicitly or explicitly stands for the very worst of the Vansittart falsehoods and hypocrisies. If you follow Churchill, you ought to acclaim Vansittart as a prophet and his aim in the war is the destructive and futile purpose of this breeder of hate and endless murder. I have certain well-known Never Endians in my mind who belong to the Left and support this war. They pose as Idealists who really love peace and deem this the real war to end war and bring in the reign of the common people. We will leave names out of the picture in the meantime and consider the articles in the Churchill Creed.

I. Article No. I. is described by Mr. Churchill on May 12:

VICTORY.

You ask what is our aim. I can answer in one word. It is Victory. Victory at all costs. Victory in spite of all error. Victory however long and hard the road may be, for without victory there is no survival.

In other words, to have your heel on the neck of the enemy is the fundamental aim of the Churchill policy.

NO PARLEY.

II. No terms can be made with Hitler.

"We will mete out to the Germans the measure and more than the measure they have meted out to us.

We will have no truce nor parley with you nor with the grisly gang who work your blessed will.

It is time the Germans should be made to suffer in their own homeland and cities something of the torments they have inflicted upon their neighbours and upon the world."

NO HOPE FOR GERMANS.

III. The third article in the Churchill creed is: Let us give nothing to assure the German minority they will get any measure of justice. Mr. Churchill again and again, has alluded to them with contempt as the Huns.

A DICTATED PEACE.

IV. The object of victory is to secure one more dictated peace where the terms are laid down by the conqueror and imposed on the defeated foe.

UNILATERAL DISARMAMENT.

V. The Atlantic Charter with all its fair phrases discriminates between the Holy Innocents who are to be victors and the criminal aggressors who alone made the war. The victors are to be the police; the defeated to be disarmed and kept disarmed by brute force.

Everyone of these articles is based on the Vansittart philosophy, which can be stated in three sentences.

The Germans are the only aggressors.

Their aggression is due to a double dose of original sin.

The evil nature of the Germans, not the Versailles Treaty or economic circumstances is the only cause of Hitlerism and the present war.

If we look for a moment at the Churchill policy which our Labour intellectuals and place men support we shall see that it is applied Vansittartism. Vansittart might as well be in the Cabinet for his spirit saturates every speech of Churchill. The belief in victory as the only way to future security is obviously pure Vansittartism. It is also inverted Hitlerism. Hitler has the same childish insane faith in the power of the sword to bring a German peace. Vansittart and his clique have proved failures in their task as diplomatists and now they ask the soldiers to make up for their failures by a holocaust of destruction and death.

The refusal to trust Hitler's word, and the contempt for the German people are both founded on the Vansittart theory. It is assumed that no terms can be framed which will win over the German workers and compel Hitler to make a decent peace. Vansittart with Churchill believes that a grisly gang of murderers made the war and only their humiliation and destruction can end it. There are no wrongs done by Britain and France in the past which need to be righted. It is useless to offer terms of justice. Hitler's word is worthless and he would keep no pledge he had given. The German people are tied up with Hitler. What applies to one applies to the other. This policy is manifestly based on the Vansittart estimate of the utter degradation of the German race. Churchill revealed his mind in that broadcast where he asserted that some Germans are curable but all are killable. There are two or three things to be said about this attitude.

Hitler is not the only statesman who has broken his pledged word again and again. There are terms to be framed which in themselves would guarantee against treachery by Hitler or anyone else. The whole object of statesmanship is to divide from Hitler by a wide appeal those who are capable of responding to terms of abnormal justice: Sir Richard Ackland when he was not so dominated by the war mania saw the only way to overcome Hitlerism.

The German people followed Hitler because they saw no other hope and it is because they despaired then we are fighting them now. If we have no other idea but to force them to accept from us the same kind of terms as we imposed last time they will fight us to the death, maybe for ten years.

We can only hope for an early end of this war if we can prove to the German people not by words but by deeds that we mean to build an entirely different and better world.

Churchillism, in spite of the Atlantic Charter, offers no such better world to Germany.

All it offers is another dictated peace a peace dictated by America and Britain might be far better than one dictated by a victorious Hitler but it would most assuredly lead to another world war in the next generation or before. Such dictation implies a superiority complex on the part of the United Nations, a monopoly of wisdom compared with the German hordes. Victor Gollanz says the temper of the Atlantic Charter is very different from that of the Vansittartites. In assuming the role of Holy Innocents whose word is divine law, there is little difference. Clause Eight of the Charter is pure Vansittartism. It proposes the unilateral disarmament of the enemy powers who are assumed to be the only possible aggressors. As Gollanz admits, this will not prevent another war. It will make another war inevitable, sooner or later. But this plan of Clause 8 to disarm the Axis and keep down the enemy powers by military occupation over five or ten years is applied vansittartism. It is based on the dogma of the Island Pharisees. In our British record there is neither spot nor blemish nor any such thing. Duff Cooper stated it baldly the other day "We are the greatest people on earth!" Let us tell it to the world and let them join in the Seven-fold Amen. Those who subscribe to the Churchillian dogma victory or nothing are, whether they are conscious of it or not, Vansittartists. I have in mind men like Laski, Sir Richard Ackland, Gollancz who accept the Churchill leadership and subscribe to his policy. Yet they hope, somehow, there will emerge from victory a European Revolution and a new Socialist society in Britain and all over Europe. In their view, as Laski says, we have either to break the power of Hitler or surrender. There is no middle term.

The Laski school charge anti-Churchillites with advocating surrender. This is very curious. Because by following Churchill's strategy they have had to admit one shameful surrender after another. Moreover, the most likely outcome of the pursuit of victory will be the fading out of Hitler (and possibly Churchill) and a patched-up peace of weary and disgusted belligerents.

Surrender is not the only alternative. The other way is to let the Germans know, without a peradventure, that a peace based on justice can be had any time. Such a peace would lay down the same conditions for all belligerents. It would regard all belligerents as possible aggressors and also as possible co-operators in building up a new Europe. There would be in such a peace no assumption of super holiness on behalf of any nation. It might happen that Hitler would stick to his war-gains and reject such proposals. They would still be open for any German Government to accept. But the offer of such terms on the lines of Stalin's Order of the Day in February would do more to destroy Hitlerism's worst phases than all the futile strategy or vain rhetoric of Mr. Churchill.

Stalin's Order of the Day, February 23, 1942, should form the basis of Britain and American policy. Stalin said:—

It would be ridiculous to identify Hitler's clique with the German people and the German State. History teaches us that Hitlers come and Hitlers go but the German people and the German State remain.

If this were the invariable attitude of British official utterances there would soon be in sight a German people eager to seek a reasonable peace.

The real alternatives are going blindly on with a war which is destroying civilization for at least a generation, or seeking the way to peace now and trying to save something from the wreckage on which to build a new order. Churchillism stands for this policy of blind destruction. What it means Cripps saw clearly soon after the war started, when his vision was not obscured by the dazzlement of office.

If we continue with the war which will last much more than three years, the British Empire and indeed British Capitalism will never survive the strain. We may go down in a welter of blood or we may, if we are lucky, survive as the conquerors, but the civilisation we have known in the past will not survive.

This prophecy of Cripps is being fulfilled before our eyes. The United Nations are imitating and going beyond, in some respects, the barbarous methods of the enemy. And for this wallowing in the pit of murderous destruction, the left wing supporters of Mr. Churchill have a deep responsibility.

All Pacifists and Socialist comrades living in West Central London who remain in communion with the Church of England, should attend the services held at The Church of The Holy Cross in S. Panceras with S. Jude, every Sunday, morning and evening. They should write to the Vicar, asking for a copy of his weekly leaflet. Please enclose postage.

This is an official copy of the death certificate issued to Carlile's son, Alfred Carlile. In copying it, a mistake must have been made, as Carlile's name was spelt without the "s." In our December issue we reproduced from "The Times," London, an account of the funeral.

CARLILE'S COMMONSENSE

Our comrade, Dr. Charles Brook, publishes the following letter in "The Medical World," for January 15, 1943:—

Sir,—Last Sunday afternoon a primipera in the later thirties gave birth without warning to twins.

Her own doctor is now absent on war service, and an attempt was made to contact me, but I was out on visits.

A hospital was then telephoned and the mother and twins were after some delay removed by ambulance. Unfortunately both the babies were dead....

Early last Wednesday morning a dying cat was found on the mat outside my front door.

Having no knowledge of veterinary medicine I telephoned the police. Not very long elapsed before a constable arrived, followed shortly afterwards by a veterinary surgeon in a car. The cat was removed and although I offered to pay the vet's fee, it was declined as I understand that this service is provided by the R.S.P.C.A.

I cannot do better than quote from an essay by Richard Carlile, the great English Libertarian, the centenary of whose death will be celebrated on February 10 next (but not by the B.B.C.).

This essay was written in 1827 and is included in Carlile's "Jail Journal," edited by Guy A. Aldred and recently published by the Strickland Press, Glasgow.

Carlile wrote:—

"Men and women subscribe money for the prevention of cruelty to animals, but forget to include their own species, the animal man, in the common benefit. This animal nature is a strange mystery."

Yes, Richard Carlile, whose greatest talent was his plain downright English commonsense, wrote these words in 1827; and yet while in 1943 there is an admirable emergency service for dumb animals, there is no domiciliary emergency medical service for human beings.

Yours, etc.,

London. CHARLES BROOK.

Dr. Brook's great work on Richard Carlile, entitled "Carlile and The Surgeons," will be published this month.

PEACE AIMS GROUPS

A public meeting was held at St. Thomas' School, Caroline Street, Wigan, on Wednesday, January 6, at 7.30 p.m. Our comrade, the Rev. J. F. Gerrard, took the chair, and the speaker was our comrade, Rhys J. Davies, M.P., and his subject was: "What Are We Fighting For?"

Comrade Davies has spoken also, during the parliamentary recess, at a conference organised by the Birmingham P.P.U. This group has had a visit from our comrade, the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., now of Coventry, and so well-known in Glasgow for his stalwart advocacy of Socialism and defence of the common people's struggle. Dick Lee has opposed two wars because he believes war to be wrong and to be of no service to the workers of the world. He is a great internationalist and humanist.

Rhys Davies made an excellent speech in the House of Commons on Wednesday, December 9, dealing with conscription and the distributive trades. We hope to reproduce this speech in our next issue. Also a speech by our comrade, R. R. Stokes, M.P. The latter's fearless speeches in the House, and the activity in the country, should be recognised by all who are appalled at the horror and falsehood of war.

SIDNEY SPENCER

Our comrade, the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., Minister of the Hope Street Unitarian Church, Liverpool, was fined £10 in November, 1942, for refusing to register for fire-watching. As in April, his fine was paid by an unknown person. This was contrary to his wishes.

Mr. Spencer states his position thus:—

My objection is to the application of the principle of compulsion to a task so closely associated with the war. There is, I believe, the gravest danger to the freedom of this country in the increasing regimentation to which we are being subjected. It is vital that this tendency should be resisted. The Government allows no possibility of conscientious objection to civil defence. Men in some instances have suffered the maximum penalty of the law (£100 fine and three months' imprisonment) for their refusal to register, and severe penalties are still being inflicted. While men are suffering in this way for conscience' sake, I can only take my stand along with them, and make my protest in whatever form I am called upon to do, as a testimony to my belief in personal freedom and the liberty of conscience.

EDITOR'S STATEMENT

We are endeavouring to keep this journal at 2d. despite statements by readers all over Britain that they would pay 6d. or 1/- for each issue. We write and speak, as did Richard Carlile, for the poor to the poor. We shall change the price or cease publication with equal reluctance. To do either thing is to admit defeat. We are not defeated yet. The response of readers has been good. In all, since December we have received donations of £329 15s. 10 d. Our appeal was for £1,500. We have acknowledged £130. Our total is now £459 15s. 10½d. The balance, NEEDED IMMEDIATELY AND URGENTLY, is £1040 4s. 1½d. This sum is wanted to clear the debt on our printing and publishing and MUST be forthcoming. Given it, we shall make no more appeals for 12 months.

Also, we need two folding machines, since our pamphlet work is handicapped by old-fashioned hand-folding on big pamphlets. Who will help? Our plant is good except for want of these machines.

LUNACY

The Man in the Moon looked, and mused:—
"Those people on Earth seem confused.
They are told they must fight
For freedom and right;
And "peace traps" must all be refused.

"Sane thought for a stable world state
Must be crushed in an orgy of hate.
All conscience and reason
Suspected as treason
'Gainst those who destruction dictate.

"They must not negotiate peace,
Or honour and freedom will cease.
They must all bomb and blast
Till the earth at long last
Lies ruined:—a happy release!

"A lunatic lot they must be
They all could be happy and free.
They have all that they need
For their good: yet they bleed.
Alas! Are they maddened by me?"

I WILL NOT GO TO WAR

I will not go to war,
And kill my fellow man,
Because a few financiers
Have got the world in pawn.

I ask, what did we gain
At Verdun or at Loos?
We all must die, I know, but war
Is not the death I choose.

So take your bloody guns,
And hate, and maim, and kill,
I'll lie and listen to the lark
Upon the daisied hill.

And when you're sick of blood,
And mud, and lice, and shame,
I'll listen to your grouse, and say,
"Well, who was it to blame?"

CHRISTIANITY AND PEACE

Our comrade in the struggle towards peace, the Rev. J. F. Gerrard, B.A., Vicar of St. Thomas's Church, Wigan, states his position fearlessly.

The motto text of his "Parish Magazine" for 1942, was: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." When a Vicar takes this for his text in time of war, and proclaims fearlessly his Pacifist opinions, the text becomes a very definite challenge to all the organised political forces of war and Capitalist Imperialism. The Rev. J. F. Gerrard is a very brave man and a true Christian teacher.

In his magazine for September of last year, he addressed the following letter to his readers:—

St. Thomas's Vicarage,
September.

My dear Friends,—The courageous speech of the Duke of Bedford in the House of Lords advocating a negotiated peace with Germany, found little favour with his fellow peers. One would have thought some Christian voice would have spoken out to support a plan which provides an alternative to the diehard policy of "fighting to a finish", whatever the cost in life and treasure. No doubt some who were present secretly shared the views of the Duke, but kept silent from fear of unpopularity, or of being thought disloyal. It is the same in the country at large. Three years of confused fighting, in which we are ranged on the side of strange allies, have left people bewildered and with little enthusiasm for continuing a struggle which has become increasingly a fight between Fascism and Communism. They keep uneasily silent, however, because it seems disloyal to be otherwise.

I believe the time is ripe, and people are ready for a lead out of the present chaos of conflicting ideologies. Where is that lead to be found? Where should it come from? Surely it is the duty of the Christian Church to show the world the way forward to sanity and world-wide brotherhood. In this connection I should like to put forward a peace plan which I have long had in mind.

It is that an armistice be immediately declared to last, say, from now till Christmas. During that time negotiations for a peace can take place. But it must be a Peace of Christ, a just peace, not a vengeful peace. There must be no revenge, no laying the seeds of a future war through lack of forgiveness. The armistice would provide the opportunity for counsels of moderation and fairness coming to fruition.

The alternative to this is fighting on, with fearful casualties, and increasing ferocity of warfare. Can any Christian contemplate this without intense sorrow, or accept it as the only solution? At the present time Anglicans are fighting Lutherans, Roman Catholics fighting Roman Catholics, yet all name the Name of Christ, all are equally dear to our Lord. In His last prayer which He offered to God "with strong crying and tears" His passionate cry was that "they all may be one", all united in the Family of God. How long are we to grieve His sacred Heart, how long delay His glorious Kingdom on earth?

Yours faithfully in Christ,
J. F. GERRARD.

In the December issue, the Vicar returns to his Pacifist charge. We make the following excerpt:—

Except by looking at the Kalendar we will not, this year, be able to tell whether Christmas has arrived or not. The usual preparations for the happy time are absent this year; the glittering shop fronts with their fairy lights and shelves groaning under the weight of all sorts of wonderful things are but a sad memory of the past. As for turkey and goose, and the usual Christmas fare they are completely banished for the "duration." Still, for the earnest Christian these things, though valuable as showing the importance of Christmas, are but the external trappings of this sacred time: the real sign of Christmas is the spirit of love and brotherhood which our Redeemer's birth brought into the world. To-day, alas, that spirit is eclipsed by the designs of wicked men, the battle is on, "with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood." The angels of the Nativity who proclaimed the message of peace and goodwill must weep at the spectacle of men made in the image of God using the Devil's weapons of slaughter, suffering and destruction. It would be wrong to let pass the festival of our Saviour's Birthday without a plea for the return of peace and sanity in the councils of the warring nations. The war has gone on long enough and it is no nearer a solution by force of arms than it was at the beginning of hostilities. Other methods should be tried, Christian methods of conciliation which will achieve much more than campaigns of hatred. A Christmas Armistice should be declared and the attempt made to settle differences at a peace conference. Sooner or later it will come to this; why not now?

Alas! Pagan-Christendom believes only in the power of the sword, not the Christian message of the power of the word. It does not believe in the power invisible, only power transient, corrupt, and visible. Yet the power invisible, latent in the poor, lurking in unseen places, will stir the world and finally conquer the too visible power of death that stalks abroad in pomp and ceremony, and mocks man with the false military glory of war.

UNDERSTANDING THE WAR OBJECTOR

THE PROBLEMS OF CONDITIONAL EXEMPTION

When Lew Ayres, famous to his screen admirers as Dr. Kildare, took his original stand as a conscientious objector against war, we collected the facts concerning his attitude and his treatment, with a view to publication. Space considerations held up publication. The pressure placed upon Ayres has caused him to modify, with obvious reluctance, his original stand, but he has avowed that his opinions are unchanged. We sympathise with Ayres in his original stand and we understand and sympathise with him in his retreat, although we do not concur in his compromise. Not Ayres but his detractors, and those who placed pressure upon him, are to be condemned. They could not respect the moral worth and the importance of character and individuality.

Although comments on Ayres' declaration of conscientious objection to war are somewhat belated, the principle involved is of eternal moment. We make no apology for reproducing the editorial published in "The New York Times" for April 3, 1942:—

THE CASE OF LEW AYRES.

If all Americans believed as Lew Ayres does, the "creed of non-resistance to evil", the Nazis could do whatever they wished in this country. If all humanity believed the same creed there would be no Nazis and no war. A minute handful of Americans do believe this creed. We have no reason to hope, from what we know of the human mind and human emotions, that the whole world will accept it in any time we can foresee. But let us not on that account hold back an honest tribute to a man who gives up a rich career and faces public ridicule and contempt because he will not hide the faith that is in him.

Those who are tempted to throw stones at Lew Ayres would do better to ask themselves what their own faith is, and how much forgetfulness of self they are living up to. The avowed faith of the vast majority of people in this country is that no sacrifice is too great if it will help beat down the Nazi abomination. We think that the men whose lives and deaths have testified most eloquently to this faith are the ones who would come closest to understanding Lew Ayres, though disagreeing with him to the last syllable.

When those of us who aren't even eligible for the armed services have paid every cent of our Federal taxes cheerfully, have accepted all the little war deprivations, not only in the letter but in spirit, have put away our jealousies, our private ambitions and our intolerances, have made in our own lives a shining example of what resistance to evil can be, then let us, if we will, pass a moral condemnation on non-resistance. And then, perhaps, we won't wish to. It is a doctrine for the other-worldly and for saints, and there will never be enough of those to interfere with our war efforts.

The tone of this editorial had the excellent effect of inspiring Norman Thomas, the well-known United States Socialist Party spokesman, and the New York Society of Friends, to make statements in defence of conscientious objectors. Both letters appeared in the "Times" for April 7.

The letter from Norman Thomas was set out as follows:—

USE PROPOSED FOR OBJECTORS.

Some of Them Might be Better Employed Than in Work Camps.

To the Editor of "The New York Times":

I want to applaud your editorial, "The Case of Lew Ayres", in your issue of April 3. If Americans can keep the degree of understanding and insight which you show, even in the midst of war, the future may be brighter than some of us had hoped.

Granting, as I certainly do, that Mr. Ayres has not presented a political alternative to war by his stand, it is extraordinarily courageous, and history may record that he and his comrades in an unpopular cause are prophets and pioneers of a happier and far more rational world.

There are one or two aspects of the situation affecting conscientious objectors on which I should like to comment. The first is that a great deal of valuable, intelligent and high-minded service which conscientious objectors are willing to offer is lost by the insistence of the government that conscientious objectors all go to work camps.

Some of these camps are doing fairly valuable work; some of them which I have seen are doing a kind of glorified and more strenuous leaf-raking. At all of them are men with capacities and training for relief work in difficult fields abroad and for special service at home. It is a pity that lack of imagination, bureaucratic rigor and fear of stupid public reaction should keep men digging ditches who can and should be doing other things.

Other Employment Possible.

So far the notion of employing conscientious objectors in humanitarian work in dangerous fields abroad, in public health service and the like here at home are theoretically accepted by the government, but not worked out. What actually happens is that a government which in law recognized useful civilian work as an alternative to military service, leaves almost entirely to religious organizations the task of providing and financing such work. The arrangement is unfair and wastes a great deal of potentially valuable human energy that could be used in raising food and caring for human needs. I am not suggesting the abandonment of these camps; I am suggesting a more varied programme and a frank recognition by the government of its responsibility for the alternative service which it has permitted in law.

The second situation to which thoughtful Americans should give attention is this: Originally the selective service authorities and many draft boards were inclined to interpret religion very broadly in construing the application of the law to conscientious objectors. In America, unlike Great Britain, conscientious objection is recognized only on the basis of religious belief and training.

To-day there is a tendency all along the line to interpret religion very narrowly. Actually, objection to the method of war may be quite as conscientious and, if anything, even more sincere, if the man has derived it painfully as a result of his own philosophic, social or political thinking than if he merely accepts the dogma of some creed.

Social Gains Seen.

From a social standpoint there is no reason for making alternative service a kind of special privilege to people who say their objections to war are derived from a supernatural source. The case for giving exemption from all military service to conscientious objectors is the recognition of the value of the individual which is denied by telling him to invest his life in that which to him seems wholly wrong. In times when the drift to totalitarianism is so strong, there are social gains in this protection of individual rights.

To-day there are scores and perhaps hundreds of men in America quite as sincere as Mr. Ayres who face jail rather than work camps because they say that their objection to war and participation in it is philosophical or political. Some Socialists—and no Communists — are in this number, but by no means all these philosophic objectors are Socialists, and only a minority of Socialists are such objectors. They act on their own conscience and not on any order from any political party.

Nevertheless, their position is entitled to an understanding it is not getting. Not so much for their sake as for the sake of the future of democracy, the American law and its enforcement should be made as liberal as in Great Britain. In the latter country, boards pass on the sincerity of the objector, whatever may be the basis of his objection, and they recognise a great many forms of civilian service as an alternative to military service.

NORMAN THOMAS.

New York, April 4, 1942.

Mr. J. Hibbard Taylor, Clerk, New York Yearly Meeting, Religious Society of Friends, expressed appreciation of the tone of the editorial, and added:—

We are pleased that you recognise the sincerity of an individual who, in obedience to his conscience, refuses to fight evil with evil, but chooses rather to overcome evil with good.

GLASGOW POLICE COURT MUSINGS

The old year closed with incidents at the Glasgow Central Police Court that recall the part played by that Court in the struggle for Free Speech in Glasgow.

On Thursday, December 24, Mr. David Crawford, who had been Police Court Assessor in Glasgow for many years, was installed as Stipendary Magistrate of the City of Glasgow, until the return of Procurator Fiscal Findlay Langmuir, at present on National Service, who was appointed Stipendary Magistrate whilst absent abroad. In view of the circumstances under which Mr. Langmuir joined up, we think that the Government ought to have released him to take up his police court appointment. Langmuir's joining as a naval rating on June 6, 1940, when he had no need to do so, was dealt with fully in "The Word" for October and November, 1940.

In the Central Police Court Mr. Crawford presented his commission to Lord Provost J. M. Biggar, who administered the oath.

Mr. Crawford was congratulated, on behalf of magistrates and councillors, by Lord Provost Biggar.

Mr. Douglas Steen spoke on behalf of Professor Girvan, Dean of the Faculty of Procurators and members of the Bar. Mr. Robertson, Procurator-Fiscal, and Sir Percy J. Sillitoe also spoke.

Mr. Crawford replied.

This kind of ceremony is necessary but it leaves us with an uncomfortable feeling, because we are opposed to the prison system, and see in that system no hope for the people, and no protection against crime. Also we cannot forget that, to-day, under our parliamentary system, the prison system has degenerated since the days of Richard Carlile and Leigh Hunt. The treatment meted out to conscientious objectors, who are really political offenders, in jail, is barbarous. Even the conditions of writing of 18B unconvicted prisoners are disgraceful. The treatment of Douglas Young, the Scots Nationalist, admitted to be a scholar, under an alleged Socialist Secretary of State, is an outrage that would have revolted the mind of Castlereagh and Sidmouth. This is not rhetoric but fact, as Carlile's "Republican" and his shopmen's "Newgate Magazine" will prove. Hence we do not view these congratulations with unreflecting approval.

At the same time, as one familiar with Edinburgh's truly democratic Court of Session and London's caste-bound anti-democratic King's Bench, and also the police courts of London and Glasgow, we know the part played by the police court in the dull dreary life of the common people. In 1925, Mr. Cecil Chapman, published through Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, his excellent work, entitled "The Poor Man's Court of Justice." This described his 25 years' experience as a Metropolitan Magistrate, sitting at Clerkenwell, Southwark, Lambeth, Tower Bridge, Westminster. This is a most valuable work to the social student, and contains a splendid appendix indicting the prison system.

On December 31, that is exactly a week after Mr. Crawford's installation as Stipendary Magistrate, Mr. James Lindsay, for over 30 years Clerk of the Court at Glasgow Central Police Court, received the tribute of his colleagues on the occasion of his retirement from that post.

Mr. James Robertson, Procurator-Fiscal, said that Mr. Lindsay had been in the service of the Corporation for over 50 years—a truly remarkable record.

In 1932, when the Children's Act was passed, Mr. Lindsay was consulted, and the forms now used were more or less his work.

Police Judge John S. Clark—not the John S. Clarke of the "Worker" and the "Daily Record" and sometime M.P. for Maryhill, but the Govanhill I.L.P. man whom the I.L.P. boosted as a "Socialist" when he stood first for the Council.—also paid a tribute to the retiring Clerk.

James Lindsay's name is to be found on the Stated Cases we took against the decisions given in the Central Police in 1924 and 1931. That fact links the Glasgow Court in our mind with the struggle for Free Speech.

It was announced on May 8 that the Secretary of State for Scotland had informed the Town Clerk of Glasgow that Mr. George Smith had tendered his resignation as Stipendiary Magistrate of the city on grounds of ill-health and that his resignation had been accepted.

Mr. Smith, who is 59, was appointed Stipendiary Magistrate in 1923 when he relinquished his post of Procurator-Fiscal for Glasgow. A native of Midlothian, he was educated at Dalkeith and Edinburgh University, after which he entered the legal profession.

He had considerable experience of civil work and court practice, and had charge of many important arbitrations and Provisional Orders before being appointed in 1914 to control the court department of the Town Clerk's office in Glasgow.

After serving with the Coldstream Guards in the first great war he was appointed to the office of Procurator-Fiscal for the city and for the courts of the River and Firth of Clyde.

Earnest Socialists in Glasgow—we do not mean the careerists—will recall the part George Smith played in the Free Speech struggle against the anti-public meetings bye-laws which abolished meetings in Glasgow Green. We pleaded the cases before him in 1924 and 1931. Mr. Smith's conduct of the hearings greatly contributed towards the useful result attained in the High Court of Justiciary in the 1931 appeal. As a result the bye-laws were changed and ever since there has been a legal right to hold meetings on Glasgow Green and in the public parks and open spaces of Glasgow and readers can see the bye-laws posted up for themselves in the open spaces of Glasgow. That right has never been implemented, owing to the failure and refusal of the Labour Councillors and the I.L.P. Councillors to make provision for operating the bye-laws. Some of them were too much concerned with graft to want free speech to flourish. This is the scandal of the so-called Socialist movement in Glasgow.

It is interesting to reflect that respectability has made Thomas Johnston Secretary of State for Scotland in a Tory administration and has made the Labour Party, to which he belongs, frown on public meetings. Yet, but for the meetings held on the Glasgow Green in earlier years and the circulation of "Forward" at those meetings, Johnston would have enjoyed no reputation among the people of Glasgow, and would not have attained his present status. To-day Mr. George Smith has to tender his resignation to this one-time "Socialist" agitator!

Our experience of George Smith was that he considered the public questions we argued before him clearly and legally on their merits. He considered them from the standpoint of public interest and made shrewd comments on the incompetence or error of restrictive bye-laws he had to administer. He cleared the avenue for a great public wrong being righted. But the "Socialist" Town Council preferred to assassinate the cultural right of public meeting in Glasgow. Every member of the Labour Party, and every member of the I.L.P. in Glasgow, should be ashamed of their attitude towards the operation of Free Speech and Public Meeting Bye-law established after so much struggle—and established in vain apparently.

The Glasgow motto is: "Let Glasgow flourish by the preaching of the word." But careerists are not anxious that the word should be preached.

Minister—Rev. LEWIS MACLACHLAN, M.A.

SUNDAY SERVICES: 11 a.m. and 4.15 p.m.

Glasgow comrades will be interested to know that when Mr. Maclachlan left Glasgow for his London charge, the change was made because the London church is an avowedly Pacifist centre. During January 1943, the Sunday morning services have consisted of vital conferences, opened by different persons, discussing questions of the World Church, Common Ownership, the Nature of Communism, etc. The London Union of the Fellowship of Reconciliation held its New Year Party at the Trinity Presbyterian Church on Saturday, January 23. The church extends a hearty invitation to all Socialists and Pacifists living in N.W. London to attend its conferences and to participate in its institutional life.

THE STARVATION WEAPON

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT.
(First Commissioner of Works, 1924 Labour Government.)

[The following article by our comrade Jowett is reproduced from the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, November 6, 1942. The war-mongering Mr. Leach mentioned by comrade Jowett was at one time a member of the I.L.P. He was a conscientious objector during the war of 1914-18! —Ed.

The Upper House of Convocation is a Church of England institution. Whether it consists entirely of Bishops and the two Archbishops of the church I do not know, but it has met recently and passed unanimously a resolution of which Parliament, to restore the credit of our nation and for the sake of common humanity, should take heed whilst there is still time to avert what may be the worst of all the disastrous consequences of this war.

The Bishop of Chichester, moving the resolution, quoted figures showing that the number of deaths in Athens and Piraeus alone in two months of this year was 110,000. As the total population of these two cities, judging from the most recent records available, could not have been more than 720,000 the death rate in these two months must have been very nearly one in every seven on the total population.

The Bishop of Chichester in his speech ("Times" October 16) also referred to conditions in Belgium.

"In Belgium", said the Bishop, "unless the British Government allowed food to go through the Blockade for the children and nursing mothers, there was likely to be very little of Belgium to be saved and very few Belgian children would grow up. The race for saving large parts of Europe was literally a race with death."

The case, such as it is, against allowing food to reach the starving populations in occupied Europe was put by Mr. William Leach, the Member for Central Bradford, to a deputation representing the Bradford Committee for Food Relief on July 18th ("Telegraph & Argus"). He said that:—

"two or three considerations influenced him in studying this matter. Would the proposal of lifting the blockade and facilitating food supplies to occupied Europe be harmful to our own people? Would it help the Germans? Would it endanger the prospects of victory? My answer to these three questions", said Mr. Leach, "puts me very much against what you" (the Food Relief Committee's deputation) "are wanting."

In support of his first point, that allowing food to go to occupied Europe might be harmful to our own people, Mr. Leach referred to the fact that one food ship had been torpedoed on its return journey and said that if that sort of thing went on our supply of ships would be lessened and we should be made the victims of our own generosity.

The report of the proceedings does not say that the food relief delegation mentioned the fact that the ship in question was not under charter for conveyance of further supplies. That does not seem ever to have been alleged. If it had been it would have displayed the usual maritime signs for its protection. Nor has it been claimed that a charter to fetch further food supplies had been applied for.

Presumably, therefore, the ship had become an ordinary trading ship and no more free from risk of being torpedoed than any other trading ship. Of course it is one of the tragedies of this and the last war that any ship in ballast or carrying non-military cargoes except into an actually blockaded port should have to risk being sunk.

But as we ourselves widened the pre-1914 rules of blockade to include the open sea everywhere for the last and for this war, it is a tragedy for which we must acknowledge our share of responsibility.

As to the risk of lessening our supply of ships, that cannot surely be regarded as a good reason for starving the populations of Greece and other occupied countries, men, women and children alike, whose own ships in very large numbers are bringing us food and munitions whilst those very same ships are not allowed to take food or medical supplies to their own people at home.

Mr. Leach's second point that to allow food to go "to feed starving people" in occupied Europe would help the Germans cannot be maintained except on the assumption that Germany would take more food from occupied countries if arrangements were made to allow food to go there.

But what are the facts? The facts show that even in this war, savage as it has become, food has been supplied from America and from Canada to occupied countries including Poland without any evidence whatever that any part, however small in proportion, was made to benefit either directly or indirectly either Germany or Italy.

Arrangements for dispatch of 50,000 tons of foodstuffs and medical supplies to Greece were made about a year ago.

On the steamer chartered to take this mercy cargo it was arranged that three independent organisations, the American Vanderbilt Committee, the Turkish Red Cross and the International Red Cross would have representatives, the two latter representatives to supervise the distribution of goods to the Greek people. Of this transaction the "Manchester Guardian" said (September 11th, 1941):—

"The German and Italian Governments have given formal assurances that the supplies will not be diverted to other purposes, and have guaranteed a safe passage for the ship, which will also carry parcels for British prisoners of war in Greece."

Neither of this transaction nor of any other of the few other similar transactions, during this war, has there ever been an allegation from any responsible source that the benefit, either direct or indirect, has been taken by Germany or Italy.

To this day a German Quaker monthly journal founded in 1925 is circulating in Germany. In a recent copy of this German Quaker journal there was a long account translated from an American source of the great work done by the American Friends' Service during the last war under supervision of Mr. Herbert Hoover. The assistance given in food and medical supplies under his supervision in Belgium all through the last war was stupendous, and the honesty of the whole procedure from start to finish has never been seriously questioned.

Mr. Stephen Hobhouse relating these facts in "Peace News" (Setember 19, 1941) made also this following statement:—

"THE QUAKER CHILD-FEEDING HAS NOT BEEN FORGOTTEN IN GERMANY.

American Quakers have been allowed to travel freely both there and in most of the occupied countries and there has, we believe, been no interference with the relief work (strictly limited, owing to the British blockade) which they have tried to do for the Poles and the French."

With regard to Mr. Leach's third point that allowing food to go to starving people in occupied countries would endanger the prospect of victory, there is, I believe, no more important factor in war strategy in our day than war propaganda insofar as it has truth for its foundation. If that is so, then even from the point of view of war strategy to starve would-be friendly and neutral populations is madness.

This is not only an anti-war socialist or a pacifist opinion. It is the opinion of a greatly increasing number of other people also as the resolution of the Church of England's Upper House of Convocation shows. An opinion which is fitly expressed in the following passage which I cut from a copy of the non-party "Cavalcade" on March 7th last, than which there could be no more suitable close to this article of mine. It reads as follows:—

"Must we wait till the war is over and a vastly greater number of people are dead from starvation? Are we certain that we can keep under control the fearful instrument we have devised, and which we continue methodically to use, in the Blockade War? And, if we are, can we be certain that there will be any moral justification in it—that British policy will not leave a legacy of hate among former friends as it left last time among enemies?

"These are questions which demand an instant searching of heart among Allied counsels. The Atlantic Charter is filling no craving stomachs in stricken Greece. The liberation theme upon which our unimaginative spokesmen play provoke nothing but bitter reproaches in hungry Belgians or Poles. Dr. Goebbels is telling them that Churchill is a monster responsible for their plight, and it must be asked why we should continue to play the Goebbels game for him, instead of beating him at it.

"At the moment the Germans can say with truth that the bulk of the merchant fleet of Norway, Belgium, Denmark, Greece and Yugoslavia are in the service of the Allies, many of them carrying food to Britain. Now, Greece, in pre-war days imported 400,000 tons of wheat annually, and we have so far relinquished the Blockade as to allow one cargo of 8,000 tons to be consigned there!

"'Cavalcade' urges that it will be better, alike for the conscience of democrats and for Allied political strategy, if immediate attention is given to raising the Blockade in a degree more commensurate with the facts. By maintaining it with only niggardly and tardy exceptions we do little to hurt Germany, but much to hurt our former friends. What inference can we expect populations in the occupied countries to draw from the Blockade while we keep in these islands an Army that is becoming known as Hitler's three million prisoners in Britain?"

DUKE OF BEDFORD

TO DEFEND FIRE GUARD AND OTHER "CONCHIES"

Forthcoming Speech in the House of Lords

This month the Duke of Bedford expects to make his fourth speech in the House of Lords. It will be recalled that his third speech made last July, was interrupted and so unfinished. The speech will be in support of his motion to call the attention of the Government to the unsatisfactory position whereby through the failure of many tribunals to discharge their duties in a just and reasonable manner, and also through the failure of the Government to recognise the right of conscientious objection to fire-watching and to other compulsory work ordered by the Ministry of Labour, many persons of good character are being heavily fined or imprisoned, sometimes repeatedly for the same offence to move, to resolve, that the right to conscientious objection to fire-watching and to work ordered by the Ministry of Labour be henceforward recognised, and that appellate tribunals shall contain a majority of persons who, while fully prepared to recognise and reject the appeals of persons who are not genuine, have sympathy for the position of the sincere objector, whatever the grounds for his objection.

Lord Ponsonby may speak in support of the Duke's motion. Whether other members of the Upper House will have the courage to stand for conscience as Lords Parmour and Sheffield did during the last war we cannot say. Many wise words were uttered in the House of Lords in those days in opposition to some very foolish ones uttered in defence of the Government of the time, and the policy of persecuting war resisters.

It is interesting to read Lord Holland's famous memoirs, and also the life of Charles James Fox, to see how at this period the names of Mr. Ponsonby, M.P., and the Duke of Bedford were linked together, on the unpopular side. Lord Holland's memoirs and Fox's life make interesting political reading.

INCITEMENT TO ——?

By the Rev. R. H. Le MESSURIER, B.A.
(Vicar of Holy Cross in St. Pancras, London)

We called her Bouncer, which was the nearest thing we ever got to an international pun. And certainly Elsa Kladno deserved the epithet.

She was short, plump and jolly. Of course we, who knew her inner story, knew also the magnificent heroism which made her present such an exterior to the world. For, if anyone could possibly have an excuse for being morose and unhappy, it was Elsa.

She came from Prague, where her father was a professor of medicine at the university. I'd met him once, in London, about ten years ago, and a more benign old gentlemen it is impossible to imagine. He'd come over to read a paper on psychology to the British Medical Congress, and I well remember the furore it caused in intellectual circles. He wiped the ground with the materialistic behavourists, and gave the soundest of scientific reasons why he considered a living faith in Christ essential to mental health. As I, too, held the same opinions, and had plenty of opportunities of proving them in my combined work as a psychologist and parish priest, it was only natural that I should invite Dr. Kladno to spend his last few days in London at my vicarage. And in between the enormous amount of work that he contrived to do even when he was supposed to be on holiday, we discussed many of our cases with mutual delight and profit.

We had another point of contact too. For, like myself, Dr. Kladno was a Pacifist,and in Prague he was the leader of a small, select, devout and intellectual circle of men and women who agreed with his views. It was a bit difficult at first explaining to him what an Anglo-Catholic was—he, of course, was of the Roman obedience. But his large-hearted charity soon bridged the gulf between us, and we corresponded regularly after his return to Prague.

In fact, my wife and I were on the point of accepting his recurring invitation to spend our holidays there, when the Nazi troubles started and Czechoslovakia was invaded. Our correspondence came to a sudden end.

It was in 1940 that I heard of the Kladno's again. A refugee organisation with which I had had some dealings, rang me up one morning. They said that a certain Elsa Kladno had arrived in London, and had told them of her father's acquaintance with me. Of course, my wife and I got busy at once, and within an hour Elsa had come to stay with us.

She was pale, and almost thin when she arrived. When my wife tucked her in bed that night, she broke down for the first and only time, and we learned something of the horrors she had been through in Prague and elsewhere. But twenty-five is a recuperable age, and Elsa—outwardly at all events—soon recovered her good spirits. We both loved her from the start. She fitted in as if we had known her for years, and pretty soon she was like another daughter to us. At first her English was almost unrecogniseable, but we got on with smatterings of German and French, until her quick mind enabled her to speak English almost without a flaw. She was very musical, too, and spent hours keeping up her practice on our piano. I don't think I mentioned that she'd won a gold medal from the Vienna Conservatoire when she was eighteen, and was regarded as a coming pianist in that land of natural musicians.

She wouldn't have left Prague at all, if it hadn't been for the firm insistance of her father. Though Dr. Kladno wasn't interested in politics, he could see perhaps a bit more clearly than most, which way the wind was blowing. When I say he wasn't interested in politics, I mean just that. Leaders of all parties were amongst his intimate friends, and very often bitter opponents would meet at Dr. Kladno's house, and his influence was enough to make them become almost friends while they were there. However, when the second world war started, Dr. Kladno insisted on sending Elsa to England through Austria and Italy; managed, too, to ensure that she brought a fairly good supply of money with her. At least, we'll call it money, for I don't want to give the old man's secret away, lest I spoil the chances of others who have hit on the same idea. Of course, some of you who have listened to Elsa's marvellous broadcasts on the B.B.C., may by this time have guessed that her name wasn't Kladno at all. But what you can guess won't hurt her, now.

Elsa had the kind of hair that every woman wants, and few get. It was gold and sparkling, great masses of it piled up in naturally wavy "sets", as I believe the technical term is. Her complexion was fair, her eyes a lightish blue. Her rippling laugh was one of the most infectious things I know. Our children loved her. And that's the finest test of all.

One evening we'd been privileged to listen to Elsa in a B.B.C. studio, and we got home fairly late. We'd missed the nine o'clock news, and it was Elsa herself who suggested listening to the B.B.C. European broadcast. To my dying day I shall regret that I didn't smash the radio then and there.

I don't know whether you often listen to the continental service of the B.B.C. You'll be surprised at their flavour. They are, well, more pungent, shall we say, than the usually polite and well-bred stuff dished out for English listeners. And this night it was worse than usual.

The announcer had a rather harsh voice, and this quality was augmented by the brusque way in which he read the news. And when he got down to giving some details about some Quisling or other who had been shot in Brussels, he fairly let himself go. "We are interested to hear", he said in a gloating sort of voice, "that Monsieur Paul Lallier was shot in Brussels yesterday. Monsieur Lallier was one of those Belgians who was pleased to co-operate (I can give you no real indication of the sneer in his voice as he said that word) with the Nazis. You may remember that only last week we called your attention to his nefarious dealings with the enemy. And now he has received his reward."

"I am now going to read you", continued the announcer, "a list of people whom you should watch very very carefully. And, if they are listening themselves, I should like to tell them that they are playing a very dangerous game. It may be that they don't understand the terrible nemesis awaiting them. But they can be sure that it will shortly overtake them. . . . Now, perhaps you would like to have a pencil and paper ready, to take down this further list of traitors who have been brought to our notice."

"If that isn't direct incitement to murder", said my wife, "then I've never heard of it."

Elsa nodded dreamily. I think she was still thinking of that Liszt rhapsody she had played that evening.

Then, without warning, the blow fell.

"Last on our list", said the announcer with relish, "is the name of Dr. Albrecht Kladno, of Prague University."

Elsa came out of her dream in a flash. Her face grew pale and old. Her mouth opened. Her hands clenched. And she gazed at the radio with a growing expression of horror and despair.

The rasping voice flowed on. "Dr. Kladno", it said, "has been very friendly with the Nazi chiefs in Prague, very friendly indeed. On several occasions prominent members of the Nazi party have been coming from his house, where presumably there has been a meeting. Dr. Kladno is playing a very dangerous game, and we have given you his name because we thought you might be interested. We know you will keep a careful watch on Dr. Kladno and his kind, and . . ."

I dashed across the room and switched off the radio. My wife knelt beside Elsa's chair, and clutched the trembling hands that seemed to have lost all life.

"Don't worry, Elsa darling", said my wife. "It will be all right. It will be all right, Elsa, dear. I know it will. Don't worry."

Elsa took a deep, shuddering breath. "How horrible!" she moaned. "How dreadful! Why, Daddy wouldn't dream of plotting for or against anyone. Friendly! He's friendly to everyone. His friendship is the finest thing he's got to offer."

"And he offers it generously", I put in, now that I could trust myself to speak.

The next few days were a nightmare. The three of us pestered the B.B.C. and every Government department we could reach. Everywhere the reply was the same—it was someone else's responsibility. Of course, the various officials were polite, that goes without saying. They regretted everything. But then, as one of them hinted, war was war, and no doubt the information received was correct.

We could do nothing. The thing was hopeless from the start. We could see by the way various people looked down their noses as we tried desperately to explain that Dr. Kladno was a Pacifist. But it was no good. The B.B.C. had spoken. The cause was finished.

Elsa, pale, grim, and self-controlled, haunted the radio. She tuned in to Prague, Berlin, Vienna—everywhere in fact where she might get some news. And it was five nights later that she got it—again from the B.B.C.

"We are interested to hear", said the gloating voice, "that Dr. Albrecht Kladno and his wife have paid the penalty of their friendship with the Nazis in Prague. Yesterday a bomb was thrown into their drawing-room, and they were both killed. Now if you will get your pencils and paper . . ."

"Aunty Elsa", said our youngest son a few weeks later, "why has your hair gone all white?"

TO THE POETS

When the last great war was over,
And the echo of guns had died away,
And the brave lay dead on foreign fields,
And the living returned on feet of clay,
Your verse was bitter as gall, Poets,
How you raved and cursed at war,
You saw through the game, above the throng,
War was fiendish, and war was wrong,
And could never be right—ay, that was your song,
And your books were popular.

But now we have war again, Poets,
The same kind of war as before,
Or do you believe 'tis for Freedom's cause,
And a brave new world for the poor?
Ye must, for your patriotic verse
Is the voice of your masters' guns,
This war, at last, is a war of right,
You changed your views in a single night,
And you praise the men who fly high at night,
And drop their death on the Huns.

But when it is over again, Poets,
And the brave are dead once more,
And the living are walking the hungry streets,
As they did so long before,
And the promises of your masters,
Are words that are buried and dead,
You will rail again, in the same old way,
And show up the shame and hypocrisy,
But forget that you, too, in the bloody fray
The poor to the slaughter led.

RICHARD CARLILE

A reproduction of the famous oil painting of Richard Carlile presented by George Jacob Holyoake to the National Portrait Gallery, London.

Hannan Swaffer, in the "Daily Herald", for December 22, last, under the title "Protest for a Prophet", wrote:—

Although it is more than ever necessary, to-day, to educate people as to how reformers struggled for the freedom they now enjoy—it did not descend as a gift from the heavens—not everyone seems to think so.

B.B.C. Says "No!"

The Rationalist Press Association had arranged for G. D. H. Cole to broadcast a special talk in celebration of the centenary of Richard Carlile's death — but the Talks Director of the B.B.C., apparently, had never heard of him.

"Although many are furious at the decision", writes Dr. Charles Brook, "the matter cannot be raised in Parliament. Won't journalists protest?"

In Jail for Freedom.

John Wilkes, certainly, is better known. But Carlile fought for the freedom of the Press and for unlicensed liberty of speech and writing with an equal zeal.

Born at Ashburton, Devonshire, in 1790, he died in London, at his publishing house in Fleet Street, on February 10, 1843, after having spent nearly ten years in jail for so-called "blasphemy and sedition."

Forgotten!

"Jail Journal", compiled by Guy A. Aldred, his contemporary champion, from Carlile's writings in prison, is in parts worthy of Tom Paine.

His courage was monumental. He advocated a living vigilant democracy. He discussed birth control—in 1826!

"Yet, while reactionist Cobbett and compromiser Hone have been remembered", writes Aldred, "while politicians Henry Hunt and Francis Burdett have been praised, the bravest and most stalwart revolutionist of his time, the Social Republican and ex-tinker, Richard Carlile, has been forgotten or ignored."

So, alas, are thousands of others to whose stalwartness our freedom is due.

Chapman Cohen, in "The Freethinker", for December 27, 1942, writes:—

"Jail Journal and Other Writings by Richard Carlile", Edited and arranged by Guy A. Aldred (Strickland Press, Glasgow, 2s.) gives nearly a hundred pages of sketches by Carlile, one of the most fearless of English Freethinkers and Radicals, and will be welcomed by many. There is a fine example to be found of the way the work of these pioneers is neglected and forgotten in almost any standard history of the early 19th century that one cares to pick up. If their names are mentioned, it is in such a way as to give the reader the impression that they are not of great consequence. Our scholastic system sadly needs overhauling.

Reviewing "Jail Journal", in "The Monthly Record" of The South Place Ethical Society, for February, our comrade, "Humanist" writes:—

This closely printed book of 90 pages has been produced as a centennial tribute to the memory of Richard Carlile, who died on February 10, 1843, at the age of 53. Out of this quite modest term of life, nine years and four months were spent in prison in consequence of his persistence in publishing matter technically in contravention of the Blasphemy Laws. This matter included Paine's "Age of Reason", referred to by Dr. Conway as "that really religious book." It was one of the many merits of Mr. W. J. Fox (at that time a firm believer in Christianity and in the Bible) that on the Sunday preceding the trial in October, 1819, he arraigned the whole principle of such prosecutions.

Mr. Aldred in his Foreword expresses the hope that the hundredth anniversary of Carlile's death will be celebrated throughout the English-speaking world. South Place Ethical Society has arranged to do its share for, as already announced, it has obtained the consent of Mr. Joseph McCabe to deliver a discourse on this subject at the meeting on Sunday, February 7.

Jail Journal contains a number of refreshingly outspoken articles by Carlile, many of which were written in jail. He was a freethinker who did not hesitate to call himself an atheist. His approach to Nature was strictly scientific and he gave hard knocks even to such an eminent mathematical philosopher as Sir Isaac Newton for his inability to divest himself of superstitious beliefs. Among other interesting items included in the booklet, those entitled "What is Love" and 'Thomas Paine" are of special importance. The first examines the nature of the normal love relation between man and woman and advocates birth control. In this respect Carlile anticipated one of the activities of Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant. The second is a convenient summary of the life of Thomas Paine.

ment to the principles of that great and good man —ROBERT OWEN."

He gives his reasons for coinciding in Owen's principles, and concludes:—

"As I never in thought, word, or deed, wilfully injured any human being, I hope that I shall be forgiven by those whom I may have inadvertently or unconsciously jostled in this world's scramble. I have indefatigably, sincerely and disinterestedly laboured to improve the condition of humanity—believing it to be the duty of every man to leave the world better than he found it; and if I have not pursued this object with that wisdom and discretion that should mark at all times the conduct of a rational man, I have zealously maintained what appeared to me to be right, and paid the penalty of what my opponents may term my indiscretions in many cruel persecutions. I freely forgive all who have injured me in the struggle; and die in the hope and consolation that a time is approaching when the spirit of antagonism will give place to fraternal affection and universal co-operation to promote the happiness of mankind.

"In the presence of G. J. Holyoake, Henry Allsop Ivory, John Kenny."

The sentiments of Hetherington as regards god, death, and priestcraft are commendable. But the manner of expression is terribly Victorian and I cannot imagine an atheist of our day being so troubled in the matter. Death is obviously the end of all and whether we state the fact poetically or not, the fact remains, and mortal existence cannot override it. The fact stated, the fuss ends.

It is to Hetherington's credit that he desired to check the "Infidel Death Bed" fiction, which was a stock-in-trade of superstition at that time. For that, and his struggle for the Free Press, workers should honour his memory.

HENRY HETHERINGTON

[In these columns for October 1941, we commenced a study on Carlile's contemporaries and biographers. Although the matter was in type we have not succeeded in publishing it, owing to pressure on our space. In this issue, we reproduce the part dealing with Henry Hetherington. This essay extends the note found on pages 147-148 of "Richard Carlile, Agitator", and also the paragraphs in the "Introduction" referring to Hetherington, pages 17-18. Since this month is the centenary of Carlile's death, no apology is needed for this record.—Ed.]

Henry Hetherington survived Richard Carlile six years. In his youth, Hetherington learned the trade of a painter. He pursued this profession to such purpose that he spent most of his public life as the much-persecuted and much-imprisoned champion of the unstamped newspaper. He opened a shop in the Strand, London, to champion the Free Press, but removed to Holywell Street, and then to Judd Street, New Road.

Hetherington died a member of the St. Pancras Board of Guardians. The Board paid a great tribute to his memory, on Friday, August 24, 1849, the day after his death. But the class war was a reality in 1849 as it is to-day. And it was as impossible to reconcile the rights of the poor with the interests of the rate-payers then as it is now. I prefer Hetherington's Atheism to his social economy.

Hetherington died at 4 a.m. on the Thursday, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, from cholera, following upon nine days' dysentery. He was buried at Kensal Green on the Sunday. Funeral orations were delivered by James Watson and George Jacob Holyoake.

Hetherington decided, on the Tuesday evening before his death, to put forth his last will and testament

"for the satisfaction and guidance of esteemed friends, that no mistake or misapprehension may arise through false reports of those who officiously and obtrusively obtain access to the deathbeds of avowed infidels to priestcraft and superstition."

Hetherington recounts his reasons for disbelieving in the deity, and proceeds:—

"2nd. I believe death to be an eternal sleep—that I shall never live again in this world, or another, with a consciousness that I am the same identical person that once lived, performed the duties, and exercised the functions of a human being.

"3rd. I consider priestcraft and superstition the greatest obstacle to human improvement and happiness. During my life I have, to the best of my ability, sincerely and strenuously exposed and opposed them, and die with a firm conviction that Truth, Justice and Liberty will never be permanently established on earth till every vestige of superstition and priestcraft shall be utterly destroyed.

"4th. I have ever considered that the only religion useful to man consists exclusively in the practice of morality, and in the mutual interchange of kind actions. In such a religion there is no room for priests—and when these are seen interfering at our births, marriages and deaths, pretending to conduct us safely through this state of being to another and happier world, any disinterested person of the least shrewdness and discernment must perceive that their sole aim is to stultify the minds of the people by their incomprehensible doctrines, that they may the more effectually fleece the poor deluded sheep who listen to their empty babblings and mystifications.

"5th. As I have lived so I die, a determined opponent to their nefarious and plundering system. I wish my friends, therefore, to deposit my remains in unconsecrated ground, and trust they will allow no priest, or clergyman of any denomination, to interfere in any way whatever at my funeral. My earnest desire is that no relation or friend shall wear black or any kind of mourning, as I consider it contrary to our rational principles to indicate respect for a departed friend, by complying with hypocritical custom."

In the sixth clause, Hetherington expresses his wishes with reference to his funeral, and concludes:—

"These are my views and feelings in quitting an existence that has been chequered with the plagues and pleasures of a competitive, scrambling, selfish system; a system by which the moral and social aspirations of the noblest human beings are nullified by incessant toil and physical deprivations; by which, indeed, all men are trained to be either slaves, hypocrites or criminals. Hence my ardent attach-

(which may come to us whether we want it or not), the second (the only one our Government seems to envisage at present) is to try to meet our after-war difficulties by our present obsolete and useless methods, which do not permit the effective use of our own resources but rely on a vain and foolish dream of fighting successfully for foreign markets and holding them by force of arms or finance. The third alternative is to prepare to use money as the servant, and not the master, of production and distribution.

PEACE AIMS ACTIVITIES

RYHS DAVIES AT BIRMINGHAM

Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P., addressing a very enthusiastic Conference in Birmingham on Saturday, January 30th, 1943, stated that we had at last reached the age of crucifixion of youth and the martyrdom of man. There must be at this moment not less than 30 million men under arms in the world, and at least another 100 millions working at fever heat to provide them with weapons for their mutual destruction. Before the conflict ended it may be that one half the adult human race would be engaged directly or indirectly in destroying each other. And in ten years or so after it was all over, and man had recovered his sanity once more, the impartial historian writing the story of this period would stand aghast and wonder then why it was that there did not arise among the peoples in the belligerent countries at least a few who made a determined endeavour to put a stop to the carnage. It was well, therefore, to let that historian know that there were in 1943 in these islands some who tried to bring the holocaust to an end by reason rather than by further bloodshed.

The peoples of Europe seemed to have made up their minds that war had become just the ordinary business of life. Indeed, the majority appeared as if they were terrified lest Peace and Goodwill should again dawn on the world. The workman, who now earned a decent wage for the first time in his career, possibly feared that if the War stopped his job in the factory would end too; and he would be thrown on the scrap-heap when the fighting was ended. The same applied to many employers too. There were still many workmen who felt the full blast of the economic blizzard after the Great War, which brought ruin on their industries and upon them and their families as well. What they all forgot, however, was that the longer war lasts the greater the evil after-effects of the disruption of industrial and civil life. You cannot continue for years to blow into the air the labour and substance of a nation and pawn its wealth in the bargain, and then think you can begin all over again as if nothing had happened. He protested against the assumption that Governments anywhere were powerful and clever enough to harness the financial, economic and political consequences of a world war. Many of those who now promised they could do that would not be in power when the conflict was over to try. It is inconceivable that Roosevelt, Churchill, Hitler, Mussolini and Stalin would hold office five years after this war ended; nations had almost a universal habit of relentlessly discarding later on those who led them into the slaughter, whether the war was won, lost, or ended in stalemate.

During the heat of the War of 1914-18 there were several attempts at a negotiated Peace, and some of them nearly succeeded; and it is clear now that mankind, and especially the working classes, would have fared much better if that had happened rather than continue the knock-out blow policy until the Kaiser was dethroned. However mad the Kaiser, it was almost agreed in this country now that he was a much more reasonable person than Hitler. But then, our enemy for the time being is always the worst we have ever met. Ten years hence, should another enemy arise in Europe, Hitler might then appear a gentleman by comparison; and so the madness proceeds from one generation to another.

The peoples of the belligerent nations were not, of course, made aware then of the attempts at an Armistice during 1916; and it is not inconceivable that even at this moment Peace feelers may not be roaming round Europe. Even Parliament will not be told that much, although we pride ourselves that we are a Democracy. It was essential that the peoples of each country at War should make their views known to their Governments. Every Government is, naturally, delighted when moves for Peace or attempts at revolution are made in enemy countries; they are terrified, however, if any such suggestion is made in their own. He objected very strongly to the attitude adopted by governments that the common folk had no right to say what they thought about War when it was being waged. They suffered the evil consequences even more so than members of governments. Wars are, of course, the consequences of quarrels between statesmen; and strange as it may seem, those responsible for the quarrels never themselves fought it out; they compelled other men to do the fighting and dying for them. That, to him, was the most disgraceful point of all about modern wars. History relates that many centuries ago kings, princes and chieftains who quarrelled did the fighting among themselves, whilst their subjects carried victuals to the battle front in their support. The position now had been reversed; young men were at last fighting and carrying victuals to each other, whilst the chieftains sat at their firesides reading maps to see how the battle was raging.

Some argued that to suggest an Armistice was a confession of defeat; he thought the reverse was the case. The bravest thing that any sensible man could do was to try and bring the combatants to reason with each other. There must be, of course, an Armistice some day and a Peace Conference to follow. Peace negotiation had always been a better bargain for mankind than when the victors imposed terms on the vanquised. The awful consequences of the Treaty of Versailles proved all that. He felt that the forces at work in this war were too evenly matched for the traditional military victory to inure for either side. It looked at the moment, in spite of the vile propaganda of the several Governments to the contrary, that the conflict might end in sheer exhaustion. Millions of people living on big patches of the earth were already facing hunger; the tillers of the soil where Nature intended them to live and labour were now engaged on the most futile tasks that were ever conceived—that of killing and maiming each other. Ships and their crews were being sent to the bottom millions of men, women and children were murdered; towns devastated and the best buildings and works of art destroyed; and all that was done in order forsooth to satisfy the hatred, greed and selfishness of a few. The massacre up to date, however, was nothing in comparison with what we may expect if the conflict proceeded much further. He was not sure but that famine, pestilence, revolution and chaos awaited the human race everywhere unless this madness was ended soon by an Armistice.

In any case, he was not going to be a silent witness of this destruction and the spread of foul disease, hunger and misery. He was a British subject first, but he was a citizen of the world as well. Whilst he was strongly opposed to Totalitarianism of all kinds, it must be remembered that even when that system is doomed some other bogey will emerge to rouse the hatred of perfidious persons who delight in bloodshed and who at the same time declare that they love Peace and rejoice in international Goodwill.

In conclusion he said that it was more true now than ever that "Peace is the Masterpiece of Reason", and that Peace hath her Victories no less renowned than Wars."

A REAL POET.

There is a Poet in our place,
A pale, exotic-looking fellow,
With a Jesus Christ-like face,
And a skin a pimply-yellow.

All day long he wanders round,
Up the hillside, by the river,
Searching, musing, so profound,
Riding whiles—to shake his liver.

Khaki shorts, and coloured tie,
And a beard—as Poet's wear 'em,
Now and then flat down he'll lie,
Upon the grass, to write a poem.

Writes of flowers and nightingales,
And nymphs who haunt the faery streamlets,
Aesthetic to his finger-nails,
And is quite famous for his dreamlets.

He sits on fences quite a lot,
Looking down on ploughmen broiling,
And sees the beauty of the spot,
But not the shame of these folk toiling.

He never asks what wage they earn,
Nor of the hours they give the farmer,
Sees the milkmaid at the churn,
And sings of her as some sweet charmer.

Chloe-Milkmaid sort of thing,
As was sung in days of Spenser,
Yet her curses have a sting
That would never pass the censor.

I've often wondered, now I know it—
Why we've never had brave songs,
When we have the Worker Poet,
Then we'll sing of shames and wrongs.

Then will poetry be a real thing,
Something vital, true and strong,
No sweet faery-wisps of feeling,
But a new world in a song.

TOWARDS SOCIALIST UNITY

JOHN McGOVERN'S LETTER

We have received the following letter of interest and solidarity from our comrade, John McGovern, M.P.:—

Dear Guy,—Please accept enclosed cheque for £3 towards your fund on behalf of Maxton, Stephen and myself. We are of opinion that your propaganda has been deadly against war and every form of selfish private interest. In these days of self-seeking and departure from every principle of working class interest it is stimulating to us to read your very fine publication. Your searchlight on past and present activities and pronouncements is the best I have read since the war began.

Although we differ in certain approaches we still admire your efforts.

With best wishes.

Yours fraternally,

JOHN McGOVERN.

House of Commons, Feb. 4, 1943.

Naturally, this letter recalls incidents of the last war, and our close associations with John McGovern during the period 1920-1922, and his intense loyalty during our Barlinnie imprisonment of 1921-22, when the Government of the day attempted in vain to outlaw the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation. It recalls, also, the Free Speech fight on Glasgow Green, when McGovern, Maxton, and Campbell Stephen all took part. Other meetings and associations are recalled, especially in connection with opposition to the great war, and Socialist propaganda activity in Fife immediately after our release from gaol in 1919; meeting Maxton trekking to Dunfermline where we were both due to address Socialist Anti-Militarist meetings, etc.

To-day, we need a great Socialist and Pacifist unity, a movement of wide proletarian common sense and struggle, as never before. All the forces of reason, progress, and revolution must unite. In this spirit of urgency and solidarity we welcome the gesture of McGovern, Maxton, and Campbell Stephen. There should be uncompromising freedom of speech and also uncompromising unity of aim and purpose. We need an immediate unity and we are prepared to do all we can to bring about such unity and make it effective.

On the same day as we received John McGovern's letter, we received a letter from our comrade, Rhys Davies, M.P. He had circulated a large quantity of the January issue in Manchester and wrote stating that he was looking to future issues. Comrade Davies also stressed the need for Socialist and Pacifist unity at this moment of crisis.

Outside Parliament, our comrade F. W. Jowett uses his pen boldly and fearlessly, denouncing war and careerism. Jowett's article on "The New British Fascism," exposing Herbert Morrison's line-up with Big Business interests, published in "The New Leader," for February 6, is one of the most useful and fearless articles he has penned during his long career of struggle against capitalism and its calamatious consequence, the destruction of humanity by war and disease. Every Socialist should read this striking essay and tell his mates about it..

Health is returning to the movement: the health of unity in understanding; unity and mutual criticism, without which unity would be but a barren conformity. Very soon, we shall discover a united platform and the recreation of the Socialist movement.

Let us unite.

THE PICTURE

By the Rev. R. H. Le MESSURIER, B.A.
(Vicar of Holy Cross in St. Pancras, London)

There is a very famous radio personality who always claims he runs into some very "rum" things each week. I haven't heard him for some time now, but I think you know the one I mean.

Whenever he finished his item with his well-known remark, "Lumme! I don't 'arf run inter some rum things, I don't", I always used to reply—though of course he couldn't hear me—"I wish you'd take my job for a week. You'd run into a good many more." Parish priests do see life, you know.

Take, for example, that night our post-warden came into our shelter on a flying visit in the middle of a blitz. He was in a hurry. Two of his wardens had been killed the night before, and he was short-handed. By the time of his visit we'd settled the people into the shelter, so I offered to do a patrol for him. And he accepted without hesitation.

That was how I managed to run into one of those rum things that would beat Syd Walker's into a cocked hat. Of course, I didn't know the whole story till later, but it was rum enough from the start.

I had just turned a corner, keeping a sharp look-out for any infringements of the black-out. Ahead of me the street stretched dark and gloomy, and I knew there was only one house inhabited in the whole row. The rest just weren't inhabitable at all, after the night before.

Suddenly I heard the usual shrill, seering sound, too close for comfort, and I dived for cover. The bomb—fortunately it wasn't a large one—hit one of the deserted houses about fifty yards from where I was lying and exploded.

So I ran along, just in case someone had been nearer than myself.

I hadn't gone twenty yards when I vaguely saw someone coming out of the house I mentioned above. It was a man. He was coming towards me. And, in spite of everything, my mind slipped back to that radio personality. This was rum, if ever anything was.

Highbrows would, of course, have turned up their noses at such a picture. It was cheap and gaudy, some sort of a free gift such as used to delight readers of Victorian magazines. It was full of pale pinks, sky blues and watery greens. But Bob had always loved it.

The subject was a very effeminate Christ, standing in a typical antimacassared Victorian drawing-room. A moustached gentleman had obviously been having a quarrel with his wife, for his chin was up as he stood looking down at her shrinking, weeping figure in a chair. Underneath the picture was the caption: "The Unseen Listener."

Yes, it was altogether an unworthy picture. But Bob, who didn't know anything about art, had always loved it. His mother had got his father to make a frame for it, and it had hung, ever since Bob could remember, on the wall at the foot of his bed. Whenever he couldn't sleep, and that was often because the flat was really quiet, Bob used to lie and look at the picture, illuminated as it was by a ray which came in through the cracked window-pane from the gas-light in the street.

Sometimes, when he was ill—which was very often, too—Bob used to get his mother to make up a story about the picture. And, though she had little imagination, she managed to invent something to please him, always ending with the words, "So ye see, Bob, ye mustn't sye no 'ard words to no one. Jesus'll allus 'ear ye. An' if ye remembers that, ye won't sye nor do nuthink bad."

Bob liked nothing better than to take the Vicar into his tiny bedroom, whenever that kind old gentleman called, and show him the picture. That, of course, was when Bob was quite tiny, before he grew out of going to church and became grown-up like Dad and Mum. But he never grew away from his picture.

Bob was still a small boy when Dad went away to the war, and he couldn't quite understand why Mum started to cry one day when a telegram came.

He was too young to miss his Dad, and soon got used to not having him round the place. There was quite enough to fill it, anyway, for Bob had three sisters and a brother. So Dad wasn't missed, except sometimes, when Bob's ailing chest wouldn't let him go out. Then he remembered how Dad used to take him on his knee in front of the kitchen fire. Dad's face was rough, and Bob loved pulling his long moustache. Dad was also clever with his hands, and he made a lot of toys for young Bob; so many, in fact, that the others were jealous, and deliberately smashed them when Dad was out. But Bob was afraid to tell Dad when he returned, because the others had threatened to bash him if he did. So he had to say that he'd broken the things himself, and that used to make Dad look sorry. But, though there was a certain resemblance between Dad's face and the man in the picture, Dad never looked really cross at such times, and certainly Bob couldn't remember that Dad had ever said unkind things to Mum. He never made her cry, like the lady in the picture—except, of course, when the telegram came, and Mum said that Dad wasn't coming home no more.

It was shortly after this that Bob went away for a long trip to the hospital. "'E's allus 'ad a weak chest", said Mum. On this occasion it was nearly two years before he returned home. And during this illness, when at times he was slightly delirious, Bob would often ask for his picture.

When he got home he found that the family had moved into a small flat in one of the "buildings", as they were called. And Mum had got a job. By this time the two eldest were working, too, so things weren't too bad.

Bob was in and out of school. The slightest suspicion of wet weather stretched him on his bed which he now shared with two others. And often he amused himself by making up new stories about his picture. When he left school at fourteen he couldn't get a job to suit him. He had fifteen in less than four years, and lost them all through illness. Then he got his only permanent job, as a pot-man in a local pub, though even now he often lost a week's pay because of his chest. Indeed, to look at him, you would wonder where he found room in his chest to draw a decent breath. He was undersized and pinched, and his chest looked like a chicken's.

However, things weren't too bad. The three girls did pretty well for themselves by marriage, meeting their husbands in the restaurant where they were waitresses. Bob's brother went into the Air Force. So Bob and Mum moved again, into two rooms this time, and managed to make ends meet. Sometimes, of course, they had to pawn things. But then, that was natural to people in their state, and they thought nothing about it. But, whatever was sold or pawned, Bob's picture was inviolate. Nothing would persuade him to let that go.

Mum died in the infirmary just before the second world war, and Bob stayed on at the same address, though now he had only one room with a gas-ring which sufficed for his cooking. But he still had his picture, though by now he used to laugh openly at it whenever one of his pals came to see him.

"It was Mum's reely. She got it from Dad, and wouldn't part with it."

Then the blitzes started, and the district got badly knocked about. The house where Bob lived was the only one in the row. Of course, the windows were out, the ceilings were down, and there was no gas. But Bob managed by lighting a fire in the tiny grate, and kept his coal in a box under the stairs.

One day he had a bad attack of coughing and spat up a lot of blood. He couldn't go out. So all day he lay in bed with nothing to eat, and he was feeling very ill indeed when the sirens sounded at black-out time.

The raid was a pretty bad one, and several times Bob thought he'd better get up and go to a shelter. But he didn't feel up to it. Every movement meant more coughing, and an increase of the pain in his chest. So he stayed where he was, listening to the noises of the raid outside—the droning of the planes, the staccato roar of the guns, the whine of bombs falling some distance away, and occasionally the sound of a fire-engine or an ambulance.

By now it was dark, but there were plenty of houses burning, so that Bob could still see his picture faintly outlined against the opposite wall. And it was the last thing he saw before he dropped off into a feverish doze.

The crash and the blast arrived together. Bob woke up in mid-air. He felt himself flying across the room, surrounded by bits of furniture and shreds of bed-clothes. He hit the wall with a crash which dazed him. And when he emerged from a sort of red mist he could hear what was left of the house falling all about him.

Then he pannicked. He was too ill to worry about being killed. But he didn't want to be crushed by the falling bricks, or to be buried beneath a huge pile of rubble. He scrambled to his feet. As he did so his picture fell from the wall, striking him in the chest. Without thought he grabbed it and, holding it in both hands, dashed through the door, along the passage and out into the street.

And that was why I was surprised to see a completely naked man running from the bombed house, holding in front of him a large picture.

VICTIMISING CONSCIENCE.

Thomas Johnston's Attitude.

The instalment of "The Editor's Trials," published in this issue, recites the indignation of Thomas Johnston, then editor of the "Forward," in 1921, over the victimisation of a policeman. Johnston has the power to right the wrong then done to an innocent man by the Chief Constable of the day and endorsed by the then Secretary of State for Scotland with whom Johnston is in most friendly terms at the moment. War-interests, and the pursuit of war purposes, unites them. Johnston has not righted the wrong he denounced so vigorously in 1921 but he has interfered with the right of conscience.

The appointment as a probation officer in Glasgow of a conscientious objector, Kenneth B. Roberton, son of Sir Hugh Roberton, was reviewed by the Probation Committee of the Corporation in November, 1942, exactly 21 years after Johnston's excitement at victimisation.

The committee had previously agreed to make the appointment, but Johnston, as Secretary of State for Scotland declined to approve the arrangement for a permanent filling of the vacancy. The committee proposed that the appointment should be for the duration of the war.

In withholding his sanction, the Secretary of State pointed out that the Probation Committee had power to make a temporary appointment to the position—one for three months, which would be renewable if desired—without reference to him, and the question put to the committee was whether they should exercise this power.

Several protests against the appointment of Mr. Roberton were submitted to the committee from Church organisations, including the Presbytery of Glasgow and the Archdiocese of the Roman Catholic Church.

Councillor Ian Galbraith moved in the committee that no appointment be made. As an amendment Mrs. Kate Beaton proposed that Mr. Roberton be appointed under the temporary arrangement. On a division the motion was carried by 6 votes to 5.

In our view, so long as this system continues, and Probation Officers are necessary, Kenneth Roberton is the one man suited for the task. There never ought to have been any opposition.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS

III. GLASGOW (1921) TRIAL ECHOES

[Part I. of these trials, on Indian Sedition (1909) case appeared in "The Word" for September 1940. The 1921 Trial commenced in the September 1941 issue. It concluded in the April 1942 issue. Some of the issues containing accounts of these trials are obtainable but not all. A number are out of print. Part III. records events arising out of the 1921 Trial and the Case of the Documents, which introduced us to the High Court at Edinburgh, and so opened our appearances at Parliament House. We will complete the Glasgow and Edinburgh records, before dealing with our English Court Martials; Hyde Park Sedition and Blasphemy Cases, 1925 and Hyde Park Free Speech Case, 1938; Irregular Marriage Trial, 1916; and Birth Control Case, 1923.—Ed.

The Glasgow Sedition trial had several important repercussions. One makes most important and most interesting reading at the present time. It will enable the Socialist and the radical and liberal reader, irrespective of the exact terms of his political or economic creed, so long as he possesses a fair and reasonable mind, to form his own opinion of the present Secretary of State for Scotland, the now Rt. Hon. Thomas Johnston, M.P. It shows how the Labour movement is regarded as carrion by the parliamentary birds of prey, who start in the gutter, risk nothing, and rise to place in class society. The first chapter of this section shall be factual study in political opportunism and parasitism. It will demonstrate how the emotions of the careerist belong to the moment and express only one concern: how to exploit human wrong in order to secure power. The careerist exploits grievances. He never feels them. He never comes to grips with them. He never attempts to remove them. He uses grievances as stepping stones to office and then mocks those who have suffered. Without Utopian fancies, without revolutionary vision, he lacks also even reformist principles. He uses the majority to advance the interest of a strict conservative minority of one, himself. He exploits every special instance of wrong to forward the advantage of an isolated and outstanding mediocrity, himself. His virtue is his social vice: appetite for power and the fruits of office. The Glasgow Sedition Case of 1921 set the appetite working. The War Government of 1943 finds the appetite satiated. The difference measures the parasite opportunism of exploited wrong.

I. GLASGOW POLICEMAN'S DISMISSAL.

In 1921, Thomas Johnston was merely editor of Forward. During the war-years, this man's "Socialist War-Points" had exposed every labour leader, parliamentary or industrial, who accepted war-bonuses or made war-speeches. He evaded opposing the war and he evaded fighting in the war. He had no passion for sacrifice or martyrdom. But he assumed an anti-war pose and conscientious objectors, war resisters, Socialists, and Anarchists conspired openly to boost and to build up the repute and circulation of his journal. But for them he would have achieved no distinction. He did not become a M.P. until 1922. His exposure of the Glasgow policeman case earned him much support and assisted in his return to Westminster.

Thomas Johnston, the proletarian editor, the Socialist enemy of unjust power and authority, told the policeman's story on page 5 of Forward, for Saturday, November 26, 1921, beneath stream-lined headlines. Here are the headlines:

AFTER SEVENTEEN YEARS' SERVICE.

Why a Glasgow Constable was "Dismissed the Force."

His Wife Friendly with a Lady who took an Interest in Politics.

Beneath these flaring headlines, Thomas Johnston told his story. He opened as follows:—

They're taking no risks with the Glasgow Police Force. You may have seventeen years' unimpeachable service. You may be a son of a sergeant in the Royal Irish Constabulary. You may take no interest in politics. But if your wife buys a pair of boots from a lady who takes an interest in extreme politics you are sacked—especially if your wife was a nurse who had the misfortune to be born in Germany.

Policemen's wives should take no interest in politics, they should not know other women who take an interest in politics.

Policemen should not keep dogs who take German measles, they should take care that their wives are born in London or Paris or Glasgow: their children must not eat German biscuits. The uncles should be warned to pass Labour and Socialist politicians on the street as if they were the plague.

All of which observations we deduce from a reading of the following humble petition sent to the Secretary for Scotland by William Magill, of 68 Adamswell Street, ex-constable of the St. Rollox Division of the Glasgow Police:—

Then followed the petition in full. We quote its introductory recital of the facts of the case:—

Unto the Right Honourable Robert Munro, K.C., M.P., Secretary for Scotland.

The PETITION of WILLIAM MAGILL, residing at 68 Adamswell Street, Springburn, Glasgow, ex-Constable No. 107, St. Rollox Division, City of Glasgow Police.

Humbly sheweth that:

The petitioner was born in Ireland on 23rd December, 1884, the son of Sergeant William Magill, of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

In 1899 he came to Dundee. He served in the Volunteers, 3rd Volunteer Battalion, Royal Highlanders, from 31st January, 1902, to 21st January, 1904.

He joined the Glasgow Police Force on 14th June, 1904, and was on street duty till 5th October, 1907, when he was made Bar Officer and Turnkey.

On 29th June, 1914, he was Court Officer. On 8th March, 1916, he was again on street duty. On 23rd April, 1920, he was Court Officer. On 26th March, 1921, he was on street duty.

He holds the sergeants' and inspectors' educational certificate and has a completely clean record in the Police Force.

On 2nd June, 1909, he married Eliese Wilhelmina Werner, a nurse, who was born in Berlin of German parents, her father, William Richard Werner, having taken refuge in London from Germany on 29th July, 1894, on account of his political opinions. He was repatriated in June, 1915.

Your petitioner has two sons aged six and three respectively. On 1st March, 1916, your petitioner attested for service under Lord Derby's scheme.

In 1915 your petitioner's wife went with her father to the Home Office, having received intimation from her father that he was to be repatriated.

She was informed by an officer at the Home Office, to whom she stated that she was the wife of a constable in Glasgow, that she could write to her father, and she obtained directions as to how her letters were to be addressed.

She wrote one letter only.

On 8th March, 1918, your petitioner was called before the Chief Constable of Glasgow, who informed him that his wife was not permitted to correspond with her father except on very rare occasions.

She herself went to see the Chief Constable and had a conversation with him, when he told her that there was no objection to her writing to her parents, if the letters were submitted to him for censorship before being posted.

In August, 1916, she wrote to her father and submitted the letter to the Chief Constable for approval. She then went to Millport for a holiday, and while there received a letter from the Chief Constable stating that he wished to see her.

She returned at once from Millport and had an interview with the Chief Constable, who informed her that he had kept back the letter which she had written, while he made inquiries, and that as a result of these inquiries he found that there was no objection to her writing to her parents.

He stated that he did not wish to insist upon the censorship, but advised her to submit her letters to him, and to this she agreed.

On discussing the interview with her husband, they resolved that she would not write to her parents, and she did not do so.

In 1915 your petitioner's wife made the acquaintance of Miss Jane Hamilton Patrick, with whom she became on friendly terms.

Your petitioner's wife was appreciative of the attention and kindness which she received at Miss Patrick's hands, as she was at that time rather ostracised on account of her German origin.

She visited frequently the house of Miss Patrick's mother, where she met the other members of the family.

Three of Miss Patrick's brothers were serving in the Army, and one was killed at Ypres.

No mention was made between them of politics, and your petitioner's wife did not know anything of Miss Patrick's politics until the spring of 1920, when on calling for her at her mother's house, she was told that Miss Patrick was at 13 Burnbank Gardens.

She then proceeded there and had a talk with Miss Patrick, who told her that the organisation was a Socialist Party.

Your petitioner's wife did not at any time join the Association, nor was she ever asked to do so, and only on one occasion was she present in Burnbank Gardens at a musical evening.

Your petitioner was not aware that his wife ever went to Burnbank Gardens, for she did not tell him.

On 2nd March, 1921, the premises at 13 Burnbank Gardens, known as Bakunin House, was raided by the police, as the Glasgow Headquarters of the Communist Group.

The raid took place at eight o'clock p.m. At nine o'clock your petitioner's wife called at 13 Burnbank Gardens for the purpose of seeing Miss Patrick, who being in the wholesale shoe trade, had undertaken to purchase your petitioner's wife a pair of dancing slippers, to enable her to go to the dance of the Police Force.

As she entered Burnbank Gardens she was stopped by a constable, who stated that the place was being searched and that she would have to be detained.

She stated that she was told she would have to see the officer in charge.

She saw the officer in charge, told him what she had called for, and, at his direction, asked Miss Patrick if she had obtained the shoes.

The detective on duty asked her for particulars of her name and address, etc., and she gave these without hesitation.

She was informed that her name appeared in a book opposite an entry of 3/-, and this she explained was payment made by her for the ticket for the musical evening at which she had been present.

Your petitioner's wife was a subscriber to a monthly journal called "The Spur", which she obtained by post from London, but in January, 1921, it was addressed from 13 Burnbank Gardens, Glasgow, although she was not aware of this fact.

Her card of subscription for "The Spur was also found when the raid took place.

The presence of your petitioner's wife was reported to the Chief Constable by Detective-Superintendent Keith, and on 7th March, 1921, your petitioner wrote to the Chief Constable giving him particulars, stating to him that his wife was not at any time a member of the organisation occupying 13 Burnbank Gardens. A copy of the letter is annexed hereto and marked Production A.

The Chief Constable, without stating any grounds, called upon your petitioner on 16th March, 1921, to resign from the Force.

On 17th March, 1921, your petitioner wrote to the Chief Constable asking him to re-consider his decision. The copy letter is annexed hereto marked Production B.

The Chief Constable refused to re-consider the case, and again called upon your petitioner to resign. On 19th March, 1921, he refused to resign. A copy of the letter is annexed hereto marked Production C.

Thereupon the Chief Constable lodged a misconduct charge against your petitioner for permitting his wife to become a member of a seditious and revolutionary society. A copy of the misconduct charge is annexed hereto marked Production D.

On 24th March, the Chief Constable heard parties and their witnesses, and on 24th March, 1921, he issued his decision, in which he referred not only to the incident at 13 Burnbank Gardens, but to what he alleged to be the attitude that your petitioner took during the war in sympathy with his wife's nationality.

This was no part of the allegation and was without any foundation in fact, both your petitioner and his wife being antagonistic to Germany during the war.

By that decision the Chief Constable ordered your petitioner to resign. A copy of the finding is annexed hereto marked Production E.

Your petitioner refused to resign, and on 26th March, 1921, was dismissed the service.

The petition concluded with a prayer for reconsideration and reinstatement on nine grounds, which summarised amounted to an assertion that Magill had never been guilty of discreditable conduct; that he was called upon to resign contrary to the Statutory Rules and Orders, 1920, No. 2113/S. 102 Section 13, et seq.; that the misconduct charge was void because his wife was not a member of, and he had not allowed his wife to become a member of, a seditious and revolutionary society.

The concluding three clauses of the prayer read as follows:—

7. The three persons arrested in connection with the raid are charged with sedition in respect of a publication called "The Red Commune", and were sentenced, one to twelve months and two to three months' imprisonment.

8. That no suggestion has ever been made that your petitioner has ever had any connection with "The Red Commune" or with the organisation which published it.

9. That after 16 years of service in the Force, your petitioner has been, by the Chief Constable, sentenced to what is practically a life penalty, because of an alleged indirect association of his wife, unknown to him, with those who were arrested.

Thomas Johnston published the productions mentioned in the petition in full. We content ourselves with reproducing Productions A, D, E. These read as follows:—

Production A referred to—City of Glasgow Police.

Subject: Mr. Magill.

St. Rollox Division, 7th March, 1921.

With reference to report by Detective-Superintendent Keith regarding my wife's visit to premises which he was raiding, I have to report that her visit was on business of a private nature, Miss Patrick, who is a personal friend of hers, having promised to get her a pair of shoes at wholesale price, for which she paid Miss Patrick £1 a few days previous. She returned home immediately after giving her explanation to Mr. Keith, and informed me of what had occurred.

My wife denies being a member of the organisation, or of any other, and states that the "card" in question has reference to the fact that he was a subscriber to "The Spur", a monthly periodical in which she was interested from an educational point of view, it being posted from premises raided.

I may state that the matter has caused me grave anxiety since I heard of it, as I realise under what suspicion she has placed me by visiting such a place. She has promised me that in future she will not go to the premises in question or any premises of a like character.

(Signed) WILLIAM MAGILL,
No. 107 Constable, Reg. No. Y277.

The Superintendent.

Production D referred to.

COPY OF MISCONDUCT CHARGE.

"That you were guilty of discreditable conduct prejudicial to discipline and the reputation of the Force by permitting your wife to become a member of a seditious and revolutionary society, known as the Communist Group, with offices at 13 Burnbank Gardens, one of whose aims as set forth in their manifesto is 'To work outside Parliament, on the streets and in the workshops for the revolution, preaching open and avowed sedition and agitating towards the insurrectional crisis.'"

FINDING OF CHIEF CONSTABLE.

24th March, 1921.

"Whether the card bearing Mrs. Magill's name in the card index found at 13 Burnbank Gardens, shows membership, or as she and her husband and his witnesses contend, is merely evidence that she was a subscriber to 'The Spur' newspaper, the organ of the Communist Group, it is clear that Mrs. Magill was in close association with the members and a frequent visitor at the offices of the Group at 13 Burnbank Gardens, also, I must assume, in sympathy with their aims and methods.

I cannot accept Constable Magill's contention that he has no responsibility for his wife's actions in this matter, or his statement that he was unaware of her association with the members or her visits to 13 Burnbank Gardens.

I cannot overlook the attitude he took during the war in sympathy with his wife's nationality.

As his wife is found in association with a revolutionary society which aims at an insurrectional crisis by preaching open and avowed sedition, it becomes impossible for Constable Magill to continue to discharge the duties of a policeman.

He is required to resign (as an alternative to dismissal).

(Signed) J. V. STEVENSON, C.C.

26th March, 1921.

Beneath these productions Thomas Johnston published the letter addressed by Councillor Rosslyn Mitchell to the Chief Constable and the Chief Constable's reply.

Rosslyn Mitchell's letter read as follows:—

THE CASE OF CONSTABLE WM. MAGILL.

As it is now three months since this man was dismissed and the criminal charge against Aldred and others has been decided, I venture to ask you to reconsider this case.

It seems to me a terrible thing that when people who are found guilty in a Law Court are sentenced to three months' imprisonment, William Magill should have inflicted upon him a life penalty, because of an alleged indiscretion on the part of his wife.

I have all along advised Magill to do nothing about his case pending the trial of Aldred and the others and now ask you to give the matter reconsideration, assuring you, that in the interval no mention has been made of the case.

I am, yours faithfully.

(Signed) E. ROSSLYN MITCHELL, Councillor.

The Chief Constable, writing on June 27, 1921, reiterated his position, and his letter need not be reproduced. Rosslyn Mitchell must have written next to the Secretary of State for Scotland. Johnston publishes the following reply:—

Scottish Office, Whitehall, S.W.1.
8th August, 1921.

Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of the 12th ultimo. forwarding a petition on behalf of Mr. William Magill regarding his dismissal from the City of Glasgow Police Force, I am directed by the Secretary for Scotland to inform you that in view of the fact that the power of dismissal of constables in that Force is vested in the Chief Constable by Section 77 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, he cannot interfere with the action which the Chief Constable of Glasgow has thought proper to take in this case.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

(Signed) JOHN LAMB.

Messrs. Rosslyn Mitchell & Tullis Cochran, Solicitors, 126 St. Vincent Street, Glasgow.

Thomas Johnston concluded this record with the following editorial comment:—

The Labour Party in Parliament should take this sort of thing in hand—officially, and at once. The local magistrates, apparently, have no power to interfere, and the Secretary for Scotland should be urged to institute the impartial inquiry into the circumstances that ex-Constable Magill has asked.

Thomas Johnston's very full exposure of this wrong done to William Magill and his concluding comment helped to put him into Parliament. He is now Secretary of State for Scotland. Why does he not institute the impartial enquiry? The main parties are alive still. Since the facts are stated so clearly and speak for themselves, why does he not right the wrong done in 1921? Actually, no enquiry is necessary. Magill should be formally reinstated. He ought to receive all arrears of pay and be granted a police pension as though he had been in the service since 1921. Why not? This would make an end of one of the echoes of our Glasgow Sedition Trial of 1921.

Robert Munro, Secretary of State for Scotland in 1921, is now Lord Alness, a member of the House of Lords. Johnston co-operates with him in war propaganda. Perhaps, having stepped into Munro's shoes by the aid of Magill, he has no time for the Glasgow Police Constable whose grievances stirred him so much for propaganda purposes in 1921. Then he wept in print. To our mind, the case reads like an anticipatory 18B case victimisation.

combs out the shop assistants of this country to the extent that he may find something serious happening some day that the community will not be pleased about. Whatever my views may be on war and peace, I am certain of one thing, that the civil life of the community has to be carried on, and I am sure that we must staff our shops in such a way that our civilian life shall proceed smoothly in war and peace alike.

CONSCRIPTION AND THE COMMUNITY

NATIONAL SERVICE CONSIDERED IN RELATION TO SHOPKEEPING AND DISTRIBUTIVE TRADES.

[The following short but excellent speech, considering the practical aspects of militarist utopianism and totalitarianism, was made by our comrade, Rhys Davies, in the House of Commons, on Wednesday, December 9, 1942. The speech maintains principles that ought never to be forgotten and advances sane, practical criticism of the evils of militarism.—Ed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, December 9, 1942.

On the Motion for the Third Reading of the National Service Bill:

Mr. RHYS DAVIES (Westhoughton): I may be allowed to say a few words on the Bill. I do not want to challenge the Bill—that is too late, of course—but to make an appeal to the hon. Gentleman and his Department, the Ministry of Labour, in respect to a large class of young persons who will be affected by the Bill but who are hardly ever mentioned in this House at all. Hon. Gentlemen have been talking of teachers, medical students and the like, and the hon. Member for Bridgeton (Mr. Maxton) told the House about skilled workers, engineers and mechanicians, but the largest single group of all affected by this Bill will be shop assistants, warehousemen and clerks. It is by far the largest single group of workers in any of the several industries of these islands. I would plead with the hon. Gentleman to be good enough to keep in touch with the Ministry of Food, because those who distribute food in this country are becoming alarmed about the staffing of their shops. These young people will have to be registered just like miners, engineers, or agricultural workers; but there is no exemption or much deferment for shop assistants, warehousemen and clerks. As one who has been connected with them for about 40 years, I think I am entitled to make that plea on their behalf.

There is one further point. From the Union to which I belong, a large number of our members have already gone into the Forces, totalling about 60,000, or 50 per cent. of all our male members. A considerable proportion have lost their lives, some have been discharged on medical grounds. We are familiar with all that, but I want to impress upon the hon. Gentleman and his Department not to accept the assumption that anybody can be a shop assistant, a warehouseman or a clerk; that any Tom, Dick or Harry can distribute foodstuffs, especially now, with all the paraphernalia of rationing to be understood. To serve behind a counter to-day in a shop is quite a skilled job, but the Ministry of Labour does not seem to realise that fact judging from the way shop assistants are being called up wholesale.

The hon. Gentleman might be good enough to watch a point I have raised before, and that is about queues at shops. People imagine that queues are the result of shortage of supplies, but that is not always the case. It is very often because the Ministry of Labour have called up all the skilled assistants from the shops; unskilled people have been brought in to replace them. We have had the position in some shops where all the men have been called up; there is hardly a male left in some shops and offices to-day. They have all been roped into the Forces. There is no exception for them at all. They are the one class of people in the community for whom there is hardly a single exemption on almost any grounds. I want to impress further on the Government that they have to understand that food is the first munition of war. It is all very well having guns, bayonets and battleships, but the distribution of food is the first essential in the life of any community. Having said that I would like the hon. Gentleman to beware lest he

RARE and REFRESHING BEVERIDGE

BY G. H. V. ROSE

[Our comrade, G. H. V. Rose, who was so active in his opposition to the last war, and co-operated with us in the old "Spur" days, is as active as ever in the cause of Socialist struggle. He contributes Socialist essays regularly to "The Hairdressers' Weekly Journal." Comrade Rose has been an indefatigable worker for anti-parliamentary Socialism in London for many years. We reproduce the essay he contributed to the "Journal" for December 12, 1942.—Ed.]

Let me make it quite clear from the start that the views expressed in this article are entirely my own. I do not know what the attitude of either the T.U.C. or the Executive of my own Trade Union is on the Beveridge Report; but what I do know of the wartime attitude of the Labour Party fills me with alarm and foreboding for the future of the common people of this country.

As in the last war, our ruling caste are promising us a veritable el Dorado when the war is over, but we know all too well what such promises amount to, and if we are foolish enough to wait for "A land fit for heroes to live in", as we did before, we shall live to discover, to our bitter cost, that one will have to be a hero to put up with it.

Anybody can see that as a result of the unproductiveness of more than half of the industrial workers of the world, and the wicked waste inevitable in war, when it is over there will be a boom in trade, it will probably prove to be the greatest boom the world has ever known. It should be equally obvious that as soon as the state of the world markets reaches saturation point we shall be faced with the worst trade depression ever as a natural reaction.

Now it seems to me that our ruling classes are banking on this trade boom to get everything nicely settled the way it was, with this difference: the liberties they have stolen from us by stealth right from the beginning of the 1914 war outbreak up to date will be still further encroached upon, and with the aid of about a quarter of a million bureaucrats they will have us all nearly tied up in red tape. Our democratic machinery, already so well sabotaged as to become a mockery, will be entirely flouted, and by the time the depression arrives we shall at long last realise we have been shepherded into fascism.

The Labour Party attitude to the pious I.L.P. resolution calling for steps to a permanent peace and social reconstruction is suspicious, to say the least. The fact that the I.L.P. have opposed the present war from the outset is beside the point. The plain fact is that suffering humanity cries out for such revolutionary change in world relations as will remove the causes of war, and such change in our social system as will do away with more than half of the nation's sickness and all of its unemployment.

Instead we are presented with the Beveridge Report, which aims at a little tinkering with the effects of industrialism. This has been heralded with a great flourish of trumpets as a wonder reform which will remove "want" from Britain. What constitutes "want" in the eyes of our rulers would be humorous if it were not so tragic, and it does not take much imagination to see that an old-age pensioner with 14s. weekly, or a couple with 25s. weekly, will be in a constant state of want, even if they paid no rent.

In his report Sir William wrote:—

"A revolutionary moment in the world's history is a time for revolutions, not for patching."

I say "Hear, hear", to that, but I insist that, if adopted, his report will constitute a tin-pot reform of what is, and would therefore be mere patching. Revolutionary change would aim at causes, not tinker with effects.

Even as a reform I frankly think little of it. The proposed benefits are mean and entirely inadequate. Moreover, with the contributory idea retained, the chance of sickness or unemployment being great in times of depression the contributions have got to be seriously high to have any hopes of covering reasonably decent benefits.

Let us examine the position. The contributions come from the worker, the employer, and the Government. Since in point of fact it is the worker who produces all, why shouldn't the whole amount come out of the Exchequer, and thus save a tremendous lot of money in administration costs. It would, in fact, save the country millions yearly if all indirect taxation was abolished and all taxes placed upon income in proportion. The present method places a very unfair proportion of taxation on the worker, for the poor devil out of work or sick must pay tax on his tea and sugar in common with the millionaire.

In common with "the halt and the blind", every citizen should have the right, if unable to work through sickness or unemployment, to full maintenance out of State funds. So also have those who are past working age. And when I say "full maintenance" I mean it. I mean nothing less than a comfortable living. And if the social system was so changed to reduce unemployment, which it should be, the cost of maintaining those unable to work would be very little. Regardless of whether it would be little or much, however, I still insist it is a citizen's right.

As William Morris did, I love beauty, and I hate ugliness. And I want all my comrades to do the same, that in our various ways individually, and by a common-sense policy collectively, we shall begin to destroy all the ugliness in the world and develop a life beautiful.

BEDFORD TRADITIONS

Our Unitarian contemporary, "The Inquirer," published an interesting article in its issue for January 23 last, from the pen of Rev. R. D. Woodall, B.A., on The Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, a pioneer centre of nonconformist and later Unitarian thought.

Mr. Woodall writes:—

The Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, is probably one of the most unique buildings associated with the denomination. It was originally part of the old Abbey of Tavistock which has now been practically all pulled down. The general opinion is that it was the Refectory but, writing in 1891 Rev. D. Alford, the vicar of Tavistock, suggested that the chapel was the Abbot's Hall.

The building first became a Dissenting Meeting House through the liberal mindedness of the Bedford family. About the middle of the seventeenth century, Lord William Russell offered to pay any minister whom the inhabitants of Tavistock might choose as clergyman. Their choice in 1647 fell upon Thomas Larkham who had been dismissed from the army during the Civil War for "observations against divers officers". Although he had the habit of describing in the pulpit leading parishioners who displeased him as "snarling curs, grunting swine, ragged rogues, squint-eyed fools, ninihammers or devils' dish clouts", he became greatly respected. A Presbyterian by convictions, Larkham naturally refused to accept the terms of the Act of Uniformity of 1662 and was accordingly ejected. Probably imprisoned for a short time and forced to earn his living as an apothecary, he nevertheless succeeded in founding a dissenting cause in Tavistock and through the influence of the Countess of Bedford was allowed to use one of the surviving portions of the old Abbey as a chapel. It is in the same building that the Unitarian offspring of the original Presbyterian congregation continues to meet.

Despite the tolerance of the Bedfords, the chief landlords in the district, the congregation had to face considerable persecution. Larkham himself was brought before the Consistory Court at Exeter as well as before other tribunals. Nevertheless when Jacob Sandercock, who held the pulpit from 1688 till 1729, came to Tavistock, he found a large group of protestant dissenters. He it was who despite the active opposition of Bishop Trelawney first founded a nonconformist school in the town. . . .

His successors who became more and more Unitarian in opinion, appear to have maintained this tradition of social service. Peter Jillard, who was minister from 1730 to 1741 for example tried to establish a Charity School in Tavistock despite the fact that most of the children's parents belonged to the Church of England. His successor, Samuel Merrivale who left Tavistock in 1760 to become one of the founders of the second Exeter nonconformist college, again was a brilliant teacher who contended that the odds between three score and three hundred pounds per annum were of no great account with respect to the real enjoyment of life. William Evans, when he came to Tavistock in 1794 promptly opened a fresh school to which were sent during the French Revolutionary wars not only the children of naval and military officers but the sons of men like Robert Aspland.

The rest of the article deals with the history of two Unitarian congregations. Enough has been quoted to establish the interest shown by the Russell family in the struggle for freedom of thought and the right of conscience against the dictatorship of church and state. The present Duke of Bedford ably and consistently upholds the tradition of his family in this matter. This fact is evidenced by the nature of his pamphleteering activity.

RICHARD CARLILE

Sherman D. Wakefield reviews our "Life of Richard Carlile in the Humanist monthly, "The Arbitrator," New York, for December, 1942. Comrade Wakefield writes:—

Richard Carlile was born on December 8, 1790, in Ashburton, Devonshire, England, and died February 10, 1843, in London. . . . in this issue a biographical pamphlet is being reviewed. This sketch, "Richard Carlile, Agitator, His Life and Times (3rd ed., Glasgow, 1941, 160 p., 1/6) is by Guy A. Aldred, Editor of "The Word," who is something of a modern Carlile.

Richard Carlile is known chiefly for his efforts in behalf of the liberation of the English press, for which he suffered more than any other Englishman of the nineteenth century. Beginning in 1817 by reprinting William Hone's parodies, for which he was given eighteen week's imprisonment, he was to spend a quarter of his mature life in prison. In 1819 he published the books of two American authors, Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" and Elihu Palmer's "Principles of Nature." He was arrested on the charge of blasphemy and sedition and stood trial before several courts. He was decreed "guilty" by the various juries on the theory that "Christianity is parcel of the laws of England, and, therefore, to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law." Carlile conducted his own defense because he could trust no lawyer to take his part, and since he would not retract any of his convictions he was sentenced to imprisonment for three years and fined £500. As he was not able to pay any fines and continued his writing while in prison and publishing when released, he spent more than nine years in prison. In the end, however, he won his cause and the cause of all libertarians.

This pamphlet is the most complete account of Carlile's life now in print, and is illustrated by a partrait and rare contemporary prints. It is to be regretted, however, that no mention is made of Carlile's pamphlet "Every Woman's Book" (London 1826), which was the first tract in the English language devoted exclusively to the medical as well as to the social and economic aspects of contraception. Through its influence upon Robert Dale Owen it affected considerably the founding of the American birth-control movement.

"Every Woman's Book" is reprinted in Carlile's "Jail Journal."

Reviewing this work, "The Literary Guide," London, for February, says:—

JAIL JOURNAL AND OTHER WRITINGS. By Richard Carlile. Edinted and arranged by Guy A. Aldred. . . . 91 pp.; 2s., by post 2s. 3d.

February 10 is the date of the centenary of Richard Carlile's death, and it is appropriate that this collection of some of his writings should be published. It should have a large circulation.

RICHARD LEE ACTIVE.

Our comrade, the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., addressed a good meeting of the Brighton P.P.U., Thursday, February 18th last on "Is a Negotiated Peace Practical Politics?"

It was a live meeting and there were many searching questions. The speaker dealt very plainly with the following problems:—

"Can Victory and a Dictated Treaty Ever Bring Peace?"

"Would it be possible to negotiate a decent peace with Hitler?"

"Can we hope to keep down our enemies for ever or to educate them if we get our feet on their neck?"

"Would an armistice involve the immediate laying down of arms?"

A letter from Winston Churchill to Mr. Lee after the last war, which foretold a peaceful Europe for generations after our victory of 1918, was heard with very great interest.

Such meetings are calculated to give a definite objective to the Peace Groups and comrade Lee is willing to speak wherever he can on this theme.

18B DETENTIONS

The present Home Secretary, Herbert Morrison, was a conscientious objector during the last war. He obtained conditional exemption and worked in an orchard. To-day, over military age, he occupies a high position in the state, delivers speeches of fiery destruction against the Nazis, and is responsible for the internment of people who served in the last war against the Germans. If the Home Secretary's present arguments are correct, he owes his present position to the courage and suffering of the people who are or have been detained under 18B. To our mind the position does not make sense.

The present Secretary of State for Scotland, Thomas Johnston, rendered no war service and throughout the war urged some kind of Socialist AntiMilitarism in his paper. He is a party to the 18B internments and also breathes fire and slaughter against the Germans.

In Glasgow, we have Sir Patrick Dollan, a conchie of the last war, doing the same kind of thing, and identifying himself with warmongering.

We were opposed to the last war and we are opposed to this war because we are opposed to all war. The men we have mentioned were not heroes as conchies, to our mind, for they avoided all severe punishment. They made no absolutist stand. To-day they urge war but do not suffer in it, merely command and direct. Is there not something wrong here? Can even the Tory Imperialists who associate with these ex-conchies, now pro-war politicians, deny that there is something wrong? These ex-conchies threaten the conchies of to-day who are following in their footsteps, and prate of all the good things that are going to be done for the ex-servicemen when the war is over. They would have us all wear different degrees of ribbons so that we might be taped for all time. Is this just? Who shall say that, when the war is over, unless we demand the re-establishment of our civil rights, our right of charge and public trial, present service men may not be interned, their war-services forgotten?

Below is a list of ex-service men who have been detained under 18B. Many, perhaps most, have been released. Some may be interned still. It is difficult collecting details. If there are inaccuracies in the list we will correct them, for our aim is accuracy. Even if released, many of these ex-service men were interned for a long time. Remember, some of them had their pictures published in the very papers that will not give them a hearing to-day. Some of them were photographed when they went to the Palace to receive their decorations.

And now——!

We are a conchie. We are opposed to war. We have no sympathy with militarism. But we feel for soldiers. We understand their reactions. We sense their sufferings. And we believe that the taking of political office in war time of ex-conchies and the internment without charge or trial of ex-service men is a grave political wrong. Since no one else will say so, we feel that it is our duty to speak plainly. The situation is wrong.

NOT FIT TO RUN CATS' HOME

M.P.s ATTACKED AT OXFORD BY DUKE OF BEDFORD

The Duke of Bedford addressed a meeting in the Friends Meeting House, Cambridge, on Wednesday, January 27 last. He spoke in Town Hall, Oxford, on Monday, February 1.

CAMBRIDGE MEETING.

Dr. Alexander Woods presided over the Cambridge meeting. This meeting was reported in the "Cambridge Daily News."

Dealing with the question of peace negotiations, the Duke said that two main conditions should be observed in any negotiations, namely that every nation should recognise the duty of treating other nations in the way they themselves would like to be treated were they in the position of the other nations, and a fair share of the world's economic resources should be assured according to the number and needs of a people.

The chance of a country starting a war depended on the possession of arms, the possession of a grievance and the possibility of statesmen being able to convince their people that the grievance was so serious that it was the people's duty to risk their lives in righting it. He was convinced that no dictator could ever start a war merely in pursuit of his personal ambition if there was no grievance to take hold of as a means of gaining the support of his countrymen.

The Duke developed his argument along the lines of the essays that have been published from his pen in our columns.

OXFORD ADDRESS

At Oxford he spoke in similar terms and then developed his views of post-war reconstruction. His speech was reported in the "Oxford Mail."

The Duke made an attack on Members of Parliament. In his opinion, he said, about 300 of them were "not fit to run a cats' home, let alone a country."

As between the planners and the individualists he preferred the individualists.

"We need more wise and really honest men," he said. "We need more character power, and the only really effective means of gaining more character power is by true Christianity."

There was also a need in those who led the nation for a better and wiser understanding of human nature. Another essential was a finer type of politician.

He said that a government should order and direct as little as possible, but it could perform a valuable service in an advisory capacity. He also advocated the reform of the monetary and economic system.

THE VICTORY OF FASCISM

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Fascism is winning fast. I do not mean on the battlefield, for there the issue of the war still appears to be doubtful; nor do I mean that there is any strking increase in the membership of any political party bearing a Fascist name. The victory of Fascism is more widespread and more sinister, for Fascism, using the term in the bad sense in which it is commonly employed in this country, is becoming more and more apparent in the hearts and minds of many men of various schools of political thought—just as the opponents of war have always foreseen and foretold that it would.

In the Administration, Fascism is already firmly established. We have the ugly, lawless tyranny of Regulation 18B, which renders any citizen liable to imprisonment without trial, for an indefinite period, at the mere whim of the Home Secretary, who has only to plead the requirements of national safety to evade any question asked in either of the Houses of Parliament. We have the persecution, by fines and imprisonment, of large numbers of conscientious objectors of both sexes whom the feeble and inadequate machinery designed to secure for them a measure of justice, has, in actual operation, failed to protect. We have military conscription, industrial conscription, and requisition orders galore. We have the regimentation of everybody and everything, together with an unofficial, as well as an official, censorship. Police threats and warnings are issued to private citizens with reference, not only to what they say or write, but even with reference to the people with whom they associate. Too frank criticism of the Government in public places may result in a sentence of imprisonment, and when open action is felt by the State to be inadvisable, indirect and underhand methods are resorted to for the further suppression of freedom of speech or writing.

It is also becoming apparent that State tyranny is not to be confined to the period of the war. Politicians both of the Left and of the Right are beginning to speak quite openly of the need for continuing, in post-war days, not only the worst of all forms of Government tyranny — military conscription — but even some kinds of industrial conscription as well. An immense amount of bureaucratic interference, in the interests of so-called "Planning", is also in contemplation.

Proposals of this kind seem to evoke comparatively little protest, showing that the mass of the people are being most effectively broken-in to a Fascist régime and are losing even the strong desire to break their chains.

It is not, however, only in the Government that Fascist tendencies are appearing ever more plainly. An increasing horde of persons with the typical tyrant mind clamour for the arrest and imprisonment of all who differ from them on political or even on strategic issues, and demand the suppression of their writings, often applying the abusive epithet "Fascist" to those who have never had the remotest sympathy for, or connection with, Fascism, and are in reality far less Fascist in outlook than themselves.

Communists figure somewhat prominently in this unpleasant company of pots calling the Fascist kettle black. I have no quarrel with Communism as such; its doctrines are as much entitled to a fair hearing and to careful examination as those of any other political movement, and a friend whose judgement I trust tells me that she has seen at a Communist gathering young men and women of a really fine type.

I do, however, condemn many Communists for their weathercock warmongering. Of what value are professions of belief in the Brotherhood of the Workers, if these same workers are to be slaughtered in war the moment they are persuaded, or compelled, to change their political outlook? Such a policy shows a devotion, not to humanity, or to any section of humanity, but to the barren orrthodoxy of a political creed which sets itself above human lives and human feelings, just as Fascism subordinates the individual to the State.

I have also no hesitation in saying that the decent element in the Communist movement would do well to exercise more control over their less scrupulous fellows, and especially over their Press. Spite, rancour, exaggeration and falsehood are weapons which may replace one tyranny by another, but certainly will never usher in Utopia: neither will the slogan "Keep the rats behind prison bars", uttered in reference to political rivals, restore Freedom to her throne from which she has been driven by war.

By all means let Communists attend the public meetings of other organizations and put fair questions, as searching as they can make them, to show up any weaknesses they may believe to exist; but a settled policy to smash and wreck every other reform group or political party, regardless of its intrinsic merit, just because it does not happen to be Communism, shows a mean and jealous spirit. When so much dirty fighting, physical and mental, is going on around us, the reform movements, at any rate, might fight clean and observe the essential virtue of consistency. If they claim to be haters of tyranny, let them remember that any tyrant can be lenient to those who think as he does, and that the acid test of a love of liberty is the freedom which you are prepared to grant even to those with whom you differ most strongly. Once you decide to muzzle your opponents even in what you suppose to be the public interest, you are already half-way down the slippery slope of Fascist totalitarianism.

One of the saddest and most disturbing features of this war, is the increasing callousness displayed by British people towards acts of injustice and cruelty perpetrated by their own Government. Even when these acts are pointed out to them, they often consider "Think how much worse things are in Germany!" to be a sufficient answer. Would they, I wonder, accept from Hitler, as an adequate defence of concentration camps and the liquidation of political rivals, the exhortation "Think how much worse things have been in Russia!"?

CHARLES RODEN BUXTON

The "over forties" in the Bradford I.L.P. will well recall one of our best-loved though least rhetorical week-end speakers at the Morley Street meetings; Charles Roden Buxton. He found his way into the I.L.P. during the last war, and he passed what we considered to be a high test of the sincerity of a convert of his kind and tradition—he would take on street-corner meetings, three or four a day, doing the real spade-wark of international socialism. Here is Arthur Ponsonby's account of him. (Peace News, 15th January, 1943):—

"Only those who knew Charles Roden Buxton personally can fully appreciate what his loss means. Some of the causes he supported so generously and indefatigably were traditional in the family, such as the welfare of native races. But it was not causes, or even his political work, which stood out and attracted me to him during the many years I knew him. It was his character and personality and the way he accepted defeat and disappointment without a trace of animosity or resentment.

"He had such fair judgment; he was so ready to help and to listen; never inclined to push himself forward; even prepared to take on the most difficult job; never expecting praise or credit; and pursuing his course at so lofty a level that those who could not reach him were bound to admire a disinterested figure from whese noble countenance the light of spiritual evidence so clearly shone. In the turmil of a political life of seme forty years, for me Charlie Buxton will always stand out as a model."

Dear Sirs,

We have been consulted by Councillor John S. Clark with reference to an article appearing on Page 81 of your publication of February, 1943. The portion of the article complained of is the paragraph commencing with the last sentence on Column 1 of said page.

We would point out to you that there are two "John S. Clark's" who are members of the Corporation. You eliminated Mr. John Clark of Maryhill and referred to our Client who is Mr. Clark of Govanhill. The paragraph is completely inaccurate in respect that our Client is not a Police Judge. It is also inaccurate in respect that he never attended the meeting referred to or addressed the Court at the time. Our Client takes very strong exception to the phrase that the I.L.P. boosted his as a "Socialist."

Our Client is a public man who is very sincere in his Socialist views and he very greatly resents the innuendo contained in the article. We are instructed to apply to you to make a complete withdrawal of the article in question in your next issue and to submit a draft for approval on behalf of our Client.

Without prejudice,
We are,
Yours faithfully,
LINDSAY ORR, MacCALMAN.

HTM/LE/C.Mis.

We have replied to this communication stating that, of course, we withdraw the statement that John S. Clark of Govanhill is a police-judge, since it is untrue. Any criticism based on the assumption that he was a police judge, falls to the ground. To our mind there is no need to make further reparation and we are not prepared to publish any such statement, or to submit any such draft, as that requested by Messrs. Lindsay Orr, MacCalman & Co.

Whether Mr. John S. Clark is a Socialist or not is a matter of opinion and subject for discussion. This question stands entirely apart from the police-judge issue, in which, of course, we were in error. We are glad to acknowledge our error because we object to Socialists functioning as police judges.

Mr. John S. Clark, if he objected to our comments, should have written direct to us and not have written through lawyers. To our mind, this method of correction is very strange Socialist conduct indeed, when criticised, rightly or wrongly, in an organ of the Socialist Movement.

We concluded that the John S. Clark, was the one mentioned in the newspaper from which we culled the report, because John S. Clarke, formerly M.P., spells his name differently. As a matter of fact, Councillor John S. Clarke, ex-M.P., has written us a long letter, in which he refers to our error as follows:—

By the way, there is a mistake in the current "Word." "Police Court Musings"—John S. Clark, I.L.P. man, is not a Police Judge and never was. There must be a third J. S. C. in the city.

As we go to press we are endeavouring to discover the truth of the matter.

CHRIST AS WELL HAD NE'ER BEEN BORN.

Still two classes, rich and poor,
Those who prosper, those who endure,
Those who sweat, and moan, and toil,
Those who fatten on the spoil.

Still two classes, those who reign,
Those who slave, and starve in pain,
Those who cringe, and those who scorn—
Christ as well had ne'er been born.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Guy Aldred,—I should like to take this opportunity of thanking you for "The Word." Although I am no Pacifist, I marvel at the courage and fearlessness and high principles of the Duke of Bedford and yourself. Would to God we had more Bedfords in the Lords.

To my mind our present leaders seem to overlook (or indeed have overlooked) the old and obviously true maxim, prevention is better than cure. The youth of our country are now paying the price for the follies of pre-war capitalist policy.

The friends of Fascism are not to be found in the ranks of the working people. The very men who are to-day clamouring for retribution against the German people are those who a few short years ago tumbled over themselves to whitewash Hitler's crimes. Even the most misguided and ignorant amongst us cannot fail to see the rottenness and corruption of our present political set up.

I am solidly opposed to Hitler's Fascism but I am equally opposed to the secret friends of Fascism, whoever and wherever they are.

Yours Fraternally,
WILFRED H. HARBIGE.

Manchester 11.

Dear Friends,—While I was in prison the September issue of "The Word" was published and a friend of mine saved it to show me that I am not the only Cole, as you published an account of the news of C. H. Cole.

I note that he is an ex-service man; so am I. Also, that he, like myself, has a purpose in life. Although we may move in different circles the objective is the same. I ask you to convey to him my best wishes, that is from one Cole to another, although there is nothing in a name other than what a name stands for.

I have been to prison twice and met fellows whom I would not have met by normal events; yes, even fellows who thought that their way to the Ideal was the only way. I did not expect to find many in agreement with me but we all found that one helps another best by work in the circles in which he individually moves, since the circles overlap one another. It may surprise some people to know that I found friends among J.Ws, although their direction is different to mine. We all have an urge and we each express that urge through the channel of words peculiar to the faction through which our own guidance comes.

I met many fellows who believe in one language over the World. So do I, but my belief of what shall be the base is entirely different to any I have met and yet I still believe that base is better than the introduction of a new language, which will also mean another alphabet which unhappily means two different alphabets in each country all over the world.

What grieves me most, and has done for the last twenty years, is that although countries can agree to hear one anothers expression of music through an agreed piano, so that who ever may be playing it he can express exactly the same sounds as another by way of the piano, but when speaking he is not only another person but looked upon by the majority as coming from a different world.

I believe that each language should have one sound per letter and one sound only. This would mean a phonetic alphabet and a larger alphabet, but this larger alphabet would cover many of another country. Let us all place upon the key of the "piano" our incription for that sound. I agree that each key would be a very long one to hold all the incriptions of all countries for that one sound, but it can be agreed so as to shorten the key, that that sound equals (?) inscription. I may be wrong, but I find within this language, that we express nice things and comments of nice values in a soft tone, and hard values, such as the word "hard" by hard expression, and set out opposite expressions of the letter K—one—too kind; and its opposite value, To Kill.

I think this is enough for now.

Best Wishes to all
ARTHUR L. COLE.

Wanstead, London, E.12.

Dear Comrade, I strongly urge increasing the price of the journal as a means of liquidating the debt. I am sure every reader would be glad to help in this way as (in my own case) many are unable to send a decent sum.

Yours fraternally,
J. T. KENNY.

Liverpool 4, 11/1/43.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—A guid new year to you and yours and I trust that the "upholder" of the planets ("someone" must be holding them up,) will spare and strengthen you for many more years yet to open the eyes of the blind.

I remember meeting you in Hyde Park many years ago and I recollect how much you impressed me with your tolerance towards my Christian viewpoint. I wish more "Christians" were as kind as you!

All the best.

Sincerely yours,
J. DUNCAN.

Romsey, January 8, 1943.

Dear Sirs,—I have to-day received by post and have been enjoying a quiet read of "The Word." My wife and I appreciate and enjoy the splendid articles written with such commonsense.

Wishing you every success.

I remain, yours fraternally,
P. J. BATES.
(A Welling, Kent, war resister.)

Welling, Kent, January 9.

Dear Comrade,—Regarding your recent appeal for subscriptions to raise £1,500. You mention if it cannot be raised, the necessity of increasing price of "The Word." I think a lot of us would gladly pay a shilling a copy. I'm bothered for money myself and it bothers me to see an effort like yours hampered for lack of it. The time and money I've wasted on the Labour Party! It's on my mind to help you! I'll have to try and be true to the frame of mind I'm in and study how to help.

Fraternally,
ISAAC W. BRAITHWAITE.

Dalton, Yorks, January5, 1943.

Dear Comrade Aldred, — Thanks very much for continuing to send my "The Word." The current issue is splendid, particularly the cartoon from "The Spur." Most of my back numbers I am passing on to a friend in Bermondsey, and hope to get him and others interested in your fine publications.

Yours fraternally,
ROBERT CHAPMAN.

Walworth, S.E.17, January 6, 1943.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I sincerely appreciate the way you uphold Pacifism, and the help you give to the CO.s. Your paper is a great comfort in these days I admire your exposing of the evils of war.

I look upon all war as evil, and when one reads of the terrible calamaties that come of war, I realize that instead of it being a way to obtain justice, peace and freedom (as so many believe) it creates a Hell that no man who is a true believer in our Dear Saviour and the teachings of the Gospel would partake of. It beholds us to remember that one day we shall all have to give an account of the deeds done in the mortal life. Resorting to war never has and never will remove existing evils. It only adds fuel to the already consuming fire. As soon as man uses force he employs the same evil as he is out to destroy.

The teaching of the Gospel condems the use of force (the carnal weapon). Did not Jesus rebuke His disciple for using it? He brought the Law of Love, not of force, and if we profess to be His followers we are under that Law. The word distinctly teaches us to leave that which is evil alone; and war, strife, or turmoil is evil. Peace will only be established by obedience to the Word of God.

I enjoy reading the "letters." The one by Mr. E. S. Danes, of Birmingham, is a great article. What he says re. the Church is perfectly true. Does it not say in scripture that abomination and desolation should stand in the place where it ought not. Isn't the Churchto-day steeped in Militarism?

Yours faithfully,
W. H. BAGULEY.

East Kirkby, Notts.

Dear Comrade,—It seemed to be a very happy idea to devote a little space in the November issue to the Editor's reminiscences. You refer to your challenging attitude. I wonder if it is not your fearless advocacy of integrity in politics, and your humane outlook on every question which arises, which has helped you in many Causes! Perhaps these build up the challenging attitude, but it seems to me that these come first, and have given the challenge something to stand upon! It would be very interesting to know more of your grandfather's rather wonderful outlook, if you could devote some space either in "The Word" or in a pamphlet. His penetration into the intricacies of Truth, and his tolerance and wisdom regarding the guiding of youth in these matters seems to me extraordinary.

The article by C. H. Norman is wonderfully instructive, and that by Rev. R. H. Le Messurier is better than "Punch" in my opinion, good though "Punch" is as a rule. I feel very much indebted for its inclusion in this number, for it just seems to be the ingredient that shows up the other articles artistically. You have something of everything which makes the reading such a tonic as well as a duty and privilege. I wonder if it is worth while recording an incident brought to mind by the letter of Sorabji. Having no political, only missionary interest, in India, my sister and brother-in-law, perhaps because at the place of landing, entertained Mr. Paul of the Round Table Conference some years ago. As he was being shown his room, the best, because he was an Indian and stranger (it was in a wing) he said with a gentle smile to them, "It is very far away from the rest of the house." The relations, as I saw from writing on a presentation book to them had been most cordial, but the sentiveness of the subject race, etc., etc., came at once to view, showing perhaps too, a little of the difficulties of the British, because of mistakes in the past, and still not remedied.

With best wishes.

Yours sincerely,
AGNES W. MACKAY.

Liverpool.

My Dear Friend,—I passed a recent number of "The Word" on to a schoolmaster. He had never heard of "The Word" before. He has since told me he was delighted with it. Thanking you for your efforts for peace, and hoping you will continue to have the courage to write such splendid articles. I remain, with all kind thoughts,

Yours sincerely,
(Mrs.) DOROTHY HOBSON.

Stockport.

Dear Sir,—I herewith enclose subscription for "The Word", as I would like to obtain it regularly. I also would like to congratulate you on your outspoken views on war.

As David Jordan once said, "To-day is your day and mine, the only day we have, the day in which we play our part."

What our part may signify in the great whole we may not understand, but we are here to play it, and now is our time. This we know. It is a part of action not whining. It is a part of love not cynicism. It is for us to express love in terms of human helpfulness. This we know for we have learned from sad experience that any other source leads towards decay and waste.

With best wishes.

Yours truly,
M. ROBERTSON.

Cowdenbeath.

Dear Sir, — I wish you every success in your endeavour to put down this awful murder and destruction campaign now being enacted throughout almost the whole of the world. When we realize how wonderful God in His mercy, through nature, has so wonderfully provided abundance, enough and to spare, for both man and beasts, and but for greed, malice and hatred there is no need for any war, of any description. What fools the leaders of the governments are, and also what fools the people are to be led by them! The question is, will ever men learn more sense?

I only wish I could place one of the copies of "The Word" in the hands of every working man, and also every one of the Government, and get them to sit down and carefully study its contents.

However, as I go in and out among the people, and I come into contact with a good many, I find that they are beginning to think for themselves. They are getting tired of the clap-trap that is being doled out by the politicians, the papers and the B.B.C. and are beginning to heartily wish the war would end, in the only sensible way it can end. By conciliation and negotiation.

Yours faithfully,
H. GOOD.

Nuneaton.

Dear Sir,—I wish to express my thanks for the specimen copies of "The Word." I am very pleased at the daring in those days of stress.

I also am very pleased to make contact, through "The Word", with the Duke of Bedford, especially his writings on money. I have been interested in him for a long time. Of course the Editor is also outstanding.

(Councillor) DIL THOMAS.

Briton Ferry.

Dear Mr. Aldred, — Thank you so much for the wonderful parcel.

Someone appears to have been selling "The Word" outside the Caxton Hall. John Jenkins of Glasgow writes to "Tribune" this week, also the barrister Phelps and L. A. Wheeler rightfully annoyed by remarks in last week's "Tribune" which insinuate that Pacifists are Fascists or/and Fascists Pacifists. The original article was by L. Bern.

I have sold "The Word" and also the Geese outside Hyde Park this afternoon. Two men, the brothers Kay, asked after you, also an enthusiastic Scotchman, who had heard you speak at Edinburgh. It is very nice when people come and talk. Quite a number had already seen the Geese pamphlet.

Yours in the struggle,
CLARE ANNESLEY.

London, W.C.1., January 23.

Dear Guy Aldred,—During last summer, when I lived with my wife's people at Boston, Lincs., I was very interested in your excellent paper "The Word." Whilst on a short visit to them a fortnight ago, I did little else but read the bound copy of "The Word" which you sent to my mother-in-law, Mrs. M. Howard.

The least I can do is to let you know how much I enjoy reading this truly inspiring volume and what a pleasure and source of inspiration it is to me.

I was in the Civil Service before the war, but left because of my objection to helping the war effort. My wife and I are now working on the land "for the duration" at any rate!

My wife and I wish you the best of health to continue the struggle against war and its inevitable consequences, and we look forward to the monthly appearance of your paper with great interest and enjoyment. Best wishes and warmest regards.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT BENTLY.

Newark, January 26.

My Dear Aldred, — Amid the mass of printed material which pours in from all sides these days, I really look forward to "The Word" and read it with real interest from cover to cover. I believe it is the best paper published in this country to-day—not even excepting our own!

Wishing you every success, believe me, yours very truly,

GORDON STOTT.

Monifieth, Angus.

Dear Guy,—I must thank you for and congratulate you on, the continued fearless opposition to the war which you maintain, and your refusal to prostitute your ideals and beliefs. I buy no other paper but "The Word" because I think it the paper most worth supporting.

Best wishes and all support in the struggle.

Yours fraternally,

E. V. WILLIAMS.

Rugby, January 24, 1943.

To Comrade Aldred,—Please accept 2/6 donation for "The Word." Wish it was more, but I am not a war worker.

Yours sincerely,

COLIN TURNER.

Glasgow.

Dear Guy Aldred,—My brother J. H. Charles of Stoke-on-Trent introduced me to your paper and paid last year's subscription fee for me. I found the monthly issues so uniformly good that I am most anxious to keep on receiving them, for they are fountains of strength to those who try to preach and practise Socialism-without-War.

Best wishes.

Yours fraternally,

H. R. CHARLES.

Beaconsfield, Bucks.

TO THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

Dear Sir,—I do not know whether this is the proper way to address a duke, but I think we have much in common. Your only trouble is, that you have not been on my side of the fence. I am a miner and have, therefore, experienced all the trials the miner has had to undergo since the last war. I have had and still have, in most cases a lively contempt for what are commonly known as my "betters." I think we are looking for the same thing, i.e., honesty of purpose and fair play for everyone. Frankly having studied closely the average British workman I think we are on a "dead horse."

You cannot build a new house with rotten materials. The working class of this country, like their "betters", think money is the beginning and end of everything.

I may say that, for Mr. Morrison, and my or all other Government "yes men", I have a feeling of disgust. They have allowed themselves to be beaten by our rotten economic system. When I hear of these people shouting about "right" I have to laugh. They haven't the "guts" to fight for their own rights let alone for others.

If you or any other man can alter our system you can rest assured that, at least, one British workman is going to back you to the limit.

Respectfully yours,

F. W. READ.

THE BIBLE

Dear Mr. Aldred,

It is pleasing to find you open-minded enough to publish the statements of the Reverend R. H. Le Messurier in regard to those important writings which we persist in miscalling "The Bible." Whether a man is a "Christian", or not, it is important to him that there should be in the English language, a pure Version of these Scriptures, simply because they are used for propaganda purposes of various kinds, and this propaganda always finds a response. Especially is this the case amongst those who are called "Pietists" . . . good-hearted souls, whose minds are, so often, ill-informed. We suffer from widespread sanctimonious complacency and stark superstition! As an instance of the latter, I would refer to the widespread misuse of the three Occasional Services—Baptism, Marriage, and Burial. The misuse of the first is, probably, due to the inescapable implications of the rubric at the end of the "Publick Baptism of Infants." Infants who are baptized before committing actual sin are said to be "undoubtedly saved." What of the millions, all over the World, who die unbaptized? The Theology is monstrous! And the passage Mark X, beginning at verse 13, is deliberately mistranslated, in support of such Theology. Yet it can be found that a "Reader's Guide" to the "New Testament" (another objectionable term) dismisses the passage as needing no comment! The children blessed by Jesus were not Infants! He was distressed: Not displeased. And he did not say that no one could enter the Kingdom of God except as a child, but "like" a child. Most of those who bring Infants to baptism do not join in the worship of God; they have no intention of doing so; nor do they mean to keep the vows they so lightly make. Similarly, with the Marriage Service. The Burial Service has no spiritual meaning for most who attend it. And, like the other Services, it needs drastic revision—beyond that of the 1928 Book!

I see that a Captain Acworth "proves" that the Social Security Section of the Beveridge Report is "The Beast" of "Revelation." The three letters S (initials) represent three figures 6. And 666 is the "Mark of the Beast." But it has, in the past, been proved (!) that the Pope is the beast, that Charlemange was the Beast, that Lenin was the Beast, that Mussolini is the Beast, that Stalin is the Beast, and that Hitler is the Beast. And it will be proved that Winston Churchill is the Beast, and that Rooseveldt is the Beast. What a waste of time and ingenuity!

Why this recurring nonsense?

Because the King James I. Version of the Holy Scriptures is a dishonest Version.

Anyone who possesses a copy of the Holy Scriptures of the Jews will see that (as our own Theological students have been taught for many years), these writings are divided into three groups—The Law, the Prophets, the Writings. "Daniel" is in the third class, with Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Chronicles, etc.

"Daniel" is not one of "The Prophets." A prophet was not a foreteller: He was a forth-teller. Often, in his farsight, he saw what must transpire, eventually. He saw that God must become known better and that Truth must prevail. But he saw an Age, rather than an individual. The King James I. Version (the "Authorised Version") deliberately takes "Daniel" from its place amongst "The Writings" and sandwiches it between the Three Greater and the Twelve Lesser Prophets! This is utterly dishonest. It has led to simple and to cunning folk going to "Daniel", as they go to Old Moore's Almanack—for fore-tellings of events of their own time. But "Daniel" like "Revelation" is not fore-telling of a distant future. Both are apocalyptic. They were "Tracts for the Times, especially for Bad Times." It was not until 250 A.D. (roughly) that "Revelation" was generally accepted by "The Church" and included in its List of Sacred Writings—writings useful for instruction and discipline, and helpful in the search for God.

In the New Testament quotations from the Old Testament are from the Septuagint (Greek) Version —not from the Hebrew. These passages are, in almost every case, twisted, in order to prove a literal fulfilment, Thus the real, spiritual filling out of the Past by Jesus is lost in the attempt to prove a petty and magical fulfilment..

Matthew has one in chapter I. and two twisted passages in chapter II.

We must press and press and press until we get a single pure Version of these wonderful and useful writings in our language. People can not afford to purchase The Concordant Version, Torrey, Ferrar Fenton, Weymouth, The Twentieth Century New Testament, The Book of Books, McFadyen, Moffatt and other translations, and compare them with the Authorised Version of 1611 (made before ane of the Uncials were available) and the Revised Version of 1880-1881.

Dr. Kilgour, Editorial Superintendent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, admitted to me, years ago, that the Society had long seen the need for a revised Authorised Version; but that, owing to the Society being interdenominational, it could not get going. That was when the Society was printing for me my translation of St. John into the Makuchi Indian language of British Guiana. Makuchi (Guiana) and Mawken (Burma) were two unwritten languages which I committed to writing; in which I translated Gospel accounts. Hence my intensive studies, ever since.

Yours faithfully,

W. GRAINGE WHITE.

BOOK REVIEW

"INSIDE THE LEFT."

Fenner Brockway has written his reminiscences of 30 years' struggle for international socialism ("Inside the Left", Allen and Unwin, 15s.). The story of the socialist movement in these years is a pitiful tale of change and decay, and after a life's work in the movement Brockway has little left but his faith in the socialist ideal. Brockway has above all else integrity as a socialist, and this integrity is the measure of his failure as a politician. The great tragedy of the Left has been that its leaders were (and are) careerists rather than socialists, MacDonalds, Snowdens and Allens rather than Brockways, Brailsfords and Jowetts in the I.L.P. alone. "Inside the Left" points many morals; but none more urgently than this:—because socialism embodies the aspirations of the dispossesed of the world, those who serve it must put away their own interests; private ambition is a capitalist ethic, and to carry it into socialism is to destroy the essence of the ideal.

In his references to Parliamentary life during the term of the Second Labour Government, Brockway shows how easy it is for the "Left" politician to succumb to constitutional comforts. He writes:—

"More and more (Labour) members settled down to a life of inertia. They descended after question time to one of the lounges and smoked, gossiped, drank, according to their tastes, or slept until the division bell rang. Then they would make their way upstairs, enquire of the Whip at the entrance to the division lobbies which was the Government side, and often enquire whilst voting what the division was about. Automatic machines would have filled the part just as efficiently.

"The inevitable deterioration of their existence was obtained. The Houses of Parliament are classed as a Royal Palace and accordingly there are no licensed hours; drink can be had all day and night. I do not wish to exaggerate the drunkenness which occurred at the House, but it was rare during my period in Parliament for one or more members not to be intoxicated after nine o'clock at night; the temper of the debates always rose after this hour and unseemly interruptions were common. One Member had the habit when he drank too much of maintaining an unceasing "hear, hear" like a small machine-gun. There was one occasion when the Cabinet Minister responsible for winding up a debate on Unemployment could stand only with difficulty."

Power corrupts, and so does this kind of lazy privilege which so many Labour and Trade Union leaders have gotten themselves. That is one lesson that Brockway's readers will learn. They will learn something else that the author only half reveals. They will learn that there will be no socialism until socialists can think clearly and act corporately. The disintegration of the I.L.P. is due to its equivocal foundations; its teaching has always been a bastard progeny of moral intuitionism and materialist determinism, of humanitarian reformism and Marxist revolutionism, of libertarianism and etatisme. This muddle-headed discord is apparent in Brockway's own personality, and although he achieves some kind of reintegration towards the end of his story, the inherent contradictions of his general principles remain. His 1941 Lancaster by-election address, not included in this book, was a model of the irrelevant and the illogical, and, on fundamental issues, was evasive to the point of being deceptive. Remembering that, I cannot rate Brockway's contribution to socialist thought very high. But I believe him to have been sincere, steadfast, and honourable to a degree. Of how few eminent men "inside the Left" can one say this!

CHRISTIAN PACIFISM

WHAT IT MEANS TO ME

By Pastor J. RIGBY
(Stour Valley Mission, Blandford, Dorset)

To me, Christian Pacifism is the description of a way of life; it describes a way of thinking, feeling and doing. "Christian" because it is influenced by the living Christ; "Pacifism" because it describes a reaction to the fact of war which is different from that of other Christians (who, for sake of a name, have called themselves "Non-pacifists").

Christian Pacifism is a way of Christian living which becomes more distinct from the rest of Christian living, under the challenge of war, but, of course, it is a way of thinking, feeling and doing during a cessation of war as well as during a resumption of war,—a way of living all the day and every day as well as on those occasions when the challenge of war becomes more direct (e.g., when one's country is actively engaged in war, when one is conscripted for war service, or when the issue of war in any way enters into the relationship of life).

Now the ways in which a Christian Pacifist will think, act and feel under the challenge of war are partly conditioned by the nature of the challenge presented by war; that is by the outward circumstances. To describe Christian Pacifism, one could take a series of situations, each containing some challenge of war, describe how a Christian Pacifist would react in those circumstances, and then say: "That is Christian Pacifism." Or one might recall incidents in one's own life, or that of another person, and say: "That happened because I was a Christian Pacifist", or "because he or she was a Christian Pacifist."

But while, as a result, it might be quite clear how a Christian Pacifist would think or feel or act under selected circumstances, one might still be mystified as to why he or she did so.

It would be as well, therefore, to look behind the observable facts and ask: "What are some of the causes for this activity which, under the challenge of war, is defined as Christian Pacifism?" Let us attempt to understand the psychology of Christian Pacifism.

In the first place, it is a way of life resulting from contact with the living Christ. It is a unique direction and quality given to human thought, feeling and action derived from a deepening fellowship with the Christ of to-day—whether that fellowship be recognized as such, or not.

We instinctively copy the activities of those whom we love, and a Christian Pacifist acts in the way he does because he loves the living Christ, — because to him, Christ is the most wonderful person in all the world and the greatest in all history,—and because, as he absorbs into his own being the outlook, the spirit, the unnamed principles of living possessed by his living Lord, he can do no other than act as he does.

At this point our inquiry can divide into two channels. First, let us ask the Christian Pacifist: "Why do you love Christ?", and then go on to ask "Who then is this Christ?"

In answer to the first question, "Why do you love Christ?" we come immediately to one of the fundamentals of Christian Pacifism: "We love Him because He first loved us."

We cannot compel ourselves to love. Love is a response of the whole heart to someone who is lovable.

Now the living Christ is lovable for one or both of two reasons:

(1) Because His life is lovely, true and of good report. He fulfils in practical living our ideals of beauty, truth and goodness. That in itself would cause us to absorb into our own way of life some of His attitudes and methods of action. But that love could better be described as "admiration." We accept His outlook and way of life because we admire Him.

But when Paul says: "The love of Christ constraineth us", he means more than "The admiration of Christ constraineth us."

For we must remember that many people do not admire Christ. They abhor Him; they persecute Him; because, instead of being a confirmation, He is a contradiction of their own principles and ideals of living, their own ideas of what is proper and needful. Such a one was Paul, for when, as Saul the Pharisee, he first came in contact with Christ and His followers, he did not admire them; he detested them.

This brings us to the second and deepest reason for loving Christ:

(2) "We love Him because He first loved us." As we have said, Paul did not admire Christ; he detested Him. But the love of his heart was won by Christ first loving him—while he was still unlovely, while he was still an enemy.

And we, along with Paul, absorb into our own lives the thoughts, feeling and actions of Christ because He first loved us; because He did not wait until we were good and pure and true before serving us.

I am not now referring to the action of Jesus of Galilee 1,900 years ago. I mean the living Christ of to-day: the Christ who lives in and works through the lives of those who have opened their hearts to Him. I am a Christian, because the Christ who lives in the hearts of at least half-a-dozen people whom I could name, approached me in different ways, cared for me, bore with me, even when I was most rebellious and self-centred, and eventually, by His persistent, selfless service and activity towards me, won my love.

For me, the heart of the Gospel is that Christ, acting through human agents who have absorbed His nature, loves His enemies. God is love, and it is a love that is not limited by the fact of enmity.

That is the basis of my love for Christ, and therefore of my Christian Pacifism. If I am willing to forgive others, it is because the living Christ has so greatly forgiven me. If I am willing to serve others and count not the cost, it is because during the past 27 years, the Christ of this generation has served me and counted not the cost. If I believe that Christ's active love working through me can change the hearts of those who are now His enemies, and who despise both Him and those who belong to Him, it is because Christ's active love, working through others during the past 27 years, changed the whole of my outlook and course of life.

That, to me, is the essence of Christianity, the "unexpected goodness" and practical activity of the Gospel,—and what makes Christian Pacifism the thing that it is.

To re-iterate: Because, while we were still enemies of Christ and His purpose — enemies either ignorantly or consciously—He has loved and served us, when we were at our blindest and most degraded, — therefore we love Him; and because we love Him, we absorb into our lives His own nature, His own ways of re-acting and thinking and feeling. Furthermore, what His attitude and actions were towards us (working through those who served Him), those attitudes and actions are now ours towards others. We are literally "in Christ", part of Him and being used by Him.

So that, if a Christian Pacifist is asked why, under the challenge of war, he acts and thinks and feels as he does, his fundamental answer is: "Because the living Christ loved and served me while I was still unlovely" (or as Saul the crucifier was led to say of the Christ of his own day: "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us").

From this point we are bound to go on to ask: "Who then is this Christ?"

I would say that His first and most striking characteristic is that of active love for the unlovely, for his enemies, for those who oppose Him: that is how He is continually extending His Kingdom.

Wherever that characteristic attitude and activity is found to-day, there is the living Christ.

I make no apology for saying that the activity to-day of, for example, half-a-dozen different people (who love the unlovely in half-a-dozen different ways) is the activity of one Person. For one reason: such attitude and activity is distinctive and it has a history: it can be traced back in the history books; and it began in Galilee 1,900 years ago. The distinctive attitude and activity which we are considering in the world to-day—this redemptive activity — is derived from the attitude and activity of one Jesus, who was a carpenter in Galilee. Something new broke into history 1,900 years ago, and it cannot be explained away.

It began by one Jesus actively loving those who were still unlovely—even while they were whole-heartedly opposing Him as an enemy,—a fact which persuaded them to love Him, and as they loved Him, to absorb into their own way of life His characteristic outlook, approach and reaction to life. All that we know of His life and teaching is a filling in and a working out of this central active attitude.

For another reason, I attribute these separate but distinctive activities of to-day to the activities of one living Person because they hang together in a way that seems unique. After 9 years of awakened observation and deliberate personal experiment, the explanation that seems to fit most of the facts and gives promise of further development, is that these separate but distinctive activities are the activities of one living Person, and that that Person is somehow bound up with and further explained by the historic figure of Jesus of Galilee.

(To be concluded.)

STALIN'S POLICY

Wickham Steed, the famous capitalist journalist, former editor of the London "Times", and an outstanding figure in the realm of politica intrigue and diplomacy, contributed a significant article to "The Evening Times", Glasgow, for Tuesday, February 16 last.

Under the heading "Nazi Scarecrow of Bolshevism", Steed denounces the Anti-Bolshevick tirades of Goebbels and Co., and proceeds to narrate a discussion he had with "a man whose name is almost as well known in this country as it is in Soviet Russia." This man was despondent as to the future from fear that Britain and the United States might tend, under cerain influences, to create an "Anti-Bolshevick front" during the resulting peace. Steed continues:—

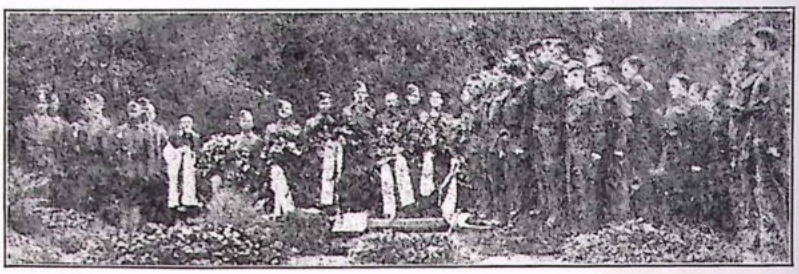
I gave him my personal reasons for thinking his despondency unwarranted.

"Joseph Stalin", I said, "has shown himself to be a great leader of the Russian people, and a military commander of genius. His wisdom in rejecting the policy of Trotsky—which was to form branches of the Communist International, or 'Comintern', everywhere and to use them to foment revolutions in all countries—has been more than justified by the development of Russia in the past 15 years.

"I think it highly improbable that Stalin will depart from that wisdom after a victorious war and revert in practice, if not in theory, to a policy of revolutionary international Communism such as Trotsky would have favoured. . . "

My interlocutor brightened up. "You are right about Stalin", he said. "He will not revert to the policy of Trotsky. He will want to lead Russia forward, and he will welcome British help."

GAVE LIFE IN BID TO SAVE GERMAN



The above is one of two pictures published in the Aberdeen "Evening Express" for February 10, 1943. It shows a German military firing party who fired a salute over the grave of a British soldier, who was a prisoner of war at a camp in Poland. Some Aberdeen prisoners of war are among those at the graveside. The dead British soldier gave his life in trying to rescue a German from a well. The picture was sent home by an Aberdeen soldier.

Our contemporary published another picture, sent home by the same soldier, a close-up of one of the wreaths, with the Swastika and Iron Cross expressing the German tribute.

The picture reproduced is sufficient to illustrate the fact that the dead soldier, in his death proved himself a hero of humanity. His sacrifice will help to cement the bonds of friendship which should unite the human race and hasten the day when all mankind shall dwell in harmony and a commonweal of living brotherhood. In the midst of the sorrows of war let us pay tribute to a soldier, who would have died on the battlefield, but died instead on a nobler battlefield, the battlefield of social service and common humanity.

FOR "THE WORD"

I want to say a word or two
About "The Word." It speaks to you
Each month, as would an honest friend
'Tis straight for truth, and will not bend.

"The Word" still strives to inculcate
Sincere, kind thought that combats hate:
No damning dope, but mental good.
"Cause and effect" are understood.

While propaganda's shrewd deceit
Makes most succumb to "war defeat."
"The Word" shows how the world could be Saved from "the sword", and sane and free.

I often sang in days gone by
A hymn—"Kind words can never die."
Shall this wise "Word", and kind withal,
Fall sick, and fade beyond recall?

Now, readers, think: and say with me,
"Such tragedy must never be."
Anon enrich your souls, and give
"The Word" some "food", that it may live.

Guy Aldred's pen is mightier than
The bombs: though they do all they can.
With such an editor as Guy,
"The Word" shall wag, or we'll know why.

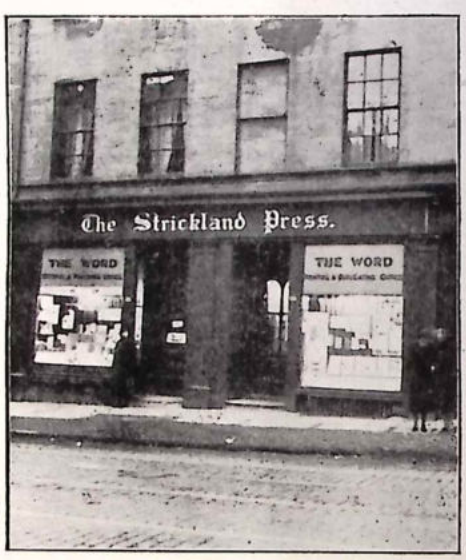
"A LAVISH PRESS"



"The Daily Worker", with its usual "Communist" love of falsehood, has described the Strickland Press, as "a lavish press." For the interest of readers in all parts of the English-speaking world, we publish a picture of this "lavish press."

The Strickland Press is situate in the heart of Glasgow slumdom. Comrades come from all quarters to this unpretentious shop, in search of Socialist, Pacifist, and Freethought literature: indeed, in quest of heresy and wisdom.

Underneath and at the back of this small double shop is the press: quaint, proletarian, and incessantly working.

We ask comrades to increase the influence of the Strickland Press. Our aim is not a lavish but a useful press.

Order your radical, revolutionary, and heretical literature through the Strickland Press. When in Glasgow visit its shop. Make it your centre.

EDITOR'S PLAIN TALK

It may be necessary to increase the price of "The Word" to 3d. in May. We will not do so if readers respond thoroughly to our appeal this month. "HOPELESS"!

"NO USE TROUBLING ABOUT US."

WILLIE GALLACHER'S VERDICT ON HIMSELF AND HIS "COMMUNIST" COLLEAGUES.

"Ritchie and I and our colleagues are hopeless; there is no use troubling about us."

—William Gallacher (now M.P.), in "The Worker," Glasgow, September 22, 1922.

Last month we quoted the remarkable article contributed by Wickham Steed to the Glasgow "Evening Times" on the question of Stalin's policy. The famous British capitalist journalist averred that Trotsky favoured a programme of International Communism and that Stalin stood for a programme of Russian co-operation with the capitalist nations in the coming post-war years. This is the view also of the great American capitalist newspaper, the "New York Times," which is the soul of the American bourgeoisie manifesting itself in print.

SOVIET "COMMUNISM" NO MENACE.

In its issue for December 20, 1942, the "N.Y. Times" published an editorial, headed "Post-War World," in which it depicts the place assigned to Stalin and his "Communist" henchmen in capitalist history, and pours scorn on Laval's attempts to parrot Hitler's battlecry against the menace of "Communism," as coming from the Soviet Union.

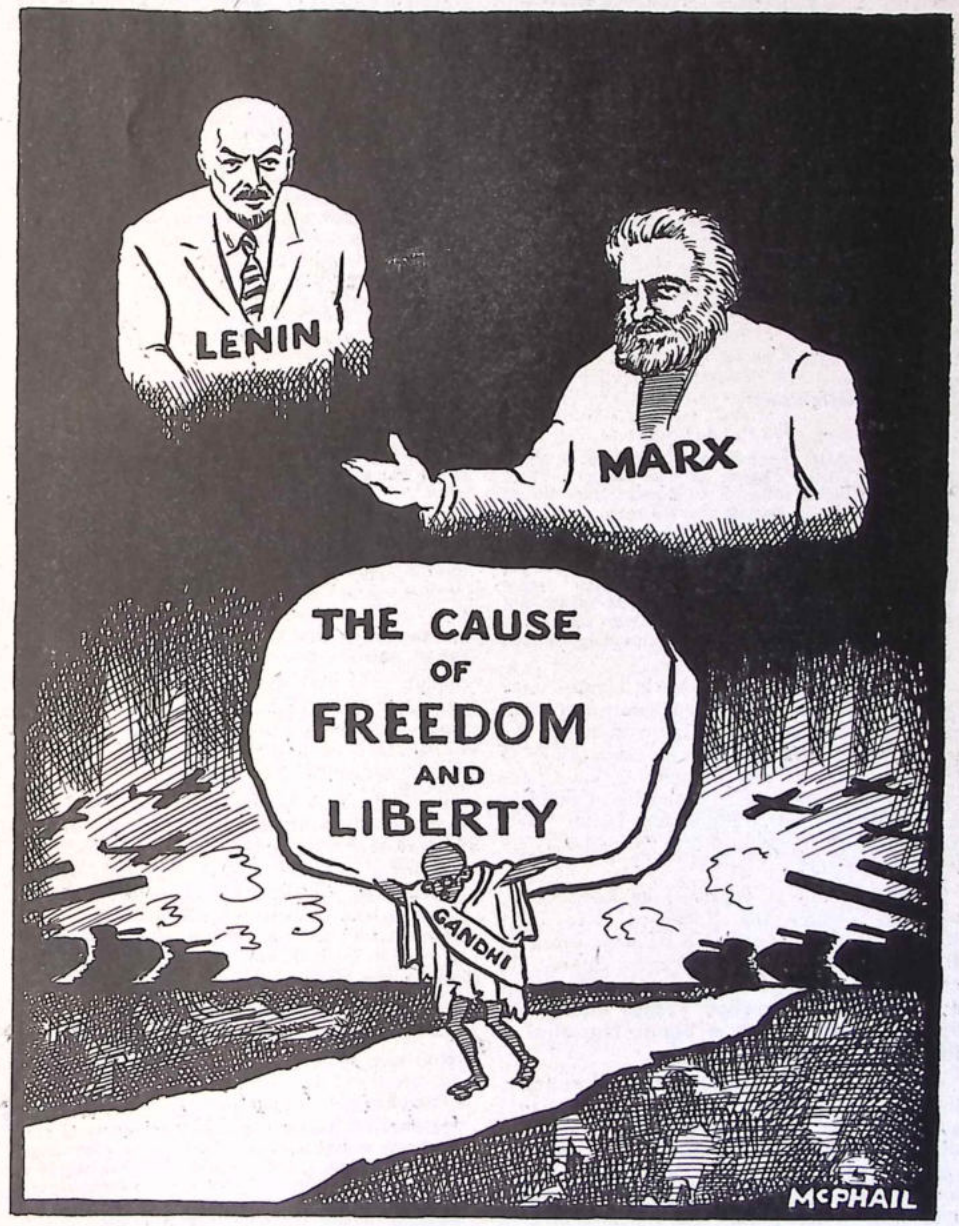
Our New York contemporary leaves its readers to understand that the struggle between Communism and Fascism was very real at the time of Hitler's rise to power, but that the danger of Communism is a thing of the past, thanks to the wisdom of Stalin, and the liquidation of the Russian Revolution step by step, from Anarchism to Trotskyism. The New York journal gives no heed to slanders like those to be found in Joseph Davies "Mission to Moscow," in which the ex-Ambassador labours to prove that the Moscow fake trials were genuine, and that the Bolshevik old guard members were traitors to Communism. Indeed, Joseph Davies' falsifications are unwanted liabilities at the moment and the time has come to face the truth, that the Bolshevik leaders were "liquidated" for believing in the social revolution to which their lives had been devoted mostly from their youth. The "N.Y. Times" refuses to camouflage the real nature of the struggle between Trotskyism and Stalinism. Trotsky, it avers, stood for the proletarian world revolution; Stalin, for the turn-away from that goal towards Russian nationalism.

Says this most interesting editorial:

"But Laval dons the armour of the anti-Communist crusader too late. Because of the subversive and, in the result, suicidal activities of a Communist International guided by the Trotskyist ideology of the proletarian world revolution, Hitler could still raise an issue which frightened many Germans into his camp and won a following for similar crusaders elsewhere, including the United States. BUT WITH THE 'LIQUIDATION' OF THE TROTSKYISTS IN RUSSIA, THE PROLETARIAN WORLD REVOLUTION BEGAN TO TAKE A BACK SEAT, ON WHICH SAT IN THE MAIN THE COMMUNIST DUPES IN OTHER COUNTRIES, whom the Moscow rulers despised as tools and liquidated first wherever Moscow itself took over, as in the Baltic States. The state of Stalin became more and more a nationalist state, and the Communist International became the tool of Russian power politics. And this nationalisation of the Bolshevist Revolution is now being completed and solidified in the fires of the Russo-German war."

It is, of course, nonsense to assume that the post-war world is going to be controlled by Stalin and a "Communist" world bureaucracy, in the interest of capitalism. Socialism is a fact and will make itself heard. The struggle of the masses against oppression is inevitable and will result in social victory, the victory of commonwealth and liberty. But the editorial shows the approved part that the Stalinists aim to play and are expected to play in the post-war world. Can these people be considered the friends of the people, the champions of the oppressed working-class?

Winston Churchill directed the counter-revolutionary interventionists against the



[Specially drawn for "The Word" by "McPhail."]

"YOU SEE COMRADE, THEY DON'T ALL QUIT."

Russia of Lenin and Trotsky, and spoke of the Red Army as the Jewish Anarchist followers of those two leaders. On the 24th Anniversary of the Russian Revolution, he spoke of Stalin as the great warrior, at the head of the Russians. In the London "Times," beneath a large hammer and sickle, a commercial firm advertised: "Salute to an Ally." Lord Beaverbrook, now comrade Beaverbrook, recovering from his past attacks on Communism and denunciations of Lenin and Trotsky, and as anti-Socialist as ever, told a group of war-workers at Manchester, concerning Stalin: "I put my faith in that man's leadership." Stalin responds to this Imperialist war-mongering by referring to Churchill as "the old warrior" and celebrating the 24th Anniversary of the Russian Revolution by describing the spectre of revolution as a trick of Hitler's. What did Marx write about the spectre of Communism? Perhaps Willie Gallacher and Harry Pollitt will tell the puzzled proletariat!

WILL HITLER BE CRUSHED TOO SOON?

The spectre of Communism, of International Socialism, haunts capitalist society. This fact explains the eulogies of Stalin, the capitalisation of regard for the hammer and sickle, and the "N.Y. Times" editorial of December 20, 1942, from which we have quoted. Exactly a month earlier, on November 20, the same paper published a cryptic paragraph at the conclusion of its chief editorial, which was headed: "The Test of Hitler's Power."

This amazing editorial concludes:

What the African expedition precipitates, in short, is a test of Hitler's power all over Europe. There are signs of uncertainty in the German plans, delays and waverings that suggest that the master strategist is taken by surprise and is improvising moves with counters he is not sure of. This is an opportunity for the Allied forces, BUT IT IS A PERIL, TOO, FOR IT SUGGESTS THAT THERE MAY ALREADY BE GREATER WEAKNESS THAN WE REALIZED UNDER THE FACADE OF NAZI POWER. The decisive battle may develop, in fact, before we are ready to fight it.

Why should the "New York Times" fear that Hitler might be crushed before the allies are prepared to come to grips with him? By whom is he to be crushed? By the workers of Germany—by the revolutionary action of the masses of Europe and by elements of the Red Army who may not be Stalinist? Is the "New York Times" more afraid of Socialism than it is of Fascism?

Stalin's policy is approved by Lord Croft, who has assured the House of Lords that Britain intends to maintain its possessions in Malaya and Burma, and as regards democracy, pursue a policy of gradualism. Lord Croft was a supporter of Francisco Franco during the Spanish Civil War and of Benito Mussolini at the partition of Abyssinia.

The revolutionary defeat of the Hitler army, leading to a Socialist Europe, and a world commonwealth, is impossible without the help of the German workers themselves. Stalin's policy—and the eulogy of him and the Soviet bureaucracy by Allied Capitalist statesmen more notorious for their reaction than famous for their liberation—tend to prolong the war and make it an imperialist war of fight to a finish. This policy is in marked contrast to that pursued by Lenin and Trotsky in 1918. The latter made every effort to win over the German army of occupation by means of revolutionary propaganda. The Brest-Litvosk negotiations were delayed and dragged out to the very end in order to give Bolshevik propagandists time in which to spread their ideas among the German soldiers. Fraternization—this was the method of the founders of the Soviet Union. And this method resulted in the moral disintegration of the German army and led to the uprising of the German people at home which overthrew the Kaiser's regime and put an end to the first World War. But for the parliamentary reactionaries and opportunists the German revolution would have liquidated itself in a commonwealth of peace-loving peoples of the earth, each enjoying a system of Socialism.

Fraternization is not the Stalinist method. We have American reports of the visit to the United States of Ludmilla Paylichenko, a girl member of the Red Army. She is reputed to have killed 309 Nazis in sniping operations, and as a reward has been given the highest Soviet citations.

During an interview in Washington, in September, 1942, she said:

Every German who remains alive will kill women, children and old folks. Dead Germans are harmless."

This is the philosophy, and the unwisdom of capitalist patriotism, dividing the working-class into camps of hatred that profits might continue and the poor be oppressed for ever. To-day, the "Communists" have no conception of Socialist thought or struggle.

EARL BROWDER'S POLICY.

On July 2, 1942, Earl Browder returned to his "Communist" comrades at the Independence Day Rally of the Communist Party at Madison Square Gardens. Israel Amter, the party's candidate for Governor, was chairman of the meeting. The other speakers included: James W. Ford, William Z. Foster, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Ella Reeve Bloor, and Robert Misior, who introduced Browder.

Hailed as a hero, Browder termed his fourteen months in jail as "an incidental by-product of the desperate effort of world reaction, headed by Hitler, to prevent by all means the realization of the United States-Soviet alliance which I, as spokesman for my party, had long advocated as essential to the national interests of our own country and to the whole freedom-loving world."

Browder proceeded to praise Labour leaders and industrialists for their patriotism and their co-operation in war production. He applauded Roosevelt as "the Nation's Commander in chief" and concluded:

"Everything for the destruction of the Nazi-Fascist Axis!"

What "everything" means Browder has made clear since in his "Victory and After," a book of 256 pages, published by International Publishers, New York, at 50 cents, to celebrate his release from jail, we presume.

Browder's book is described as a "systematic presentation of the point of view of the Communist Party of the United States." It will make interesting reading for British workers as defining the programme which commands the support of Gallacher and Pollitt. The book was written for the purpose of alleviating all uneasiness about "the menace of Communism."

Chapter V is entitled: "Is Communism a Menace?" Browder says it is not.

Here are some paragraphs, which tell their own story, defining capitalism in all its inequalities and injustices:

Mr. Hoover thinks the capitalist system is such a delicate organism that if it has any competition with a socialist system anywhere in the world it will simply curl up and die of a bellyache, and, therefore, to save capitalism, we must kill off socialism by war wherever it might appear.

Mr. Hoover's judgment upon capitalism is worse than anything which I, as a spokesman for the Communists, have ever uttered against it. For I firmly believe that Mr. Hoover's theory is a slander against capitalism. I believe that it is possible for capitalism to continue in the United States even if there is socialism in the Soviet Union. (Pp. 76-77.)

Secondly as a practical matter, national unity in the United States is above all a problem of ADJUSTING CLASS INTERESTS without the severe struggles by which this has usually been accomplished. (P. 83.)

Any attempt to interpret literally the phrase "equality of sacrifice" would of course, not help prosecute the war to victory, but would hopelessly sabotage it. There is not, and cannot be, any literal equality of sacrifice as between workers and capitalists in this war. The workers must make the main sacrifices, and they have enough common sense to know, and enough patriotism not to object to it. (P. 86.)

The labour movement has not protested this generous allowance to the privileged classes, understanding that even in beseiged civilization such persons trained to luxury and idleness must be handled gently and indulgently. Even the Communists have shown no disposition to urge more drastic restrictions on the upper classes. (P. 87.)

We must find a way to finance, organise, and fight this war through to victory, a way which is acceptable to the owning class (industrialists, financiers, bondowners with their most important hired men). . . . (P. 87.)

. . . The claims of property owners and coupon clippers . . . must be compromised with generosity in their favour. . . . (P. 88.)

Business executives have been so completely habituated to receiving incomes scales up to a certain equality with property incomes of the highest brackets that they will inevitably be favoured at the expense of the masses and of the total war effort. This may be deplored from abstract considerations, but it must not be rejected. . . . (P. 89.)

To the extent that they are prepared to subordinate their own special interests and ideologies to the needs of victory in this war, Tories and Communists can severally and jointly contribute to national unity, together with all others. (P. 124.)

And this is "Communism." This is the programme of Earl Browder, Willie Gallacher, and Henry Pollitt! This is the programme the Fife miners voted for in November, 1935, when Gallacher defeated Adamson! See Chapter XVI of "Socialism and Parliament; Pt. I ("Word" Library, No. 4). This is post-second-war "Communism," the promise of the Russian Revolution unto the second and third generation. Perhaps some of our readers will recall William Gallacher's most unfortunate challenge in "The Worker" for September, 1922, when he asks: "What has Aldred ever done for the revolutionary movement?"

What has Gallacher done for the revolutionary movement? What is he doing now? And what is Earl Browder doing?

In 1922, when Gallacher put this question, he identified himself with Ritchie, who was then a C.P. United Fronter, and subsequently became I.L.P. Parish Councillor, Labour Party Town Councillor and Bailie; and twice charged and finally convicted, sentenced, and dishonoured corruptionist in office.

Eulogising Ritchie at great length, at our expense, Gallacher shrieked with exasperation:

Ritchie and I and our colleagues are hopeless; there is no use troubling about us.

Which was true, as time has shewn. The workers remained in their slums and Ritchie climbed to bailieship and then went to gaol. The slums remain and Ritchie has returned to them, probably. The much-boosted organisation served no purpose other than that of transient corruption under capitalism. More fortunate than Ritchie, Gallacher sits in Parliament, applauding Churchill and Beaverbrook. He is the Earl Browder of politics in Britain.

In the "Evening Times," Glasgow, for Saturday, February 27, William Gallacher, M.P., contributed an article under these flaring headlines:—

Work Disputes Delay Victory
STRIKES HELP HITLER:
SO DO BAD "BOSSES"

But the real emphasis, in the article, was on "Strikes"! It is good to know, however, that "Communism" distinguishes between "good" and "bad bosses."

Yes, Stalinist Peace Convention Gallacher, Comrade Facing-all-ways, was right in 1922. Gallacher and Co. are hopeless. There is no use troubling about them. This phrase should be their epitaph.

III. GLASGOW (1921) TRIAL ECHOES

II.—THE NUNEATON VICTIM.

This is the story of the colliery under-manager.

In "The Freethinker", for February 13, 1921, we inserted a page-advertisement of the publications of the Bakunin Press. Half of this page was devoted to an announcement of the Slav-folklore translations made by the late Sir Walter Strickland. Russian fairy-tales cannot be deemed seditious or blasphemous. The rest of the page announced various Freethought and Socialist pamphlets written by us, the bound volume and also the then current issue of "The Spur", and "The Red Commune", which the Anti-Parliamentary Group was preparing to publish as its organ, independent of our activity and the work of the Bakunin Press.

The advertisement was answered by a Mr. W. H. Hunt, of Nuneaton, who was not interested in Socialism, but was interested in Freethought. He ordered Sir Walter Strickland's translations, our own Freethought pamphlets, and a bound volume of "The Spur." He did not even order "The Red Commune", although no one could tell, in advance, that the paper would be prosecuted, or anticipate its contents. The title simply did not appeal to him. He had never written to the Bakunin Press before and, it is safe to assume, would not have written when he did but for the "Freethinker" advertisement.

At the beginning of March, 1921, there occurred our arrest in London, and that of our three comrades in Glasgow. These arrests have been detailed fully already and need not be referred to here. Following the arrests, and the raid on Bakunin House, came the victimisation of Mr. Hunt. His victimisation is even more shameful than that of the police-constable, Magill, dealt with in the previous chapter.

Chapman Cohen told the story of Hunt's victimisation, in an excellent series of comments published in "The Freethinker", for May 15, 1921:—

Some time ago we received an advertisement of certain publications issued by the Bakunine Press, of Glasgow. The advertisement was duly inserted, and there, so far as we were concerned, the matter ended. But that advertisement had a curious sequel for one of our readers, the particulars of which we take from his letters and an account published in the Nuneaton "Observer."

This man, Mr. W. H. Hunt, was employed at the Haunchwood Colliery as under-manager. Seeing the advertisement, and wishing to know something of the topics discussed in the advertised publications, he sent for some of them. Mr. Hunt is, we understand, neither a propagandist, nor a member of any political organization. He was simply desirous of reading something about the Soviet system and kindred matters. Soon after sending his money for the publications the Glasgow office was raided by the police, and immediately after that Mr. Hunt was called into the manager's office, a copy of the letter he had sent to the Glasgow Socialist headquarters read to him, and he was forthwith dismissed.

That appears to be a plain unvarnished statement of the facts of the case, and I do not think it possible to conceive anything of a more infamous character. The action of the colliery officials is bad enough, but worse than that is the fact of their being in possession of the letter. How did that happen? There seems only one of two ways possible. Either the letter must have been opened by the postal officials, or it must have been seized by the police when they raided the Socialist headquarters, and one or the other must have sent a copy of the letter to the man's employers. For the authorities to open a man's private correspondence is bad enough. But that is now so common that we have almost ceased to notice it. But that, in addition, copies of these letters should be sent to one's employers, and his discharge secured, not because he had done anything wrong or illegal, but merely because he wished to read something which the authorities think he ought not to read, is a position of affairs that is a disgrace to any country in the world. If the facts are as stated nothing that we can say can add to the infamy of the situation.

If we had a House of Commons different from the one we possess we should hope to see the matter taken up there. Fifty years ago if this had occurred that would have been done and with some effect. But this House of Commons, with its self complacent inefficiency and self applauding impotence, is beyond hope. It cares nothing for liberty, and consequently does nothing for it. And bit by bit, under one pretext or another, one guarantee after another of public liberty is restricted or wiped out. Each of the political parties, the Labour Party not less than the others, seems to strive for political power with the aim of curtailing the freedom of individual members of the public.

We have won the war, and we have, as a result, annexed some of the German colonies and almost the whole of the spiritual possessions of Prussia. A huge army of officials sit directing all the details of our life, and officialism once established is one of the most difficult of all forms of social parasitism to remove. To-day it is becoming a literal truth that no man's personal liberty is safe. The question is how much farther will matters go before there arises a body of men and women sufficiently devoted to freedom to say, without regard to any political party or theory, that this sort of thing must stop? At present we see no sign of any such development. It is a case of which party shall have the chance of playing the Prussian.

An account of another case that reaches us illustrates further the degree to which in this country personal rights are being threatened by the reactionary wave which at the very beginning of the war we warned our readers was bound to come.

In March last Mr. Guy Aldred was arrested in London and taken to Glasgow on a charge of sedition. On the justice of the charge we desire to make no comment. That is clearly a matter to be settled in the courts. The thing that does call for comment is that Mr. Aldred is not to be tried till July, and during all that time he is retained in prison, bail being refused.

Now there seems no justification for this, short of the desire to punish by imprisonment whether a conviction is secured or not. It is a case of heads I win, tails you lose. There is no question, either, of the accused man failing to appear if bail were allowed. We believe we are right in saying that in none of these cases where bail has been allowed has there been any default. Remand on bail, with an undertaking not to repeat the offence until after the trial, would have met the case, and is all that can reasonably be required.

We do not accept Communism, and we hold no brief for it. But we are concerned, the "Freethinker" has always been concerned, with the right of every opinion to expression. It is that which appears to be in danger at the moment, and that concerns all men and women who have any regard for freedom and public decency.

We remember the late W. T. Stead saying at a Freethought meeting, that he stood up for the right of Freethinkers to commit blasphemy, and championed their right the more heartily because he did not agree with their opinions. And that is the real test. A worm will wriggle if it is trodden on; but the test of whether it is a super-worm or not is whether it will wriggle when another worm is trodden on. And one cannot avoid the conclusion that at present the authorities appear to be engaged in a campaign against particular opinions to which they have an objection. And we Freethinkers value the right to free expression too highly not to feel perturbed when we see it threatened in any direction.

John S. Clarke, then editor of "The Worker", the Glasgow organ of National Workers Committees, reproduced most of Chapman Cohen's commentary in his paper for May 21, 1921. Referring to Sir Basil Thomson, then chief of the C.I.D., as the successor of Sir Melville Leslie Magnaghton, who had died a short time before, Clarke added:—

"However, tracking murderers was the principal business of the late police chief. His successor, Sir Basil Thomson, is composed of less ambitious and less heroic clay. Helping to distribute forged copies of "Pravda"; organising gangs of mean spies, engineering frame-ups, and persecuting political opponents, are more in his line. The police department in this country never sank so low as it has done since this poor puffed-up imitation of Trepoff or Von Plevhe got the job of bossing it. Here is an eye-opener to those never-be-slave Britons who imagine that the police administration of this country is the property of democracy instead of the watchdog of private capitalists. From the "Freethinker" of last week.

And then Clarke retold the story of the victimised Nuneaton colliery under-manager—a disgraceful story!

Among those interned under 18B are many who read of this injustice and ignored its implications. They did not see the menace to civil liberty in our 1921 prosecution and the arising persecution of perfectly innocent people who had not the remotest connection with our propaganda. The cry of "sedition", the clamour of ruling class interests, the sense of personal security, conquered their scruples and damaged their interest. Injustice ought never to be tolerated, and the discussion of political opinion, the struggle of ideas, should not be suppressed. Those whose silence wronged us in 1921 wronged themselves. Some, to-day, are paying the penalty of not being alive to the outrage of civil liberty.

CARLILE (with an 'I')

By HAMILTON FYFE.

[Hamilton Fyfe paid two tributes to the memory of Richard Carlile. One he contributed to "The Literary Guide" for February 1943. This we will reproduce next month. The other is reprinted below. It is reproduced from "The Daily Herald" for February 14.—Ed.]

"Ever heard of Carlile with an 'i'?" I asked an American newspaper man a few days ago.

He looked puzzled. "I've heard of Thomas Carlyle", he said. "Even read some of him. But Carlile with an 'i'—no, never."

"He was a man", I said, "who did a great deal for that freedom we were discussing. He stood up to Cabinet Ministers who were determined to kill it, if they could.

'They found they couldn't, and that was mainly due to Richard Carlile, who died just 100 years ago—on February 10, 1843. There's going to be a little commemoration of his long struggle at his grave in Kensal Green Cemetery on the centenary date.

"Not many people know about him now, but he was such a headache to the Government, and to all who wanted to keep things as they were, that a society was formed to stop his activities.

"I suppose that's the only time such a thing ever happened—I mean forming a society to stop the activities of one man.

"It didn't stop them though. Its subscription list ran up to £6,000 and was headed by the Duke of Wellington, but the publications it aimed at suppressing went on being sold.

"They sent Carlile to jail for three years, fined him £1,500 in the hope of ruining his business as a printer, jailed his wife when she carried on for him, jailed his sister for helping him, jailed his loyal salesmen.

"But nothing could stop the circulation of the books he published—Tom Paine's among others—or of the weekly paper he edited, even while he was in prison.

"When he had served his three years, the Government got him another three for not paying his fine, but he came out as obstinately resolute as ever.

"He got a bad name with the highly respectable, for he was accused of publishing blasphemous pamphlets and he refused to pay Church rates. He was prosecuted again for this and for exhibiting in his shop window an effigy of a bishop collecting rates with the devil as his assistant. He got another three years for that."

"But he won out in the end?" my American friend asked anxiously.

He was thrilled by the pluck and grit of this Devon man who began life as an errand boy in Exeter, but beat the Ruling Class, and, in the words of the Dictionary of National Biography, "Did more than any other Englishman in his day for the freedom of the Press."

"Yes, he won all right", I said, "but he was only fifty-two when he died. He wore himself out in the service of humanity—that is, of you and me."

RICHARD CARLILE

Fighter for Freedom in the First Days of Capitalism

By

Dr. CHARLES BROOK

[The following essay is reprinted from "The New Leader", London, for January 6, 1943. It is the best Centenary tribute paid to the memory of Richard Carlile and merits wide circulation.—Ed.]

One hundred years ago—on February 10th, 1843—Richard Carlile died in Bouverie Street, London, at the age of 52. He had little to leave but his body, which he bequeathed for dissection.

A native of Ashburton, Devon, and the son of a cobbler, he was working as a journeyman mechanic in a tinsmith's shop in Holborn Hill when he first became interested in politics and in the Reform movement, which was then led by William Cobbett and "Orator" Henry Hunt. In 1817 he left his trade to become publisher of an advanced political journal, "Sherwin's Register." This he later acquired and changed its name to "The Republican."

PRISONER OF FREEDOM.

He was soon in trouble with the authorities and was imprisoned for eighteen weeks for selling Hone's "Parodies." Although faced with indictments on further charges of blasphemy, he was present at the Peterloo Massacre and his "Liberty Flag" was taken from his Fleet Street shop to Manchester and figured prominently at that great demonstration. Avoiding arrest, he escaped to London and publicised the whole affair in "Sherwin's Register", following this up with open letters to the Prince Regent and to the Home Secretary, Lord Sidmouth.

He was apprehended fo seditious libel, but, through fear of adverse and hostile publicity, the Government ordered his release. But soon afterwards, at the instigation of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which was led by William Wilberforce, alternative proceedings were taken against Carlile on the several indictments of blasphemous libel. For, despite warnings from the authorities, he had repeatedly and persistently published and sold cheap editions of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" and Plihu Palmer's "Principles of Nature."

After a long trial in which Carlile defended himself with great ability, he was convicted, sentenced to three years' imprisonment, fined £1,500, and ordered to furnish substantial sureties.

THE IRON DUKE.

Carlile flatly declined to pay the fines or furnish the sureties, although he had many well-to-do and influential supporters including Jeremy Bentham and Francis Place. The poets, Keats and Shelley, protested against the sentence; but the Duke of Wellington considered the penalties too lenient and demanded, in the House of Lords that Carlile should be outlawed and transported for life; while the Czar of Russia forbade any mention of the trial in the newspapers of his country.

For six years, until 1825, Carlile remained in Dorchester Gaol, but from his cell he organised one of the most audacious and best-planned campaign of passive resistance ever recorded, and, what is most important, his efforts were completely successful. No fewer than 150 of his shopmen and shopwomen in all parts of the country wer prosecuted, and many, including his wife and his sister were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

But volunteers were never lacking. The "Republican" and other Carlile publications appeared with unfailing regularity, and at the end of 1825 he emerged from gaol triumphant", with his fines unpaid and his sureties abrogated.

WELLINGTON ROUTED.

He had not only successfully defied and utterly routed the Government, Wellington's Constitutional Association and Wilberforce's Vice Society, but he had made good use of his long incarceration. He read widely and wrote prolifically. He developed to the full his greatest and most outstanding gift, perhaps not surpassed by any Englishman before or since, of being able to focus on any problem the spotlight of plain commonsense.

To give an example at random: Carlile objected on principle to oath-making, and of sworn evidence given at trials he wrote:

"If the oath were valued as giving weight to the evidence, cross-examination would be a very great presumption; for it proves that the oath has not given weight to the evidence and that it cannot give it weight."

CHAMPIONS THE WORKERS.

During his stay at Dorchester his views on politics and religion underwent great changes. He turned his back on the Reformers.

"I write for the poor", he proclaimed, and he not only wrote for the poor but published for the poor and sold to the poor at prices the poor could pay. That was his real crime in the eyes of the ruling class.

His desire to serve the proletariat is well shown in his masterly and devastating exposure of the exploitation of the operatives in the Manchester cotton mills, which he wrote in 1827.

Not many to-day could better Carlile's indictment of industrial Capitalism of a century and a quarter ago, when he wrote—in 1827—of the plight of the operatives in the Manchester cotton mills:

"The human beings are worked with less care than is shown to the machinery, as the latter is expensive and the former costs the masters nothing for renewal."

SLAVES IN ENGLAND.

He lashed out with fury at Wilberforce and other reformers.

"It is astonishing that our public professors of humanity should have kept up a clamour about slaves in another part of the world and that they should be blind to this, the worst kind of slavery that was ever inflicted on any portion of the human race, upon any portion of the animal world. Oh! how this religious humanity of Wilberforce and others stinks of hypocrisy. Men and women subscribe money for the prevention of cruelty to animals, but forget to include their own species, the animal man, in the common benefit."

Carlile was prophetic when he discussed the future of the cotton industry, for he expressed the opinion

"that the end of the century is very likely to see many of the huge and hell-like cotton mills emptied of human beings and the refuge of bats and owls."

SOCIAL REPUBLICAN.

At that time the Parliamentary Reformers were holding out promises of the millennium, but Carlile, the Social Republican, boldlly proclaimed:

"There will never be any serious attempt to improve the conditions of the working people but among themselves. They must begin it, carry it on, and end it."

In 1831 Carlile was sentenced to his third term of imprisonment. This time it was 32 months for sedition, for having encouraged insurgent agricultural labourers to continue their strike. He argued that as they were in a state of war, and that in war all destruction of property was lawful, therefore they were, under the circumstances, justified in destroying farm produce. On this occasion Carlile was imprisoned in the Compter in Giltspur Street, and, in reply to a message of sympathy, wrote:—

"It may seem strange, but whether from habit or what else, it is no less true that in the course of our great political struggle, I like a gaol, and am more happy here than I can possibly be anywhere else until the time of our political triumph."

THE "DEVIL'S CHAPLAIN."

Carlile never complained about his own privations, but to others similarly persecuted he was always ready to offer sympathy, wise counsel, and encouragement; as, for example, when he wrote from the Compter to his collaborator, Robert Taylor, "The Devil's Chaplain", who was then in Horsemonger Lane Gaol and had complained to Carlile that the gaoler had insulted him.

"It is not in the power of man to insult me. Assult is one thing, but insult is another, and there can only be insulting when there is a disposition to court it. Human nature is capable of a dignity that will not leave room for the word insult."

Carlile was a notable anti-militarist writer and publisher, and, in defiance of the Press Acts, he published an unstamped and anonymously written pamphlet characterising militarism as a monster and advocating its boycott by all decent people.

During the last decade of his life he was dogged by ill-health, probably aggravated by his nine-and-a-quarter years' imprisonment, but his pen was active to the end, and only a few months before his death he wrote to Sir Robert Peel announcing his intention to provoke prosecution as a protest against the imprisonment of G. J. Holyoake.

Carlile was consistently abused during his lifetime, and after his death the "Times" referred to him as "this notorious individual."

Almost a century later the Director of Talks of the B.B.C. expressed the opinion that Richard Carlile was not sufficiently eminent to justify a special centenary programme! Perhaps a more accurate reason for this decision is that the present time can scarcely be considered opportune for the average radio listener to appreciate the downright common sense of Richard Carlile.

The Duke of Bedford's great speech on conscientious objectors will be published in pamphlet form. We propose to publish, also, in full, the Earl of Glasgow's speech, sneering at the working class movement. The speech will be on sale this month. JUSTICE UNDER 18b.

C. H. Norman's articles will be resumed next month. Meanwhile we draw attention to two letters from his pen that have been suppressed by our contemporaries.

The following letter was addressed by Norman, dated from his office, 84/86 Chancery Lane, London, W.C., January 30, 1943, to the editor of "The New Statesman and Nation":

Sir,—May I question the statement of your legal correspondent that Parliament cannot examine into the action of the Executive in connection with the persons detained in wartime without trial or accusation. The evidence given in the case of Arbon and Others v. Anderson and Others tried by Lord Justice Goddard in December last would certainly merit the closest examination by a Parliamentary Committee representing all parties, as would also the conditions under which persons are examined by questionable methods (certainly unlawful under the Bill of Rights and the Act of Parliament) at Latchmere House, Ham Common

In the Arbon case, the statement was given in evidence that a German detained under 18B, who had also (ironically enough) been detained in the Dachau Camp in Germany, declered that the conditions of British detention were worse than those at Dachau. It is curious how silent "The New Stateman" is on these grave matters, though exceedingly angry at the abuses committted by foreign governments against their prisoners.

Yours faithfully,

C. H. NORMAN.

This letter was not published!

Nor was the following letter, sent by Norman, on February 11, 1943, to the editor of the "Daily Herald," dealing with the treatment of the 18B prisoners:

Sir,—The evidence given in Arbon and Others v. Anderson and Others, tried by Lord Justice Goddard in December last, hardly bears out the optimistic statements of Mr. O. Peake (on behalf of the Home Office) concerning the treatment of these unfortunate persons. I heard given in evidence the statement that a German, who had also been detained, ironically enough, in Dachau Camp in Germany, said the treatment and conditions in the English prison where he was detained were worse than at Dachau.

One would also like to know what methods are adopted to compel recalcitrant persons, who are examined at that curious place, Latchmere House, Ham Common, who refused to answer questions, to answer eventually. This is a matter eminently suitable for inquiry by a non-Party Committee of the House of Commons.

It must also be pointed out that, as most of these detained people had never committed any offence against the laws of the country, indeed many had given distinguished service, it is highly unlikely had they been tried and convicted on some trumped up political charge, that they would have received sentences covering anything like the period they have already been detained. Not even in the Napoleonic wars were methods adopted of this character. Had they been men like Fox, Sheridan and Hazlitt they would have been held untried for fifteen years under 18B by the Home Secretaries of that period. So would Mr. Lloyd George and Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman for their acts and speeches in the Boer war.

The fact that Sir Norman Birkett is presiding over the Advisory Committee and dealt with the case of Sir Oswald Mosley adds to my personal witnesses, as I happen to recall that Sir Norman Birkett acted as Counsel against Sir Oswald Mosley in the trial of "Mosley v. Daily News," in which that paper was cast in £5000 damages at a special jury trial presided over by Lord Hewart, then Lord Chief Justice. There were some remarkable passages in that trial, of such a nature as to lead one to legitimate surprise that Sir Norman Birkett should have felt himself fitted, in the sense of freedom from bias, for undertaking the onerous task of deciding whether undefended persons holding certain opinions should or should not be detained indefinitely and without trial.

The legal position of these persons appears to be this, as they are unconvicted, they are not entitled to the protection given by the Prison Act from illusage as prisoners. As they are never intended to be brought to trial, they have not the rights of prisoners on remand awaiting trial. While the "instructions" of the Home Secretary, not being made under any Statute or Order in Council, is a mere pious scrap of paper of no protective validity in the case of abuse. Could the Gestapo, or the Ogpu —(one is not told so much of the activities of that body in these days!)—have designed anything more ingenious than this scheme for denying untried persons the protection of the law contained in the unrepealed Bill of Rights and the Act of Settlement?

Yours faithfully,

C. H. NORMAN.

We reproduce these suppressed letters because we feel, with comrade Norman, that it is really scandalous the way the Press boycott is kept up on this subject.

"NOBLE FANATIC"

Beneath this heading, our contemporary, "The Evening Standard", London, devoted its leading article, on February 10, to Richard Carlile. The Beaverbrook journal said, in words that bring credit to the editor, and reflect an unusual luster on a mundane, reactionary, and much tarnished press:—

We dip freedom's banners to salute one of freedom's grandest sons. Richard Carlile died one hundred years ago to-day. He was among those who defied Lord Sidmouth's Gagging Acts, routed the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which was the hated Common Informer of that time, and drove the Press Censor out of Fleet Street. He was a noble fanatic for the right of free opinion.

Carlile, a Devon tinplate worker, died at the age of 52, a victim of the asthma aggravated by imprisonment which covered nearly ten years of his adult life. In prison and out of it, he launched and edited at least 11 newspapers and wrote 24 books and pamphlets. A confirmed individualist, he was in fierce and constant controversy with those fellow rebels who sought emancipation through trade unions and political organisation. Always, he kept open his shop in Fleet Street for the sale of literature which Authority chose to brand as "seditious" and "blasphemous." The shop was raided time and again. It never failed to re-open. Carlile was gaoled. So were his wife, his sister, his shopmen. But the shop never put up its shutters for long.

The tinplate worker set up in business in 1817, republishing works which had been withdrawn by other publishers on threat of prosecution. His second struggle with the law, involving the famous "Mock Trials", came in 1819. After witnessing the "Peterloo Massacre", when cavalry rode down a popular demonstration in Manchester, Carlile wrote an account of the affair in "An Open Letter to Lord Sidmouth" and, at once, was charged with sedition.

As is usual when Authority goes on the warpath against freedom, makeweight charges were thrown in. They related to "blasphemy" in connection with the publication of Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" and other banned books. Carlile came into conflict with the judge by reading the whole of Paine's essay in open court. A new trial was held at the instance of the Vice Society, at which the charge of sedition was allowed to drop. On the make-weight charges Carlile was sent to prison for two years and fined £1500.

Carlile was in and out of prison several times thereafter, but he neither paid fines nor provided securities. His unconditional release in November, 1825, marks the date from which the "Age of Reason" and other writings long proscribed were permitted to circulate freely.

The man who opposed political union offered himself as Radical candidate for Ashton-under-Lyne when the Reform Act was passed. The man who went to prison for the right to criticise Christian doctrine was himself devoutly religious and became a licensed preacher. These contradictions characterise all great rebels. What Carlile bequeathed to us besides freedom from censorship in ordinary times was an example of how freedom can be preserved—by each man being prepared, if necessary, to stand alone against injustice, whatever sacrifice his courage might require.

"The licensed preacher" story has been dealt with in our "life" of Carlile, and also in Cole's recent short biography. Cole overestimates and actually falsifies the incident. He draws a conclusion which is untrue in fact. This apart, the "Standard's" editor tribute is an excellent piece of writing, and a severe historical censure on the trials and imprisonment of Carlile, upheld and defended at the same time with so much popm and ceremony.

The "Standard's" editor also broadcasted a tribute on the B.B.C. overseas and service programme. But why not the Home programme?

CARLILE'S ROTUNDA

Our comrade, Dr. Charles Brook, former L.C.C. Member for North Southwark, sent the South London Press the life story of Richard Carlile. Our contemporary summarised and published Dr. Brook's letter in its issue for Tuesday, February 9, beneath a three-lined heading, which read as follows:—

RICHARD CARLILE AND HIS "FREETHOUGHT COLISEUM" AT THE BLACKFRIARS RING.

Our contemporary is in error, because "The Ring" was formerly Rowland Hill's chapel, and was situate farther down Blackfriar's Road. The story of The Rotunda is given in Chapter XXV. of our "life" of Richard Carlile; and in more detail, in our "life" of Robert Taylor, Chapter IV. and Appendic I.

"The South London Press" summarises Dr. Brook's letter as follows:—

CARLILE'S CENTENARY.

To South Londoners, and especially those in Southwark, the events should be of particular interest, for it was on May 30, 1830, that Carlile, in association with the Rev. Robert Taylor, "The Devil's Chaplain", established a Free-thought Coliseum" in the Rotunda at the southern approach to Blackfriars Bridge.

The Rotunda had previously been in turn a natural history museum, a literary institute, a music hall, a circus, and a home of panorama.

In the theatre Taylor delivered his famous orations, which were published weekly by Carlile under the title of "The Devil's Pulpit."

The Rotunda was also used for political meetings, for Carlile intended it to be "a capitol of public virtue, the nucleus for a reformation of abuses, the real house of Commons—in the absence of a better —the palladium of what liberty we have."

The Government of the day became alarmed and attempted through the military to stage a riot, but this was foiled by the coolness of Carlile, who ordered the doors of the building to be locked.

It was not long before both Carlile and Taylor were in prison. Carlile was sentenced for sedition, while Taylor was convicted on a charge of blasphemy.

Until their release their place at the Rotunda was taken by Eliza Sharples, daughter of a Bolton manufacturer. She was a brilliant orator and was known as "The Lady of the Rotunda."

Carlile bequeathed his body for dissection, and it was taken to St. Thomas's Hospital, then in Southwark. An oration was delivered by Richard Dugard Grainger, F.R.S., a distinguished anatomist, who had formerly been the proprietor of the Webb Street School of Medicine.

Richard Carlile was undoubtedly the genuis of his age, and it is a matter of regret that the B.B.C. should have declined the offer of a broadcast on the superb master of plain English commonsense by the eminent writer, Mr. G. D. H. Cole.

HITLER'S FRIENDS ATTACK THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR

The Duke of Bedford's Critics Answered

On Tuesday, March 2, the Duke of Bedford moved the motion in defence of conscientious objectors which was stated in full in our February columns.

The press reports of the Duke's speech and its reception make interesting commentary on the wisdom of our legislators and the insanity of our times.

The Duke's speech was the fourth that he has made in the House of Lords since he signed the roll and made an affirmation, having declared that he had a conscientious objection to taking the oath, on Wednesday, December 3, 1941. He is thus the first Duke to affirm instead of taking an oath.

The Duke's third speech was made on Tuesday, July 21, 1942. On that occasion Lord Gainford moved that he be no longer heard. This motion was made when the Duke had reached the point where he was dealing with the scandal of the American Armament firms as revealed in the official Truman Report.

Lord Mottistone supported Gainford's protest, and argued, somewhat absurdly, that the bad practices of American armament firms had no relation to the well-being of the British Empire.

This ridiculous argument was applauded in the conventional daily press. The pen day labourers omitted to point out that Lord Mottistone was a member of the Anglo-German Fellowship as well as a member of the Executive Committee of the Air League of the British Empire. The press applauded Lord Mottistone's opposition to the Duke of Bedford but failed to recall the speech made in the House of Lords on October 22, 1935, by Lord Mottistone in defence of the Italians. Here is an extract from Lord Mottistone's speech, which was reproduced and applauded in the very press that demands that the Duke of Bedford be silenced for his opposition to war and his defence of the conscientious objector. Their Lordships, the same folk as abhor the Duke of Bedford to-day, approved of the following observations made by Lord Mottistone:—

> On the one hand were millions of bloodthirsty tyrants to whom it was proposed to send arms, on the other the honourable and humane army with 100,000 or 150,000 mouths to feed and boldly stating that those who came under their protection should have their share of food. . . . It was a wicked thing to connive at sending arms to these cruel, brutal men while denying them to others who were playing an honourable part.

The "honourable part" faction being the Italian invaders, now expelled by British arms! To-day Mottistone applauds the Abyssinians and denounces the Italians!

The reception accorded to the Duke's fourth speech was not much better than that accorded to his third speech.

"The Evening Standard", London, for March 2, heads its report:—

BEDFORD PLEADS FOR OBJECTORS.

The letter-press begins:—

> The Duke of Bedford demanded in the Lords to-day that the right to conscientious objection to fire watching and to work ordered by the Ministry of Labour be recognised.

It summarises, not unfairly, part of the Duke's speech, and proceeds to reproduce Viscount Elibank's reply under the sub-heading:

"HELPING THE ENEMY."

Viscount Elibank said that the Duke of Bedford's speeches were directed to what he frankly called helping the enemy. His speech on conscience had been devoted to trying to assist section of community to evade their civic duties.

The "Standard" quoted four passages from Elibank's speech:—

> The Duke of Bedford's attitude towards this war is one that every patriotic man and woman deeply resents and I might almost say despises.
> It would seem that conscientious objectors were trying to create a position for themselves by which they would have a fully-fledged Beveridge scheme of their own responsibility.
>
> They wish to be pampered darlings of the community, he said.
> From the cradle to the grave they would bear no responsibility. Like the lily of the field, they would toil not, neither would tey spin.

But when did Viscount Elibank toil or spin? And is not the passage a slight perversion of the words as used by Jesus of Nazareth in whose divinity Viscount Elibank is supposed to believe? Does not the reference to the Beveridge scheme indicate the class opposition of Viscount Elibank to the common people who make the mass sacrifice in all wars? As to pampered darlings, and the resentment of patriotic men and women, might we not call the working man's and woman's attention to a book written by G. H. Perris in 1914, entitled "The War Traders."

The present Viscount Elibank succeeded to the title in 1927. Perris quotes from a report published by a Committee of the House of Lords in the case of his father the following conclusion:—

> We think it within our province to express our strong opinion that there should be henceforth an inflexible rule to preclude those who hold any public office from entering upon speculative transactions in stock and shares.

Does this report not suggest the existence of pampered darlings of patriotism, or of political finance; an attitude calling for patriotic resentment; scheme without responsibility; and a slight suggestion of the lily that toils not neither does it spin?

G. H. Perris, in his book "The War Traders", already quoted, pages 91-92, wrote:—

> The tongue of scandal wags if a Minister sells a piece of land to the Government in which he holds a place. . . . But the purchase of warships, guns, ammunition, and other supplies from companies in which friends, relatives, and supporters of Ministers are managers, directors, or shareholders is part and parcel of the British governing system. . . . It is, apparently, quite in order for a director of one of these companies to demand, from his place in the House of Commons, greater expenditure, some of which will go into the pockets of his firm. It is not simply in order, it is a proof positive of patriotism, that the leaders of a great Party should set themselves to create a cloud of panic which will presently burst in a blessed rain of dividends among their followers.

Viscount Snowden, then plain Philip Snowden with no idea of ever becoming a member of House of Lords, speaking in the House of Commons in 1914 of M.P.s who were directors or shareholders in armament firms, said:—

> "Now, who are the shareholders? It would be too long for me to give more than a very short selection from the list, but I find that honourable members in this House are very largely concerned. Indeed, it would be impossible to throw a stone on the benches opposite without hitting a member who is a shareholder in one or other of these firms."

And these are the people who condemn the Duke of Bedford for being a Pacifist and defending conscience in war-time!

In 1939, Victor Gollancz published "Tory M.P." by Simon Haxey. This work was boomed at the time by the Communist Party. Now, we presume, they want to intern everyone who dares to read much less circulate this intriguing exposure of the racket of militarism and war. The third chapter of this work, pages 62-69, is an amazing indictment. The author asks:—

> How far has the position changed since 1914? Among the most important Conservative M.P.s interested in armaments to-day are the following:
> Rt. Hon. Sir John Anderson (Conservative M.P. for Scottish Universities), Director of Vickers (until his promotion to the Cabinet.
> Rt. Hon. L. S. Amery (Conservative M.P. for Sparkbrook), Director of Cammell Laird.
> Sir Eugene Ramsden (Conservative M.P. for North Bradford), Director of B.S.A.
>
> Sir Patrick Hannon (Conservative M.P. for Moseley), Director of B.S.A.
> These are only a few examples of directors of the most important firms. The number of Conservative M.P.s are directors of concerns very closely inttrested in armaments.

Concerning Vickers and Sir John Anderson, the author remarks:—

> Sir John Anderson, it is interesting to note, was first elected for the Scottish Universities at a by-election on the 21st of February, 1938. At the seventy-first Annual General Meeting of Vickers on April 1st, 1938, it was announced that he had been "elected during the year", and his directorship was confirmed for the first time by the shareholders ("The Times" report, April 2nd, 1938).

Amery, of course, is now a member of the House of Lords — one of the Anti-Bedford Majority.

On August 11, 1929, the City Editor of Lord Beaverbrook's "Sunday Express" wrote:—

> The four big British railway companies have altogether eighty-nine directors. There are twenty-five who are either earls, viscounts, or baronets, and thirty who are knights or have some other title which may justify an ercellent West-End drawing-room reputation, but does not appear especially suited to the control of our big railway companies.

The peers among these will have inevitable war-interests. If they are not fit to control a railway, why should they be deemed fit to decide the critical policy of an empire? But when they silence the Duke of Bedford they are grand fellows, far-seeing, intelligent, statesmen, patriots, eh! What logic!

With these facts in mind let us turn to the reports.

Here is "The Daily Mail", London, for March 3. Bold display headlines and the opening paragraph in heavy type read:—

"I DESPISE DUKE'S ATTITUDE."

Retort in Lords.

> The pacifist Duke of Bedford received a firm "No", and some strong criticisms last night when he tried to get the House of Lords to agree that conscientious objectors should be able to claim exemption from fire watching.

Then follows a very brief summary of the Duke's speech, Elibank's retort, and the Earl of Munster's declaration that "the duke's allegations about prison conditions were 'completely untrue.'" Everyone who has been a prisoner knows that the Duke was right and the Earl wrong. Even the Communist Party knows this. Even Gallacher's experience must contradict his suddenly emerged capitalist patriotic prejudice in this matter.

"The News Chronicle", London, heads its report:

PACIFIST DUKE TRIES AGAIN BUT FINDS LITTLE SUPPORT IN LORDS.

Its report opens:—

> For nearly an hour yesterday the House of Lords listened in silence to the Duke of Bedford, pacifist, pleading that conscientious objectors . . .

The report concludes:—

> A motion by the Duke embodying his plea was rejected with what appeared to be an overwhelming majority, without a division.

"The Times", London, published an excellent summary of the speech but made no effort to cite the cases instanced in the Duke's speech. In its review of Parliament it said:—

> Earlier, the House listened to a long argument by the Duke of Bedford in support of his motion to extend the right of conscientious objection to fire-watching and compulsory work ordered by the Ministry of Labour. The motion had the support of the Bishop of Birmingham and Lord Ponsonby, but Lord Elibank condemned in unsparing terms the Duke of Bedford's general attitude to the war.
> Lord Munster . . . flatly contradicted allegations made by the Duke of Bedford about prison conditions.
> When the motion was put the voices against it were overwhelming, and a division was not challenged.

"The Daily Herald", London, headed its report simply:—

LORDS REFUSE C.O. PLEA.

Our contemporary should have added that the Lords rejected the Reform Bill, and before that, refused Lord Byron's plea in defence of the Luddites. But Byron was right and the Reform Bill became law.

"The Liverpool Post" headed its report:—

C.O. TRIBUNALS ACCUSED OF PREJUDICE.
Duke's Fire-Watching Plea Rejected.

The report opened:—

A plea by the pacifist Duke of Bedford . . .

It proceeded to report part of the Earl of Glasgow's speech:—

The Earl of Glasgow said that tribunals consisted of men of integrity who carried out their duties conscientiously. Some 70,000 religious objectors had received recognition.

This statement is incorrect and opposed to the figures issued by the Ministry of Labour. We shall show that accuracy is not the Earl of Glasgow's strong point. Nir is consistency.

"The Eastern Daily Press", Ipswich, headed its report:—

C.O.s WANT TO BE "PAMPERED."

"The Birmingham Gazette" headed its report:—

FIREWATCHING EVERYBODY'S DUTY—
Dr. BARNES.

Beneath this underlined heading, its letterpress stated:—

From Our Parliamentary Correspondent.

Dr. Barnes, the Bishop of Birmingham, in making a plea for an end of the cat-and-mouse treatment of conscientious objectors, in the Lords yesterday said firewatching was everybody's duty.

He was speaking in the debate on a motion by the Duke of Bedford. . . .

Once again the Duke of Bedford treated the Lords to a long and dreary recital of his views, and once again he was warmly repudiated—and. indeed, given to understand that some of his statements were untrue and his accusations unfounded.

The summary of his speech was fair enough, but none of his factual statements were given.

"The Aberdeen Press and Journal" also summarised fairly without giving instances. It headed its report:—

Civil Defence.

EVASION OF DUTY A CRIME.

"The Cambridge Daily News" headed its concise but unbiassed report:—

C.O. FIREWATCHERS.
Duke of Bedford's Demand.

"The Northants Evening Telegraph" used the following headlines:—

HE WANTS PEACE WITH HITLER.

Duke of Bedford's "New Fire-Watching Plan."

Beneath these unfair headlines a completely fair report was published.

"The Nottingham Guardian" published a leader upholding the Earl of Glasgow's figures, which are not correct, and eulogised Viscount Elibanks "pampered darlings" remarks.

"The Yorkshire Evening Post", Leeds, published an excellent brief report beneath the heading:—

PACIFIST DUKE'S PLEA FOR C.O.s

"The Liverpool Evening Express" headed its report, which was scrupulously fair, but omitted, like the other reports, cases instanced:—

DUKE'S PLEA FOR C.O.s.

"The Daily Telegraph", London, published a sober and impartial report. It summarised the general factual statement but omitted the instances given.

"The Daily Telegraph" commentary, however, oozed bias and headed "Slow Motion", it said:—

The Duke of Bedford who has had previous experience of addressing an obviously unsympathetic House of Lords, underwent it again yesterday, when he sought to secure recogniton of the right of conscientious objectors to fire-watching and work ordered by the Ministry of Labour.

Several of their lordships were observed to have relapsed into the condition recently described in the House by the Archbishop of York, when he admitted that he had sometimes been present in body but not in spirit.

After a debate of over an hour and a half the motion was rejected without a division.

"The Manchester Guardian", true to its great radical traditions, and to some of the traditions of Manchester, published a sober report. It did not give the Duke's instances but it published a leaderette the following day, March 4, which explained part of the Duke's argument. This editorial reads:—

Regarding the imprisonment of some Quakers who have refused to register for firewatching, which was a point in the Duke of Bedford's speech yesterday in the Lords, probably a score of men and several women are concerned. These objectors do not object to changing their job to do other civil work or to do firewatching, but will not do so under the forms prescribed for all by the Employment Order, and will not register as firewatchers. That, they consider, would be taking part in the national total mobilisation for war.

One Quaker woman, Dr. K. Lonsdale, who has completed a month in Holloway, is the mother of three children and an X-ray research worker. Several women Friends or attendants at Quaker meetings who are in prison are under twenty. Some have been in Strangeways Prison, and have been allowed to attend there the Quaker meetings for men conscientious objectors.

"The Birmingham Mail" headed its excellent report:—

PRISON TREATMENT OF OBJECTORS.
PROTEST BY DUKE OF BEDFORD.
"MIXED WITH CRIMINALS."

Its lengthy summary of the Duke's speech cited, without names, two of the cases he instanced.

"The Glasgow Daily Record" headings were:—

C.O.s WOULD MAKE THREE DIVISIONS.
THEY HELP HITLER.

The Glasgow "Bulletin", in a splash heading said:—

DUKE'S SPEECHES HELP ENEMY,
PEER DECLARES.

"The Manchester Daily Dispatch" heading was spread over 3 columns and consisted of italicised caps, which read:—

PEERS ATTACK DUKE OF BEDFORD'S C.O. PLEA.

"The Daily Express", London, published a sneering summary of which we give the headings and opening paragraph:—

C.O.s ARE "PAMPERED DARLINGS."
Duke Fails to Free Them From Fire Watch.

By WILLIAM BARKLEY.

A grotesque motion—or notion—by the tall, ascetic, grey-haired, bullet-headed Duke of Bedford, advocate of peace by negotiation, to permit conscientious objection to firewatching was laughed down in the House of Lords last night.

It might seem absurd that a fairly full House should have considered such a question for nearly two hours.

The report concluded:—

SHOUT OF DISSENT.

In point of fact, when the debate was over the duke said nothing. and by a general shout of the Lords' formula of dissent, "Not content", this motion that fire-watchers should have a conscience was defeated without calling any further vote.

The episode gave peers the opportunity to say what they think of conscientious objectors in general.

In another column, Thomas Driberg, M.P. (William Hickey) publishes an account in his column under the heading "Noble talk."

Describing how he was squeezed in the tiny gallery next to a young soldier from Alberta, who wanted to hear Lord Bennett speak, Driberg added:—

Instead, he heard the Duke of Bedford deliver, in faint, plaintive monotone, a long speech in defence of conscientious objection to fire-watching.

I explained in a whisper that the Duke was a pacifist. "Blasphemy", muttered the Canadian. . . .

"What a wonderful country we are!" said a woman coming out (meaning, obviously, to allow such talk as Bedford's).

And how perversely we react to rhetoric. Bedford was in a minority of two or three; yet two gusty, blimpish specches (of the put-'em-up-against-a-wall-and-shoot-'em variety) which followed his were in their opposite way just as distasteful.

"In other countries they would be shot", said another onlooker.

"That's one of the reasons why we're fighting Other Countries", said a third.

A syndicated editorial, entitled "The Pacifist Case", appeared in the "Oxford Mail", "Yorkshire Observer", and "Nottingham Journal." This essay complained that the Duke overstated his case, objected to Dr. Barnes for believing that the early Christians were conscientious objectors, but concluded reasonably on this note:—

There is substance in the Bishop's protest against the "cat and mouse" treatment of sincere objectors. The position of authorities confronted with people who persist in refusing to do any public service whatever is difficult. But there must be some better way out of the difficulty than that which now seems to be followed. Once a man has established to the satisfaction of a competent tribunal that he is a really "conscientious" objector, need he be harried by perpetual arrests and re-arrests? Who gains by this process?

"The Yorkshire Evening Post" headed its leader, "Moral Defeatism" and placed the Duke's "defeatism speech" on the same "footing of importance with a war worker's absenteeism." It said of his motion:—

The shirkers' charter proposed by the Duke of Bedford is a product either of sheer irresponsibility or of moral surrender.

To crown the attack on the Duke, "The Times", London, maintaining its prestige of reaction, published the following letter in its columns for March 5:—

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—The Duke of Bedford speaks of "conscientious objectors" being sent to prison. Surely this is a misnomer in the case of persons whose claim to be so recognized has been rejected by a competent tribunal. I think a more accurate designation would be "conscientious pretenders." Yours faithfully,

A. HOLLOM,

Rolvenden, Hook Heath, Woking, March 3.

The Duke replied very effectively to this biassed nonsense in a letter to the editor, which our contemporary published in its issue for March 17:—

Sir,—I wonder how your correspondent Mr. A. Hollom, who has such a high opinion of the fairness of tribunals that he terms all conscientious objectors who are turned down by them "conscientious pretenders", would explain the fact that, although some of the appellate tribunals are themselves by no means free from unfair bias, in 8,131 cases out of 16,264 which came before them the appellate tribunals altered the decisions of the local tribunals, almost always in favour of the objectors?

Yours very truly,

BEDFORD,

Cairnsmore, Newton Stewart, Wigtonshire, March 13.

"The Forward", Glasgow, for March 6, published the following query from a reader, concerning the Earl of Glasgow, who was the Duke's most bitter opponent:—

"Is the Earl of Glasgow, who has just been telling the House of Lords that 'conscientious objectors play into the hands of Hitler', the gentleman who went to Nuremberg to the Nazi Congress and was one of General Franco's most prominent supporters in this country?"

The answer is in the affirmative. The Earl of Glasgow was a member of the Anglo-German Fellowship and brother-in-law of Sir Thomas Inskip, formerly M.P., and now sitting in the Lords as Viscount Caldecote.

The Earl of Glasgow asked in the House of Lords, on May 18, 1938, concerning the Fascist invasion of Spain:—

Why this country should insist on the withdrawal of the Italian troops from Spain before they had finished the work they were sent there to do.

The Earl of Glasgow objected to the British Government's request to Franco to abstain from acts of vengeance on his entry into Barcelona. In February, 1939, a motion, in his name, for a Lords' debate, averred that the message was "unnecessary and not in the interests of the British Empire."

The Earl of Glasgow's Hitler's flirtations were exposed in "The Word", for August, 1940. In this issue we indicted, also, a number of peers who were definitely the friends of Hitler in Britain. A few copies of this issue can be obtained still and should be circulated. Here are listed some of the friends of Hitler, the men who built up Hitlerism, who betrayed Socialist Spain, and who shout down the Duke of Bedford in the House of Lords. Above all, they hate conscience and so affect patriotism after having pursued a policy which has entrenched Fascism in Europe and sacrificed the youth of the world to the crime of power, war and totalitarianism.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Mr. Aldred,—You will be interested to learn, if this adds to your information, that The Secretary of State for Scotland seems keenly interested in the National Fire Service inasmuch that he represents the No. II region (Scotland. See "The Struggle of the A.F.S." (free) from The Fire Brigades Union, Bouverie House, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4.

My interest in Tommy Johnston being there is to find out whether he is interested in a new device that has been suggested for dispersing crowds whereby the people are drenched with water. The ground being wet, circuits would be made with electrical generators on lorries specially despatched to any district to "pay out" their copper wire ground conductors whilst a spray would be sent over the heads of the crowd. The voltage used may not be powerful enough to cause electrocution, but there certainly would seem to be some shocking times ahead if members of The National Fire Service could be brought to use this gentle means of maintaining established authority.

Whilst the writer was serving as a fireman it was always his policy to refuse to use a fire-hose for any other purpose than fire extinction. Some M.P. (Labour! ! ! ?) should insist that this means of assembly dispersion should be made illegal.

With all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

J. DUNCAN.

Romsey, February 10.

Dear Sir,—I wish you could see you way clear to publishing your paper every fortnight as a month is a long time to wait for a further copy of such interesting and illuminating matter. Papers containing dope and lies circulate daily, and it seems a pity such papers as "The Word" are only able to appear monthly. Such is life!

Best wishes.

I remain, yours truly,

(Miss) A. E. DRAPER.

Newquay, Cornwall.

Dear Comrade,—I have been unable to obtain paper since last August and miss it very much. Although "The Word" does not have the sting of the old "Herald of Revolt" it helps a lot in argument against the blood bath.

Best wishes.

Yours fraternally,

W. H. TAYLOR.

Blackfriars, London, S.E.

Dear Comrade,—"The Word" is very encouraging and a real tonic in these times of insanity and strife.

Whilst such papers as the "News of the World" can boast a circulation round about four millions it offers little hope for reason and goodwill. It is indeed surprising that people do not learn from past experiences and that history teaches them nought. As ever in wartime much capital is made out in exploiting the tragedy f war especially in recent bombings. When Mr. Churchill talks of making the enemy bleed and burn, which incidentally stiffens the enemies resistance thereby prolonging the hideousness of the war, he is knowingly or unknowingly as much responsible for the tragedies which occur as everyone else who urge for "victory" by long drawn out military methods. Let us rid ourselves of cant and hypocrisy and stand foursquare for God's truth.

Demonstrative Christianity would solve the wreckage of human life both in peace and war. To start with ourselves is the main problem, a difficult job but well worthy, for truly the kingdom of heaven is within. The Source of Life is God, and life abundant is here for all peoples without thns insane scramble, fear and selfishness. He who would be free himself strike the blow.

Yours sincerely,

BERT BREWER.

Hillingdon, 18/2/43.

Dear Guy,—If I recall to your attention your old battle ground of Marble Arch perhaps you will recollect a young and impetuous speaker with Trotskyite opinions, by name John Webster.

In those days you made a great impression upon my immature ideas, your scepticism of logmas, hatred of tyranny and personal integrity, have many times helped me when I have been tempted to take the line of least resistence. Now our paths cross again, united in a common struggle against those forces occult and known, who to-day conspire to enslave the individual with their regimentation and totalitarianism.

Sometimes it seems centuries since I first carried the Red banner, a stooge for the conspiring careerists of the Marxian camp. I have not escaped fortunes of battle; branded as a Fascist by the hordes of the third international whom you have good cause to know have always used the weapon of slander in the hope that some of their filth might stick. Since 1940 I have had to report under Defence Regulation 18A. Perhaps I had better tell you something about the conditions that lead up to this in order that here will be no misunderstanding.

My first break with the Stalinist clique, as you will understand, made me the centre of the C.P.'s most vicious attacks. It did not take me long to understand the nature of the Trotskyist opposition, and to realise that the nature of things went much deeper, and so I broke with the Marxist and Leninist authoritarians. I then brought a group together, which was called the Libertarians based upon a Socialist Individualist outlook. This, in its turn, was broken by its own contradictions. During this period I was still speaking on the platform expressing myself free of all party dogmas. Irish Freedom, Christianity and Slave Morality, the High Priests of Finance, all were dealt with to the confusion of the party dogmatists, I had already incurred the hatred of the various Marxist parties. Now the Jewish Board of Deputies began to take a hand; I was denounced for not attacking Hitler. Through the connivings of these creatures I was hauled along to Marlborough Street several times, on the charge of using insulting words. These charges were dismissed, time and again, by the magistrate, Mr. Sandbach, to the chagrin of my accusers. Then there came a time when I was accused of having said that "the bombs (I.R.A.) in London were as morally justified as the bomb in Munich." Of course, I pointed out that both were morally unjustified. Only, if one believed in violence, and the retributive power of violence, bombs in opposition to Imperialism were in the same category as bombs directed against Dictatorship. However, a police inspector and the public prosecutor demanded the maximum penalty. The magistrate kept some sense of proportion, minimised the alleged offence, and finally gave me one month in Wandsworth jail.

When I came out of prison, my face was seared by barber's rash, due to the poisonous and unclean penny blades which must have been in use for about three months. I left London for Cambridge to recuperate. Here I was accused of sketching in the vicinity of some aerodrome or other. I was detained for many weeks under appalling conditions and then released under the 18A restrictions. I have suffered this restriction since August, 1940.

My ideas are more mature now and less limited by a purely economic or political straight jacket. The last two years have been as intensely lived intellectually as all previous years put together. My political persecution has been followed up by an economic ostracise.

Sometime, maybe, I shall be able to come to Glasgow to speak. It is a pleasure I look forward to. I am glad to feel that I have been able to renew what was one of the most important contacts of my early youth. Guy, although you may not know it I was one of the boyish hooligans who broke up your meetings in Walham Green many years ago. (Don't get the impression that I am now an old man. My age is 29) at the instigation of the Y.C.L. My short contact with you at Marble Arch was of the utmost importance to me. Friendship is in my opinion the very lifeblood of Revolutionary action and I should like to feel that I as a young man had the friendship of an older and trusted fighter.

Yours in the fight for Individual Liberty,

JOHN ALBAN WEBSTER.

London, W.C.1., February 10.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Just twelve months ago I received my first issue of your splendid paper. At this time I was an adherent of the so-called Communist Party. As a matter of fact I was just beginning to think.

Many things have changed since then, including, of course, the attitude of the "Communists", who, whilst they believe in freedom and democracy, seem to think that "The Word" should be suppressed for not falling in line with most other political parties in the war effort. If their propaganda department works hard enough Mr. Morrison may see their point and accordingly oblige.

Wishing you every success in the struggle that lies ahead.

Yours fraternally,

C. McDERMOTT.

Bryn, near Wigan, February 5.

Dear Mr. Aldred, — After reading this month's "Word", lent to me by a friend, I have decided to become a regular reader of your grand journal.

I was greatly impressed by your attack on the Communist Party. You were correct when you said:—"The Communist Party is the most disgracteful and most corrupt episode in world politics."

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES C. HERVE.

Cranbrook, February 4.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I appreciate your journal. May it go from strength to strength, spreading truth and the reality without fear or reserve.

I was glad to notice the remarks of one of your correspondents, on the evils of vivisection and kindred experiments on the "lower" creation. The whole system is based on falsity, the worship of false values which ultimately will lead to the degradation of humanity. The "research" is a pretence, a cover for unspeakable cruelties practised upon helpless animals. The only way to health is to live in harmony with nature's laws. For over 40 years these pseudo-scientists have performed fiendish experiments upon millions of dumb and innocent creatures and caused dreadful suffering to find a cure for cancer, and they are as far from their goal as ever. Vivisection in any form is an abomination, a foul blot on our covilisation, a canker eating into the moral fibre of the nation. What likelihood is there of the spiritually minded oriental accepting a religion such as our professed Christianity which connives at and countenances such wickedness and cruelty?

The injection of toxic sera into the human body under the plea of "immunisation" cannot fail in the long run to have a most deleterious effect upon the health of the race. It is unnatural and immoral, for all the various sera are obtained by painful experimentation upon animals. The whole thing is morally wrong and is bound up with other evils which afflict our civilisation and "culture." Is a civilisation worth saving which countenances so great an evil? And war is but the eruption of all the pent-up evil forces created by man's perversity—by his idle thinking, his subservience to tradition and convention and tolerance of wrong, however specious the latter may appear to be.

A revolution in thought and action is certainly necessary to rid the earth of the monstrous evils and perversities which plague our society, and I wish you every success in your noble attempt to open men's eyes to reality and truth.

Yours very sincerely,

W. M. WILLOUGHBY.

CHRISTIAN PACIFISM

WHAT IT MEANS TO ME

By Pastor J. RIGBY

(Stour Valley Mission, Blandford, Dorset)

I have attempted to answer the questions: (1) "Why do you love Christ?" and (2) "Who then is this Christ?" There we could finish, for that is the fountain head of Christian Pacifism; but, just as a stream may turn East or West at its source because of the presence or absence of early obstructions, so this stream of vital living can be deflected by early misconceptions or mistakes into other channels. I want to mention briefly three such obstructions.

The first I would say is inconsistency: the running of life in departments without real co-ordination.

You will remember that Christian Pacifism was represented as a way of thinking, feeling and action not only under the challenge of war, but for the whole of life: all day and every day. I think this proves its soundness, as compared with Non-pacifism, militarism, Nazism, and so on. If their ways of re-acting under the challenge of war were applied to the whole of life, the results would be more or less appalling; life would become more and more unworkable. If the Non-pacifist, the militarist, the Nazi, were to allow the spirit of their war-time actions to rule in every department of their life, I think there would be no doubt as to where the secret of successful living and the powers of God could be found.

Allied with this, I would mention crooked thinking. We are all guilty of this. There are some non-pacifists who would be pacifists if they could think straight. At the same time, there are pacifists who would become non-pacifists if they could reason soundly. But under the threat and persecution of war, the crooked thinking of the non-pacifist is likely to go unchallenged and encouraged, whereas the pacifist is compelled by both outward and inward challenges to have some comparatively clear and consistent reasons for acting differently from the great majority.

Not that the reasoning of our conscious mind should always limit or determine our actions. Our actions are governed not only by conscious reasoning, but by unconscious association of ideas — an association which may be either reliable or unreliable. Before such associations are raised to the level and light of consciousness, we are often compelled to accept them and act upon them by the sheer necessities of circumstance; and at such times we have only one rather faulty means of testing them: by feeling. We often feel a thing to be good or bad, reliable or unreliable, before being able to test it by conscious reasoning. Often our feelings are proved right, but occasionally they are proved wrong. In other words, our unconscious association of ideas are often shown to be sound, but occasionally they are discovered to be haphazard and unreliable. Therefore, every attempt should be made to raise such unconscious mental associations to the level and light of consciousness, — or, as Peter said: "Give a reason for the faith that is in you."

A third and surprisingly prevalent cause of the rejection of Christian Pacifism, and the acceptance of Non-pacifism, militarism, Nazism, etc., is a shallow and unbalanced attitude towards sex.

If the instinct of sex is looked upon as essentially impure, it has one of two effects. (1) With some people an attempt is made to banish every suggestion of sex activity from the mind in pursuance of a false "purity." (2) With others, thoughts upon sex activity are accepted, but still accepted as an inevitable impurity. The first become typical "Mrs. Grundy's"; the second, blatant "roues." But both these attitudes are impure, because both make the same false judgment: that sex activity is essentially impure.

Now one cannot make a false judgment about the constitution of one's own nature without causing inward frustration and resultant outward repercussions.

Owing to the economic limitations of present society, the widespread misunderstanding of sex and the rarity of successful sublimation, the sexual side of our nature is often starved, or repressed, or perverted into unsatisfying channels. One way of giving expression to this instinctive compulsion is by cruelty; there is a strong sexual content in the perpetration of cruelty. People who, through repression or perversion, are unsatisfied in the realm of sex, get a "kick" out of being cruel.

The occurrence of war provides a degree of expression for all who have denied the sexual side of their nature its normal and satisfying course, or in difficult conditions have been unable to acquire a channel of sublimation. In war-time, hatred and cruelty become permissible towards another race—who don't matter quite so much. Thousands and perhaps millions of people who to a certain degree, in time of peace, were living out of harmony with their sexual nature, out of harmony with some of their fellows, find through a "legitimate" orgy of cruelty (of greater or lesser intensity) more satisfaction than ever before. Nevertheless, it is still a perverted means of expression.

To my mind, Christian Pacifism includes (by very contact with Christ) not only a consistency and clarity of living, but a right attitude to sex; a successful integration of sex into the art of living, resulting in inward composure and harmony of life, a life pervaded by the spirit of love and good-will—a life which, in its impact upon its surroundings shares its own peace and reconciliation and harmony—not conflict and discord and perversion.

To sum up, Christian Pacifism is acquired by being felt; it is an activity of love towards those who oppose us—because, while we still opposed Him, the living Christ of to-day loved us and gave Himself for us. We love others who oppose us because that is a characteristic of Christ, which we have absorbed from Him; we have absorbed it because we love Him; and we love Him because the living Christ of to-day first loved us. Just as His power of redemption, working through the lives of His servants, has been felt in our hearts, so we believe His power can be felt in the hearts of others with the same result, through our own activity. As more and more of His nature is absorbed into ours, thus He will be enabled to make a stronger and more direct impact upon the self-will of others.

This is our Gospel, our purpose, our distinctive activity; the activity that cannot be deflected or limited or frustrated by a world-full of evil wills,—and in fact, the activity by which the Kingdom of Christ is ever being extended, the activity which shall redeem the world.

PACIFISM, WAR AND SOCIAL REFORM

Dear Mr. Aldred,—In the December issue of "The Word", is an article, entitled "War—Three View Points."

The Non-Pacifist view point is admirably portrayed by excerpts from the Bishop of Chichester's book—"Christianity and World Order." The quotations are very pertinent and present, lucidly, the Non-Pacifist view, e.g., "No Christian can fight, as those serving with modern fighting forces are obliged to fight, save (as it seems to me) with extreme reluctance."

But, very respectfully, we would suggest that this statement ignores the fact that to be an efficient soldier one must, in battle, be ruthless. One cannot use the bayonet effectively, if one uses it "with extreme reluctance."

The Militarist point of view is admirably portrayed, too. The excerpts are taken from Dennis Wheatley's book—"Total War." "Expediency, not morality", he says, "is the sole criterion of human conduct in Total War."

No person, unless ignorant, or biassed, will deny the truth of this statement.

Now, what about the Pacifist position? In the article in question, the attempt is made to present the Pacifist attitude by excerpts from L. Housman's—"What can we Believe?"

But, quite obviously, the quotations, although admirable, are irrelevant. L. Housman, whose works we admire and appreciate, would we are sure be the first to acknowledge the irrelevancy.

It seems to us that M. L. Rowntree, writing in "Peace News" (December 25th, 1942) gives us, in a few words, the Pacifist position. He says:—

Is pacifism politically indifferent, In my view there are strong reasons for saying "no."

Pacifism I hold to be an attitude to, and way of, life which regards every human being as a person of value—not a means but an end. Consequently the pacifist will advocate whatever measures will promote the dignity and well-being of his fellow-men: he will strive for justice and the provision of fullest opportunity for all, so that everyone may be enabled to live a worthy and happy life.

The pacifist, in virtue of his respect for man, will contend for the human rights of all rather than for the special privileges of any: he will support oppressed individuals and groups everywhere in their struggle against the domination of power, property, race, or class.

Support by pacifist methods for the rights of the underdog is not class war: it is co-operation in the struggle for the abolition of class. Such co-operation is a natural outcome of the true valuation of every human being which is the essence of pacifism.

In advocating the changes essential to bring about this greater opportunity for mankind the pacifist seeks always to direct his appeal to the best in man. Since the appeal to the best cannot be made through use of coercion but only through persuasion, his method will be non-violent.

We are writing to you, Mr. Aldred, not because we desire to be unduly critical, but because we are anxious that the pacifist view shall be made unmistakably clear.

It is our uncompromising conviction that the spirit of Christ's teaching and mass murder are incompatible. It seems to us that we have two alternatives—either to reject the Nazarene or to follow Him. Thus the way of compromise lies between two courses, with neither the ruthlessness to be efficient in the world's ways and weapons, nor the recklessness to be constructive saints.

It is important to remind ourselves that the example of Jesus does not rule out the use of hallowed force. It is possible to hallow force "provided it is used in fulfilment of love's purpose and by means consistent with love's end."

But, obviously, by no argument can modern war be regarded as a hallowed use of force. Violence, whatever the circumstances, cannot be hallowed. We hate and renounce War. It is legalised totalitarian murder and, as a means of settling international disputes, modern war is the last word in criminal lunacy.

In conclusion, Mr. Aldred, we would thank you for "The Word." We should be sincerely sorry not to have it each month.

In the attempt to preserve one's sanity, one is helped tremendously, in these dehumanising days, by reading books and periodicals that refuse to come into step with the crowd.

Yours very sincerely,

GEORGE SHILTON EVANS,

JEHOVAH WITNESSES

Jehovah Witnesses are accused, often, by Tribunals and Courts in Britain of being cowards or Nazi agents because they adopt an attitude of uncompromising resistance to war. The absurdity of this charge is established by the fact that Jehovah's Witnesses exist in most nations and meet with similar experiences under all governments, because of their opposition to war. They have suffered persecution and death under the Nazi and Fascist dictators. Evidence of this fact is to be found in the following reports:

"Ludwig Curnaek, chairman of the International Bible Society in Germany, has been sentenced to death by a Dresden tribunal. Justifying the sentences, the tribunal said that their activities endangered the social and national welfare of the German people and hampered the war effort."—"Sunday Express," March 23, 1941.

"A peasant in a small Hungarian town has been sentenced to ten months' imprisonment for spreading the teaching of the 'Witnesses of Jehovah' sect.—"Cavalcade," May 2, 1941.

"It is not without interest to note that these same Jehovah's witnesses have been in evidence in Germany. A group of them were tried by a German Military Court. . . . Ludwig Zyranck, their leader, was sentenced to death. Sentences passed upon the others ranged from three years to five years hard labour."—"Eastern Daily Express," October 31, 1941.

"Several members of the International Bible Searchers movement, which is prohibited in Germany, are now on trial before a Munich special court, it is reported. The movement is described in a legal paper as one which 'spreads pacifist ideas, thus endangering the nation.' For this reason, it is added, it must be suppressed without mercy." — "Manchester Guardian," July 13, 1939.

"On September 16, 1939, for example, the following report was broadcast from Hamburg: 'August Wigmann has been executed for refusal to join the ranks. He was a member of the Bible Society, and said that being 'Jehovah's witness' he could not take part in warfare.'"—"Eastbourne Gazette," February 28, 1940.

"Leading members of Jehovah's witnesses have been arrested in Hungary and are to be court-martialled say Hungarian newspapers reaching Zurich. It is alleged they were 'subsidised by British Jews to undermine the determination and discipline of the home front.'" (Reuter)—"Birmingham Gazette, October 29, 1942.

We do not agree with the theology of the Jehovah's Witnesses, but at least these facts should be considered when their opposition to war is discussed.

IMPRESSIONS OF "PUNCH."

"Punch", the famous London journal, in its issue for March 10, 1943, reviews the proceedings in the House of Lords on Tuesday, March 2nd. Our contemporary observes:—

The Lords were showing at their best as guardians of that most cherished of British possessions, free speech. Gaunt, greying, inexpressibly grim, the Duke of Bedford stood there to move a motion in favour of the recognition of conscientius objection to fire-watching.

Probably hardly one noble Lord present agreed with a single word of his speech, but he was given a quiet and uninterrupted hearing. The speech lasted for most of an hour, and there was silence the whole time, even when his Grace advocated putting out incendiary fires by a negotiated peace. It was a patently sincere plea for freedom of conscience, and the Duke, sitting alone, gave his critics as silent a hearing as they gave him.

Lord Elibank accused the Duke of trying to aid a section of the community to evade their civil duties. Lord Glasgow, apropos of nothing in particular, mentioned that it was "from the Party opposite" that "all cranks and conscientious objectors come."

The term "the Party opposite" traditionally means the official Opposition, which seemed a bit hard, since fifty per cent. of the Opposition Peers then present were in Army uniform and the other fifty per cent. had had distinguished Navy careers.

Colonel Lord Nathan, just then leading the Opposition, laughed good-naturedly with the rest of the House—except Lord Glasgow (who did not seem to see the joke) and the Duke of Bedford (who apparently does not laugh). Lord Ponsonby having mentioned the case of a man who appeared in Army uniform, explaining that he had not the courage to be a conscientious objector, Lord Munster, for the Government, remarked that everything in official circles was correct, that any statement to the contrary was inaccurate, and that there was no need to do anything about anything.

Then the motion was negatived, not even the Duke voting for it.

The subscription list extends to 8 pages and there are over one hundred acknowledgments on each page. The reader will see that the name of the Duke of Bedford heads the list, closely followed by that of the Marquis of Tavistock. DEFENDING CIVIL LIBERTY.

THE RUSSELL TRADITION.

Bertrand, 3rd Earl Russell, who does not use his title, is the son of the famous Viscount Amberley, who died in 1876, and sacrificed his political career because of his Freethought and philosophical integrity. Lord Amberley was one of the greatest Freethought writers England produced and desired that his sons should be reared Freethinkers. Although the Courts upset his will and repudiated his wishes, his sons, the 2nd and 3rd Earls became Freethinkers and Bertrand Russell is, as everyone knows, the outstanding Rationalist writer of our time.

Viscount Amberley's father was Lord John Russell, afterwards the first Earl Russell. He was the third son of John Russell, the 6th Duke of Bedford, who supported William Hone at the time of his 1817 trials for publishing his famous parodies.

The sixth Duke succeeded his brother, Francis, in 1802. As pointed out in these columns for November, 1940, this Duke, on January 25, 1795, moved a resolution in an hostile House of Lords, in opposition to the war on revolutionary France. He defended the French Revolution. This is the Duke whose statue was defaced by some stupid vandals in November, 1941. Persons who oppose rightly the defacing of the Lenin Memorial in London made no protest against the earlier vandalism. We do not believe much in statues or memorials in wood and stone, but we are opposed to all vandalism. The mentality of the vandal is the same whether he is attacking a memorial or ripping up a cinema seat. In any case, it should be remembered that Francis, fifth Duke of Bedford, supported only by Dr. Watson, the celebrated Bishop of Llandaff, defended the French Revolution in the House of Lords. A very brave gesture to make in those days in opposition to the coalesced fears and interests of the peers. In 1803, Charles James Fox paid a tribute to the Duke's public affection and belief in civil and religious liberty in one of his most famous speeches in the House of Commons.

Like his brother, the sixth Duke stood for the reform of Parliament and defended vigorously the Freedom of the Press, supporting Hone publicly against his prosecutions for his immortal parodies. He was also a member of the Society of Friends of the People.

The period during which the fifth Duke defended the French Revolution and opposed military war on ideas, and the sixth Duke upheld parliamentary reform and pressed the propaganda of the Society of Friends of the People, has been covered in our "life" of Richard Carlile. To further understand the tremendous iniquities of that time imposed on the common people in England by laws and customs, one ought to read "The Village Labourer" by J. L. & B. Hammond. For Scotland, the period is covered by Thomas Johnston in his work, entitled "The History of The Working Classes in Scotland." The strain and starvation endured by the common people in England was insupportable. Bands of protests arose, and these social protestants were knowns as Luddites. And so, over a period of time, Chartism developed, to make way, in the forties of last century, for Socialism. In 1812, Lord Byron made to an intensely opposed House of Lords his famous speech in defence of the Luddites, which survives as one of the masterpieces of eloquence uttered in defence of the poor and outraged against the callousness of their exploiters. The sixth Duke of Bedford approved of Byron's protest and identified himself with his sentiments.

The sixth Duke was asked to serve on a Lord's Committee of enquiry into the Luddite disturbances of 1816. He replied, in a powerful letter to Lord Grenville, in which he stated that his Irish experience in 1806, had forced him to the conviction that the ordinary law, and not strong or repressive measures, were sufficient to quell the disturbances. He suggested, also, that grievances must be redressed. Against his advice, the Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act and "for preventing seditious meetings" became law and so the Richard Carlile period of struggle opened.

The sixth Duke encouraged his son Lord John Russell to return to politics, which he had abandoned, and to the House of Commons, on February 26, 1817, to speak against the proposal to take away, even for a short time, "the rights and liberties of Englishmen." Across the lapse of over a century, this sounds like a vigorous protest against 18B.

Attacking the Government mover of the Bill, Lord John Russell said:—

"Without waiting to ask if they had been loyal, if they have been reticent under suffering, and enduring in the depths of misery, he turns to them and says: 'Because you are starving, you shall be deprived of the protection of the ordinary laws, your only remaining comfort.'

"We talk too much of the wisdom of our ancestors. I wish we would imitate the courage of our ancestors. Anxious as I am for reform, I am still more anxious that the House shall preserve the respect of the people."

The present Duke of Bedford, in his defence of conscience and civil and religious liberty in the present House of Lords, seeks to imitate the courage of his ancestors.

Sir Francis Burdett followed Lord John Russell, and stated that the name of Russell was associated with the struggle for liberty, "in defence of which his revered ancestor lost his life."

As everyone knows, the appeal was made in vain and the reactionary measures became law. To-day, no one defends them.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

By

The Rev. F. H. Amphlett Micklewright, M.A.
Minister, Southampton Unitarian Church, and Minister-to-be of Cross St. Unitarian Chapel, Manchester.

[The following article is the text of a sermon delivered by our comrade Micklewright, at Southampton, on Sunday, February 7, 1943. By the time this address is printed, Mr. Micklewright will have taken up his duties at Cross St. Chapel, Manchester. This famous chapel was founded by Henry Newcombe, an ejected minister, in 1672. The present building, much blitzed, dates from 1693. The first M.P. for Manchester, Mark Phillips, was a member of this chapel. Its ministers included the prominent radical reformers, Dr. Barnes and Ralph Harrison. One of its most famous ministers was the Rev. William Gaskell, husband of the novelist, who occupied the Cross St. pulpit for 56 years—1821-1884. Under Amphlett Micklewright, the pulpit will become a sounding board of progress, culture, civil liberty, and radical thought.—Ed.]

Unitarianism has stood historically for the liberty of the individual. It has contended that he has a right to his own views on religion without reference to some preconceived authority and that he has a right to civil liberty; the duty of the state is that of the protection of the liberties of the individual citizen. These views are an historic evolution; they had their rise with John Locke in the Seventeenth Century and represented the best side of Puritan development. We find them proclaimed during the Eighteenth Century and influencing some of the broader thinkers of the time; they formed the background of the group of scholars and divines who welcomed the coming of the French Revolution. Nearly a hundred years ago, they shaped the doctrine of J. S. Mill and the Victorian Radicals. The individual should be free to do as he will provided that he does not so use his liberty that the freedom of others is imperilled. It is not too much to say this dogma of liberty lies at the root of English democracy. It is more than a particular Unitarian expression; it forms the vital element of the conception of the free man in the free state.

At the moment, we are in the midst of an awful war. We were assured by the late Prime Minister—like Brutus, an honourable man—that it is a war for freedom and democracy. Every effort has been made to contrast the attitude of the Western democracies with that of the Axis powers. We have been reminded without ceasing that, whereas opinion is free in England and America, it is tied in Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. We have been told of the horrors of the concentration camp, of the rubber-truncheon, of the S.S. Men. The menace of the dictator hangs over Europe and the call has gone forth that he should be defeated. Such a war is a war of ideologies; it is a battle between those who believe that the individual should be free and those who want him bound. Democracy as a political belief involves the freeing of the individual, it regards him as at liberty to profess what political or religious opinions he will, it protects his liberty to criticize the state as it exists, it permits him to advocate changes of government and creed. Above all, it insists that conscience shall be free; no man shall be forced to profess any opinion or undertake any course of action which lies contrary to his conscience.

The issue is brought to the fore in Unitarian Churches by the imprisonment of the Rev. Sidney Spencer, minister of Hope St. Unitarian Church, Liverpool. Mr. Spencer is one of the best-known of ministers—he is also, at this moment, a convict in gaol. On February 5, at Liverpool Police Court, he was convicted for the third time for the same initial offence—a refusal to register for fire-watching. Mr. Spencer had been fire-watching for many months but he refused as a pacifist to recognise the legal right of the state to assist the war-effort by compelling him to do so. As there is no conscience clause in civil defence matters, Mr. Spencer was twice fined—an unknown person paid the fines against his will. Upon being convicted for the third time, he was sent to prison for one month. Honour and law were vindicated by taking away a minister who is well-known for his social work and lodging him in gaol as a common criminal. The press has been silent for the most part; the incident has been passed over and Mr. Spencer languishes in his cell, a victim to his conscience which does not recognise the corporate state and the war method.

The state is the organ for the protection of individual liberty of conscience and action; I therefore feel the imprisonment of Mr. Spencer as a shame, a scandal, and a disgrace, to all save the minister whom the law has imprisoned. There are certain things to be said about the legal action and they are very relevant to civil liberty in England. Certainly, there is a war on—it is the same old war for freedom and democracy! But it will be lost in spirit and effect if there are many incidents of this kind to blot its record. We are fighting for high ideals; the ignoring of their practical effects by the persecution of Mr. Spencer and those who think like him means a defeat in the realm of the spirit which any amount of military victories will never compensate. The political views antagonistic to the corporate state which Mr. Spencer urges are not those of a fanatic or a crank; they have a long history and are maintained by some of the higest political philosophers. A disregard for the corporate state is characteristic of a well-known textbook, "Roads To Freedom," by Bertrand by Mr. Bertrand Russell. It is found again in the writings of Lord Ponsonby or Mr. Lowes Dickenson. The anarchist views of the well-known critic and man-of-letters, Dr. Herbert Read, leave no room for it. Mr. Hilaire Belloc once wrote a book entitled "The Servile State," in which he deplored an excess of state-action. The Mahatma Gandhi is a modern staint and thinker who has no use whatever for state-control of thought and conscience. Our long Unitarian tradition revolts against it. One may also suggest that antagonism to an all-powerful state is not unlike the view of Jesus of Nazareth when he urged that, whilst Caesar should receive his own, so too should God be accorded his due. The teaching of the Gospels is in flat contradiction to the attitude that the state may regiment any man's thought, conscience, or opinion. Lord Halifax and various church leaders have regaled us from time to time with stories that the war is a war for Christianity. I have no doubt at all, that, if Mr. Spencer had been a Pole, a Dutchman, or a Norwegian, we should have been entertained by the press and the B.B.C. with accounts of his noble stand for Christian ideals of liberty. Yet, it is for the offence of adopting and acting upon views not unlike the teaching of the Gospels that he is a convict. In wartime, it is still a shocking thing to the conventional mind that anybody should deny with their lips the worth of the teaching of Jesus. It is an even more shocking thing to the same type of mind when some isolated individual takes it seriously and insists upon acting in its light.

There are two aspects of the Spencer case to which I desire to call attention. The one is that the civil defence regulations include no form of conscience-clause. As is well-known, in the case of service in the armed forces, it is permissable to register conscientious objection and to appear before a tribunal where one's claim is sifted. Many persons have done so and, on the whole, it may be said that they have received fair treatment so far as the law is concerned in spite of the fact that some people, inspired by methods of petty spite, have insisted upon disregarding the verdict of tribunals and have dismissed from their employment persons whom the legal tribunal has exempted from service. But in the case of civil defence no such permission or concession is given. One is called upon to register for state service and has no alternative. The result is that citizens holding the views of Mr. Spencer have no exemption, however much they are able to prove that their claims are of long standing and that they have always acted upon them. They have no sort of alternative save to act as Mr. Spencer has acted and to suffer fine or imprisonment. In the midst of a war for liberty, such a legal blockade to freedom of conscience is an open scandal; it should be ended at once by the insertion of a conscience-clause and the hearing of the objection before a properly constituted tribunal. Until this reform takes place, it will be difficult to claim that the state meets its war-time responsibility with a full measure of democracy. Till then, the atmosphere of state-compulsion will continue to suggest the shadow of the dictator. It is all very well to urge that the law is only for wartime and that it will lapse as soon as the war is over. The corporate state is a creation which has arisen out of the bosom of modern Europe. It is marked by many undesirable features and suggests various of the political troubles of our time. It is not the especial invention of Hitler or Mussolini but is one of the marked trends of modern history. If a war for freedom of conscience is to be won, the progress of a bureaucratic state-control must be resisted at every turn or else it will linger on for long after the close of hostilities and will menace human freedom in every land for many years. In a particular detail, this question of the conscience-clause is a matter which arises out of the issue of the corporate state. It is the duty of Unitarians, and of all who possess the long heritage of liberty, to demand this freedom even it be for persons whose views they do not accept in every particular detail.

There is another matter which arises in this connection. Mr. Spencer has committed one initial offence against the existing law—he has refused to register for fire-watching. He has been fined twice and imprisoned once; there is no sort of guarantee that the sentence of one month's imprisonment closes the matter. Had he been a thief, a forger, or a swindler, his offence would have been purged by his first conviction; as his crime is one of conscience, the power to convict continues indefinitely and is acted upon by authority at regular intervals. Various persons throughout the country have suffered in the same way, some have received far longer sentences. This treatment is known as "cat-and-mouse." It militates against all elementary notions of justice which, in other matters, acts upon the principle of one sentence for one offence. The method, which can only be described as despicable, was first used during the suffragette agitations, when several women were treated in this kind of way. It came into prominence in dealing with conscientious objectors during the last war; a period during which such high-minded citizens as Bertrand Russell, Lord Allen of Hurtwood, and E. D. Morel were imprisoned through the prevailing fanaticism. At the opening of this war, we were assured that the method would not be used as it is unjust in principle and can lead to savage cruelty in action. The promise has been broken and, as in the case of Mr. Spencer, it has been used over and over again. It is high time that the government were called upon to carry out the promise and to stop prosecutions of this kind. Their continuance means an outraging of the elementary principles of the theory of justice; it means a free latitude of fanaticism and persecution; it means a slur upon the point of view expressed by Keir Hardie and George Lansbury, great Britishers whose greatness no person of goodwill would dispute. We shall be doing a real public service if, whatever our views on the war, we demand that no man, conscientious objector, anarchist, or anybody else, shall suffer this "cat-and-mouse" penalty which is so contrary to the highest notions of justice and equity. Unitarianism has the long tradition of civil and religious liberty as a part of its heritage; it is time that it became inspired to demand that it should be within public affairs. One of the most disappointing things about the case of Mr. Spencer is that, while strong protest has been made in responsible quarters and the matter is shortly to be raised in the House of Commons by the Rev. Reginald Sorensen, so little of protest has come from avowed Unitarians.

(To be concluded.)

CONSCIENCE IN THE LORDS.

(From Our Own Gallery Correspondent)

The Duke of Bedford made a great statement in defence of civil and religious liberty, and the right of conscience, in the House of Lords, on Tuesday, March 2 last. It has been pretended in the press, by his opponents, that he read his speech. Actually, he spoke from notes, and only read when some strict reference of detail was necessary. The point is of no consequence except in so far as it is part of the campaign to discredit a very bold and a very useful stand made on behalf of democratic rights and privileges. One day, the common people will thank the Duke of Bedford for his present stand.

As the Duke subsequently told the House, he was unaware of the practice of avoiding criticism of the Dominion governments. I cannot say that I felt any regret at his failure to observe the custom.

The New Zealand government richly deserves public censure for its callous and tyrannical behaviour towards pacifists. In the long run this is far more likely to harm the "structure of the Empire" than any failure by a member of the Legislature of Great Britain to avoid standing on the corns of certain statesmen in the Dominions.

Lord Elibank opened his reply to the Duke by an endeavour to create prejudice by a reference to the Duke's advocacy of a negotiated peace. The Duke's attitude towards the question of a negotiated peace has nothing whatever to do with the desirability of securing for conscientious objectors fairer treatment under the laws already passed for their protection; it has nothing whatever to do with the desirability of ending foolish sentences of imprisonment which deprives the country of the services which C.O.s are willing to render; and it has nothing whatever to do with the scandal of a government professing democratic and humane ideals and a hatred of State tyranny, persecuting with heavy fines and imprisonment, high-principled men and women whose conscience do not allow them to obey the orders of the State.

Lord Elibank's quotations from a speech of Lord Snell state the position of one who is opposed to recognising conscientious objection to any but military duties, but neither Lord Snell nor Lord Elibank put forward any arguments which could be regarded as adequate replies to those which the Duke used to indicate the desirability of allowing conscientious objection to industrial conscription and fire-watching. Lord Elibank and Lord Snell were themselves "devoting one conception of duty in a limited sphere to the right of other moral obligations to the community and to right itself", that conception of duty in a limited sphere being the duty of obeying a war government's direction in regard to industrial conscription and fire-watching. Lord Elibank said that he was sure that the country was quite prepared to see that any obviously unfair treatment meted out to C.O.s in prison was remedied. How much chance there was of remedying unfair treatment was later shown when Lord Elibank and the majority of the House accepted without question the Earl of Munster's statement that everything in he prison garden was lovely.

Lord Elibank's reference to the care taken by Lord Elphinstone to arrive at just decisions was no answer to the complaint made of Lord Elphinstone's abuse of function when he declined to recognise the existence of a right of absolute exemption granted by the Act under which he was appointed.

Lord Elibank again misrepresented the Duke when he said that the Duke claimed that the C.O. was unjustly treated by being moved from one part of the country to another. No complaint was made of injustice based solely on the fact that a person was moved from one district to another. Lord Salisbury expressed great concern lest at the end of the debate the Duke should ask leave to withdraw his motion and suggested the Duke should be prevented. The Cecil anxiety was groundless. The Duke had not the slightest intention of backing out!

The Bishop of Birmingham in the course of a friendly speech did not altogether help to secure the remedying of some of the greatest of existing abuses by expressing the opinion that tribunals were generally fair and prison conditions good, as far as his own personal observation went. What he said may have been correct within the limits of what he personally had seen, but we know both from C.O.s and political prisoners that atrocious conditions have existed in several prisons and the fact that even the appellate tribunals reverse about half the decisions of the local tribunals that come before them hardly looks as if the local tribunals were conspicuously fair!

If the Earl of Glasgow had possessed more Biblical knowledge he might have remembered that Jesus on one occasion quoted the commandment as "Thou shalt not kill." The suggestion that we alone are "killing those who are murdering innocent people" is nonsense. In modern war both sides "murder" innocent people. Do we not murder French as well as Axis civilians?

Lord Glasgow is incorrect in suggesting that C.O.s are shot as a matter of course in other countries. They are severely persecuted and imprisoned but are not usually put to death, although some have been executed.

Lord Munster, like Lord Elibank, indulged somewhat freely in misrepresentation. The Duke of Bedford did not suggest that a chaotic state of affairs existed in the fire-watching services due to the inability of watchers to discharge their duties in a reasonable manner. The chaos would appear rather to have existed in Lord Munster's mind when he was listening to the Duke's speech. Lord Munster went on to affirm that the Government is well satisfied with the treatment of C.O.s, which is only too obvious, but he made no attempt whatever to show why the grave evils to which attention had been called should not be regarded as intolerable by a civilised country claiming to be democratic. Lord Munster claimed that he knew a lot about prison conditions and believed them to be excellent and denied that any C.O. at a Borstal institution had ever been deprived of his full ration of food by an official at the Institution. On these questions most Socialists prefer to take the word of those who have suffered, and the evidence of the death of a formerly robust young man to whom prison conditions proved fatal.

ON HONESTY.

'Tis not that we should honest be
In order to be great,
But that our crimes
Should suit the times,
And not offend the State.

'Tis known to all that they who fall,
From stations so devout,
Is not because
They broke the laws,
But that they were found out.

AS THE WAR CONTINUES.

As the war continues its unlovely progress, its utter futility as a means of achieving the aims it was intended to achieve becomes more and more apparent.

In a recent article in "The Word", I called attention to the victory of "Fascism" in our own country. The hostile reception given to my recent plea in the House of Lords for fairer treatment of conscientious objectors, gives additional point to what I wrote. Although the majority of the members of the House are, in normal times and when in their right senses, quite kindly and fair-minded men, they remained completely unmoved by what I told them, even of the persecution of Quaker women and girls and the death of a young man after release from prison as a result of the gross inadequacy of the prison medical service. Just because there is a war on and because my views on the war happen to be unpopular, all I said rolled like water off a duck's back and the Government spokesman had only to say that everything in the garden was lovely for his word to be accepted without further investigation. We need not, therefore, wonder that the German people seem blind to the acts of cruelty and injustice committed by their rulers. What the eye does not see, the heart does nof grieve for, and in times of crisis or war the peoples of all nations are probably alike in being acutely conscious of the shortcomings of neighbouring governments and completely indifferent to those of their own.

Another very significant recent event has been the refusal of Russia to recognize our refugee Polish Government and promise to restore the territory taken from Poland. Thus our major initial war aim, not to mention the Atlantic Charter, goes West, and some of the leading organs of our Government-controlled Press virtually admit that we can do nothing about it! This is no more than the truth, for if there is to be an Allied victory at all, it is now obvious that, as far as Europe is concerned, it will be mainly a Soviet victory. It will be Russia, not Britain or America, who will dominate Europe after the war, and the Soviet Government sets no great store either by freedom or democracy.

Incidentally, the Poles in this country, as far as I have been able to ascertain from different sources, usually fear and dislike Russia even more that they fear and dislike Germany, believing that the Russian Government has been responsible for considerably more Polish deaths. A Polish soldier said not long ago to a friend of mine, "When we get back to our country, we will kill all the Germans and all the Russians and all the Jews." Apparently this Allied soldier has scant regard for yet another of our war aims—the restoration of the Jews and the punishment of their oppressors!

BEDFORD.

TO CHAMPION TRUTH

To champion Truth, and win one's share of bread
Is hard these days of avarice and lies.
With subtle cunning Mammon will devise
Some scheme to still the tongue. At first upbraid
With mocking laughter. If met unafraid,
Then fatherly will be the counsel given.
If still rejected, then by Hell or Heaven,
The spirit will be broken. They lie dead
In many a lonely place, who fought the fight,
Braved to the very gates of Mammon's fort,
No other armour but their faith, and art,
And few did protest at the bloody sight,
When from the leash the hungry hounds of Hate
Tore at the flesh of him who spurned the great.

WHAT'S BEHIND THE BALLYHOO?

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government)

[The following article by our comrade, F. W. Jowett, is reprinted from the "Bradford I.L.P. News," for Friday, March 19, 1943.—Ed.]

In the House of Commons last Thursday (March 11th) the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Kingsley Wood, was asked to state what proportion of the Wings for Victory investments were from banks and insurance companies. He REFUSED TO GIVE THE HOUSE THAT VERY NECESSARY INFORMATION. Whereupon the Labour Member for Middlesbrough (E.), Alfred Edwards, made a good shot at the truth by asking the following supplementary question:—

"Would it not serve a very useful purpose if people realised that not more than 10 per cent. is genuine savings and all the rest is ridiculous ballyhoo?"

To Mr. Edwards' very pertinent supplementary question, Sir Kingsley could only weakly reply:—

"No Sir, and I do not know why he" (Mr. Edwards) "wants to decry these very successful efforts."

Although Sir Kingsley Wood and his predecessor in office (Lord Simon) have done their best to prevent disclosure of the real character and extent of the investments of banks and insurance companies during Warships Weeks, War Weapons Weeks and Wings for Victory weeks, Chairmen of Banks, Insurance Companies and City Editors holding orthodox views on financial questions have occasionally partially revealed some of the facts.

It is evident, however, that even these purveyors of public dope are getting more careful in what they say and leave unsaid; as the result of frequent exposures of the "ballyhoo" of War Savings Weeks.

This is what Oscar Hobson, City Editor of the "News Chronicle," said of the War Weapons Week of 1941:—

"If a bank this week subscribes for £1,000,000 of National War Bonds, what it really does is to REPLACE Treasury Deposit receipts carrying interest at 1¼ per cent. for Bonds carrying interest at 2½ per cent.—THAT IS WHY NO FRESH TREASURY DEPOSITS ARE CALLED FOR THIS WEEK. There might be legitimate reasons for the substitution, but it is very like "ballyhoo" to pretend that it is of the same order of assistance to the war effort as if you decide to forego buying two hundred cigarettes or ten gallons of petrol and put the money into Savings Certificates."

—"News Chronicle," May 19, 1941.

It is necessary to state, however, that the real character of the transaction is only partially revealed by the "News Chronicle's" City Editor. For he doesn't explain, as he surely could if he wished, that EXCEPT WHEN BANKS ARE MAKING INVESTMENTS AS AGENTS FOR THEIR CUSTOMERS, their conversions of 1¼ per cent. Treasury Bills into 2½ per cent. War Bonds are, in fact, buying 2½ per cent. War Bonds with 1⅛ per cent. Treasury Bills which have themselves cost the banks nothing but paper and ink, plus the expense of book-keeping. Proof of the truth of this is the well-authenticated report of the Lord MacMillan Committee to the Government which says with regard to purchase of Government securities:—

". . . by granting loans, allowing money to be drawn on an overdraft, or PURCHASING SECURITIES, A BANK CREATES A CREDIT IN ITS BOOKS which is the equivalent of a deposit . . . THE CHEQUE WHICH IT" (the bank) "DRAWS UPON ITSELF IN PAYMENT FOR THE INVESTMENT is paid into the seller's bank account and creates a deposit of that amount in his name." (F. W. J.'s capitals).

As to the extent of these bankers' and insurance companies' investments during war savings weeks (big money conversions of 1½ per cent. investments into 2½ per cent. investments) one need do no more than quote what Sir George Barstow, Chairman of the Prudential Assurance Co., said at that company's 1942 Annual meeting. This is what he said:—

"In addition to the £10,000,000 we subscribed to the London War Weapons Week in March of last year, we have supported in all over 300 similar weeks throughout the country. We have since carried on the good work by committing ourselves already to supporting 1000 Warships Weeks, including £10,000,000 to the London Warships Weeks."
"Forward," March 28, 1942.

So now we know, on first-hand information, precisely how these big figures of war weeks are swollen to their huge dimensions.

Even on the real savings, the 10 per cent, or whatever the precise proportion of real savings there may be in this huge sum total of War Weeks investments, banks and stockbrokers have a special rake-off, for whilst the Government pays for all the splashed publicity concerning them, banks and stockbrokers get a commission of 2s. 6d. for every £100 that passes through their hands. "A few weeks ago," said "Forward" (February 14th, 1942)

"the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that £875,000 had been handed over to the banks AS COMMISSION for stamping applications for War Loan."

"Last week," "Forward" goes on to state, "in reply to Mr. Sloan, the Chancellor admitted that £696,000 had been paid in commission to stockbrokers who get 2/6 commission on every £100 that passes through their hands."

"A total of £1,571,000 in commission has been collected by banks and stockbrokers out of war loan since the war began."

But the main object of all this "ballyhoo" about war savings weeks is a two-fold one which far transcends in importance all the "rake-offs" and other extortions to which I have already referred. This two-fold object is

(a) to keep up the PRETENCE THAT IT IS NECESSARY TO BORROW MONEY to get "Wings for Victory" or any other service or thing; for it is indeed the truth that a Government by creating its OWN MONEY TOKENS can get ANY THING OR ANY SERVICE TO THE LIMIT OF ALL AVAILABLE MATERIALS AND LABOUR; and

(b) to delude as many millions of working people as possible with the false idea that they will LOSE THEIR SAVINGS if they do not make common cause with the big financiers whenever, at long last, the war may end.

WHEN I THINK OF THIS LIFE.

When I think of this life, how short its span,
Uncertain seasons, and its ways obscure,
So little done by us that will endure,
I grieve me for the foolishness of Man.
How many ages now since Time began?
Our little lives are but a tick of Time,
And yet we wallow, worm-like, in the slime,
Blind to the beauties of this mighty plan.

Groping for wealth, and power, and fleshly lust,
Classes and races divided the whole world o'er,
Killing and maiming and gassing each other in war,
Forgetting that Caesar himself is long since dust,
Beauty, and Joy, and Peace all sacrificed,
Nailed to the Cross, Oh, Lord! like the martyred Christ.

ATHEISM AND CONSCIENCE.

REACTIONARY UNITED STATES APPEAL COURT DECISION

A most reactionary ruling was given by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals on February 8, in the case of Mathias Kauten, the thirty-year-old artist conscientious objector of Tuckalive, N.Y. The Court declared that philosophical and political opposition to war, however sincerely held, was not sufficient grounds to secure exemption from military conscription under the National Training and Service Act of 1940.

Kauten was sentenced to two years' imprisonment last October by Judge Edward A. Conger, in United States District Court, after he failed to report for induction on June 19. He appealed his classification in 1-A on the ground that, by reason of his religious training and belief, he was "conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form."

The Court of Appeals upheld the findings of Lamar Hardy, a special hearing officer, that

"though the registrant may have been entirely sincere in the ideas he expressed, his objections to induction were based on philosophical and political consideration applicable to this war rather than on religious training and belief."

Kauten admitted that he was reared as a Catholic but is now an atheist, or at least an agnostic.

Mr. Hardy's report on Kauten observed that "it is quite obvious that his opposition to the present war is greatly influenced by his dislike of our present administration."

Kauten was quoted as having stated that the Selective Service act

"is a scheme devised by the President to solve the unemployment problem."

A true conscientious objector, the Court of Appeals held, must maintain

"a general scruple against participation in war in any form, and not merely an objection to participation in this particular war. Moreover, the conviction that war is a futile means of righting wrongs, or of protecting the state, that it is not worth the sacrifice, that it is waged for base ends, or is otherwise indefensible, is not necessarily a ground of opposition based on religious training and belief."

This reactionary decision recalls the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1928, upholding the denial of United States' citizenship to Madame Schwimmer, on the ground that she was "an absolute atheist," and "an uncompromising pacifist," with no "sense of nationalism."

Our colleague, Dr. L. H. Coate, in his famous work, "The Conscription of Conscience," points out that the same session of the Supreme Court that denied citizenship to Madame Schwimmer for her refusal to bear arms, granted United States citizenship to a young Italian, named Zangarac, who agreed to bear arms. He took the belief in arms very seriously for, a little later, he shot and killed Mayor Cermack of Chicago, and threatened the life of Roosevelt, then President-elect.

Such is the irony of militarism. Conscience is an integral element of citizenship and cannot be repudiated or questioned. Respect for conscience should be respect in every state that claims to stand for democracy. Opposition to violence, and refusal to subscribe to ideas of violence, are vital factors in the progressive conquest of barbarism by civilisation, properly so-called.

An atheist, of course, if he really subscribes to his philosophy, and is not an indifferentist, is more likely to be conscientious and to possess genuine and deeply rooted scruples than the person who subscribes, without thought, to all the established dogmas of orthodox theology, miscalled religion.

HUMANITY IN WAR.

Midst the hatred of war, and as a corrective of utter desolation, it is urgent to record every act and incident that exhibits the spirit of humanity struggling through the devastation. In June, 1940, we pictured the women and children with flowers ready to place on the graves of the German airmen who crashed at Clacton-on-Sea, Essex. We recorded the brave and simple words of Mrs. Harry Coppin, a British soldier's wife, who went to the funeral. Last month we pictured the funeral of the British soldier, a prisoner of war in Poland, who gave his life to save a German guard. Below we reproduce a story from Tunisia, which was published as front-page news by the News-Chronicle, in its issue for Saturday, April 3, 1943:—

GERMANS HELPED BRITISH M.O. TO SAVE WOUNDED MAN.

Flying the Red Cross pennant on his ambulance, a British medical officer drove into the German lines in Northern Tunisia and, with the help of a German officer, brought away a seriously wounded man and two dead companions.

The medical officer, Lieut. G. F. Barnes, whose home is in London, was watching an action taking place a mile away, in the Medjez area, says Reuter.

British infantry forces had carried out a raid and had reached their objective. They were about to withdraw with prisoners when the Germans unexpectedly counter-attacked.

Lieut. Barnes, seeing that a Bren gun carrier had been knocked out, jumped into his ambulance and made for the German positions.

EXCHANGED SALUTES.

When he was about 20 yards from the enemy lines the Germans beckoned to him. A German officer, scrupulously correct, approached and, after an exchange of salutes, Lieut. Barnes indicated that he wished to take back the crew of the Bren gun carrier.

The German officer ordered his men to place the members of the crew on stretchers and carry them to the ambulance. With Lieut. Barnes at the wheel the ambulance was driven back.

Shortly before Lieut. Barnes drove off on his mercy errand, the enemy had opened mortar-fire on positions near the ambulance, which was standing head-on to their lines. The Red Cross markings on its sides could therefore not be seen, and it was mistaken for a military vehicle.

Another ambulance was driven up and placed in position where the Germans could see the Red Cross symbols. The mortar-fire then ceased.

"CIVIL SERVICE PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP."

"The Third Annual General Meeting of the Civil Service Pacifist Fellowship will be held in London on Monday, May 3rd, at Kingsway Hall, Kingsway, W.C.2 commencing at 6 p.m. It is hoped that our speaker will be Stephen Thorne of the Society of Friends.

"The Fellowship, which has groups in many Departments and has members throughout the country, is established to provide fellowship and assistance to civil servants who, because of their convictions, renounce war. SANDY URBAN COUNCIL.

As we go to press, we have received a special article from our Bedfordshire Correspondent, giving the full political history of every member of the Sandy Urban Council. This interesting record will appear in our next issue. Bear it in mind when reading page 111 of this issue. And order the June issue.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

How Bogus Public Opinion is Manufactured By The Communist Party

Much publicity has been given in the press to a resolution passed by Sandy Urban Council, Bedfordshire, on Monday, March 29 last. We have before us as we write reports from the following papers: Yorkshire Evening Post, Leeds; West Lancashire Evening Gazette, Blackpool; Manchester Daily Dispatch; Western Daily Press, Bristol; Western Morning News, Plymouth; Birmingham Post; Evening Standard, London; Daily Sketch, London; Daily Telegraph, London; Nottingham Journal; Torbay Herald, Torquay; Daily Mail, London; News Chronicle, London; Aberdeen Evening Express; Manchester Evening Chronicle; Evening News, Portsmouth. The report will have appeared in countless other papers, up and down the country.

Different only in size of type the Aberdeen Evening Express, the Oxford Mail, the Manchester Daily Dispatch and the Torbay Herald publish the report under the same double-line display heading, which reads as follows :—

COUNCIL WANTS DUKE INTERNED.

The report was the same in all these papers. It read as follows :—

A resolution asking the Home Secretary to intern the Duke of Bedford was passed to-day by the Sandy (Beds.) Urban Council.

The resolution "viewed with alarm the defeatist activities of the Duke which are arousing concern among the loyal citizens of Bedfordshire."

The text was the same in the following journals, but the heading was different.

The Nottingham Journal boldly headed the report :—

"INTERN THE DUKE!"

The News Chronicle and the West Lancashire Evening Post used the heading :—

WANTS DUKE INTERNED.

The Portsmouth Evening News heading read :

"INTERN DUKE" PLEA.

The Manchester Evening Chronicle headed its report :—

COUNCIL SAYS
"INTERN DUKE OF BEDFORD."

The Daily Telegraph made its heading very small :—

INTERNMENT ASKED FOR.

The Daily Mail naturally—being the organ that supported Franco, and once bitterly attacked the Soviet Union, and brazenly denounced Communism—used a bold heading :—

"ARREST DUKE" CALL.

The Evening Standard heading was :—

"INTERN DUKE," SAY COUNCIL.

The Birmingham Post carried the milder heading :—

"INTERN DUKE OF BEDFORD" REQUEST.

The Western Morning News and the Belfast News Letter used a dignified "Duke of Bedford" heading. The other papers published the statement without any heading, giving the paragraph the value of a small news item.

The Daily Worker, in its issue for March 31, reported the resolution in the same terms as the paragraph quoted from the other papers. It added :—

"Whether he be a Royal Duke or a working man," said Councillor Minhall, moving the resolution, "those who are not with us in this struggle are against us.

"In my opinion there is only one place for traitors to the common cause, and that is behind bars with Mosley and the jackals of the British National Party."

Councillor Minhall, a Labour man who lost a leg in the last war, added that he would not be a loyal citizen of the British Empire, or loyal as an ex-serviceman to the thousands of boys and girls of Bedfordshire in the Services to-day if he allowed the Duke's attitude to go unchallenged.

That this resolution arose purely and simply from Communist Party activity, and represented no genuine opinion, is evidenced by the fact that the Daily Worker, in its issue for March 23, published the following paragraph :—

DUKE'S OWN SHIRE SAYS "INTERN HIM."
From DOUGLAS HYDE.

That the Duke of Bedford should be interned for his pro-Hitler activities is the demand of a growing number of organisations throughout Bedfordshire.

Resolutions making this demand have recently been passed by the Shefford branch of the National Union of Agricultural Workers and the Luton No. 4, Leagrave and Dallow Road (Luton) branches of the Amalgamated Engineering Union.

Perhaps someone will tell us when these organisations became patriotic and war-minded. Did any of the persons responsible for this resolution support the Stalin–Hitler peace pact? Did they support the Peace Convention? How patriotic were they prior to June 22, 1941? What propaganda were they promoting between August 23, 1939 and June 22, 1941? An answer to these questions is demanded.

In all these reports it is made out that the Sandy Urban Council demanded the Duke's Internment. Nothing is said as to the size of the Council gathering. Nothing is said about such political issues not being the legal or constitutional business of an Urban Council. Nothing is said about voting. The implication is that the demand was unanimous. We reproduce the report of the proceedings that appeared in the Bedfordshire Times for April 2 :—

The activities of the Duke of Bedford were commented upon at the meeting of the Sandy Urban Council on Monday night. The subject was introduced by Mr. J. Minhall, speaking on a recommendation of the General Purposes Committeee that no action be taken on a letter received from the South-East Midlands District Committee of the Communist Party.

Mr. Minhall moved a resolution calling attention to the Duke of Bedford's defeatist activities and Fascist propaganda, which were causing great concern among the loyal citizens of Bedfordshire, and asking the Home Secretary to intern him, along with others who had been interned for their Fascist sympathies, before further harm could be done.

Mr. Smith seconded, and Mr. Crawley supported.

Mr. Cope did not agree with the motion. He did not think the Duke would mind if he were locked up. It was true he was not following in the footsteps of his father or of the Russells, but he was not afraid to express his opinions.

Mr. Blackler was distressed that a man in the Duke's position should be allowed to go about expressing such views.

Mr. G. E. Western said he admired a man who was prepared to champion an unpopular cause. He had moral courage.

Mr. Allison considered the Duke a menace.

In the end the motion was carried by five votes to four.

Note the facts, concealed from its readers by the Daily Worker, and not mentioned in any general newspaper :—

(1) The internment of the Duke of Bedford was raised in a letter by the Communist Party.

(2) Only nine people voted.

(3) The majority was one vote.

We would make no comment on this Tooley Street voting brought about by Communist Party machinations if only the Communist Party had held these views honestly since the outbreak of war. But no party has engaged in more mischievous and more unprincipled defeatist propaganda than the Communist Party. No persons have deserved internment more, if internment is merited, than William Gallacher, Harry Pollitt, D. N. Pritt and Co. That these persons should arrogate to themselves the right to take possession of the keys of the dungeon, and to intern according to the interests of the Soviet Union and its foreign relations, is a scandal never before suffered or endured by the common people in Britain. Let the reader consult the Daily Worker for 1939-1941, and note the attacks made on 18B and Herbert Morrison and Sir John Anderson by our contemporary. Then let him consider this Bedfordshire demand by a majority of one. Democracy! Patriotism! What impertinence.

18B DETENTIONS.—We have received considerable correspondence on this subject. All published next issue.

EDUCATING GERMANS

The following letter to the editor from the pen of our comrade, Rhys J. Davies, M.P., was published in the Manchester Guardian for April 6 :—

Sir,—I am as profoundly opposed to Nazism as a form of government as any who have written or spoken on this subject, but I am alarmed at the arrogance, ignorance, and self-righteousness of those who support this preposterous proposal to re-educate the German people, more particularly the youth, when peace is restored.

Stalin will apparently have none of this; he is too much of a realist. He has made it clear that the task of the Red Army is to destroy the Hitlerite regime; that it is sheer nonsense to talk of the destruction of the German State and its people or, obviously, to "re-educate" them.

In order to show the futility of this proposal let those who make it answer the following:—

If the British are to join in this re-education, how many teachers from this country will be required, and will they be expected to live in Germany for a stipulated period, and how long? As we have virtually closed some of our teachers' training colleges for the duration of the war shall we be able to spare those teachers? Are we sure that any teachers will be willing to undertake the task; and will they be taught enough German for the purpose beforehand, and, if so, when? Who will pay their salaries, and who will draft the curriculum? Shall we prohibit marriages between our British teachers and the Germans? Are we certain that the Germans would attend classes to be taught by foreigners? Can we insure our teachers against assassination? Supposing Germany turns Communist after the war, and our teachers follow suit, what then? Supposing our teachers instead of persuading the Germans to become democrats are converted to Nazism instead, what of it then? And supposing a revolution breaks out in Germany when our teachers are there?

Why stop at re-educating the Germans? What of the Italians and the Japanese? They are fighting us too. And what of the French? Then, in view of the anti-British feeling in India why not include those 350,000,000 in the scheme? Further, there were three negroes lynched in the State of Mississippi during one recent week. Is it intended to ask Mr. Roosevelt to allow some of our teachers to re-educate the white population of that State?

Any attempt to answer these questions would show the absurdity of the proposal. In any case, it is clear that those Germans who dislike Nazism as a form of government will rally to Hitler more than ever when they know that the alternative to Hitler is to be taught by foreigners on their own soil.

Finally, why have those propagandists of hate decided what to do with its skin before the bear is caught?

Yours, etc.,
RHYS J. DAVIES.

DO NOT DESPAIR, POET.

Do not despair, Poet,
If your songs be unsung,
Time is so real and lasting,
And you are so young.
Whole worlds revolve in darkness
Somewhere far-flung,
Unknown, unguessed of, existing—
Just like your song.

Do not despair, Poet,
When you are dead,
And the tombstone has crumbled
Over your head,
The world may be wiser,
And your songs may be read,
Time is so real and lasting,
Poet, be comforted.

On Sunday, February 14, 1943, the South Place Ethical Society celebrated, at Conway Hall, Red Lion Square, London, the 150th Anniversary of its formation. The meeting was held in commemoration of the establishment of a congregation of religious dissenters, under Elhanan Winchester, at Parliament Court Chapel, Artillery Lane, Bishopsgate, London, on February 14, 1793. South Place Ethical Society has descended directly from this congregation naturally, and inevitably, without break or interruption of any kind. It is a marvellous record of consistent evolution and development of progressive thought and humanism.

During this period, the Society's meeting places have been :—

PARLIAMENT COURT CHAPEL, BISHOPSGATE, February 14, 1793 to the establishment of SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL, FINSBURY, February 1, 1824—March 31, 1927.

In May, 1907, the Rules were altered to provide for the appointment by the Annual General Meeting of a Lecturer or Lecturers in place of a Minister. Under this Rule the following appointments were made :—

The Society's names have changed to define the evolution of its principles and purpose. The congregation which assembled in support of Elhanan Winchester, the American Baptist preacher, at Parliament Court Chapel in 1793, called themselves Philadelphians. Winchester had cut across orthodoxy by announcing and assailing the doctrine of Eternal Hell, thus helping to spread the creed, so-called, of Universalism which then meant simply "Universal Salvation in Christ." He had converted Vidler, his successor, to Universalism, and Vidler, in turn, converted himself in 1802 to Unitarianism. By this change his congregation was much reduced. There was, however, a Baptist connection which lasted long after the Society had become actively associated with the Unitarian body.

W. J. Fox had struggled from a severe Calvinism to Unitarianism, which stage of development he had reached several years before becoming the Minister at Parliament Court Chapel in 1817. His aim before taking up that post had been to form a congregation on a comprehensive principle with Virtue and not Faith for the bond of union. The subscriptions invited for building South Place Chapel were for a new Unitarian Chapel. Mr. Fox took an active part in founding the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1825, and he was its first Foreign Secretary. His heterodox opinions were not, however, viewed favourably, and in 1837 the Society was excluded from the Unitarian Association, becoming thenceforth its own denomination as it remains to this day. The Trust Deed drawn up in 1825 introduces the term "Society or Congregation of Protestant Dissenters." This term is used in a copy of the Rules in use in 1857.

Down to 1852 the term "Fox's Chapel" was in popular use. The Annual Report for 1871 uses the words "South Place Chapel." In 1873 the title adopted was "South Place Chapel and Institute," thus referring to the Society's other activities. For the Annual Report of 1879 the heading is "South Place Religious Society." This was changed to "South Place Ethical Society" in 1888. No alteration in the principles of the Society was involved. The book by Dr. Conway, published in 1894, is entitled "Centenary History of the South Place Society." This phrase may give way to "Conway Hall." So many other organisations hire the Society's premises that some danger to the identity of the Society is threatened. It is for the membership to see that in years to come predominant use of Conway Hall is made by South Place Ethical Society.

Lord Snell, LL.D., presided at the anniversary celebration. He said that, for more than twelve generations, the South Place Ethical Society had been the loyal servant of great ideals. The leaders of the Society were both liberators and prophets. In the course of its work, the Society had attracted many distinguished visitors. J. S. Mill, T. H. Huxley, Herbert Spencer knew and respected its work. At South Place, Longfellow heard, for the first time, his "Psalm of Life" used as a congregational hymn.

In an age of unwholesome superstition, the Society was an antiseptic. It destroyed and it healed. It practised almost alone the religion of the open mind and it kept its feet firmly planted on the ground. The Society had never been afraid to let an unaccepted view be stated from its platform. If a man had an unpopular cause to advocate the Society gave him the right to be heard. For many years it was the only practising Catholic Church. It judged both tradition and prophecy by the searching test of knowledge. The prestige of antiquity of a belief or a prejudice gave it no relief from criticism.

The Society was thorough in its rejections and its acceptances. It was more nonconforming than the Nonconformists. It aimed to reform the Reformation. It took itself for better or for worse and said "here is where we stand and on the solid rock of fact and reason we will build our Church." It did not reject the ancient philosophers and teachers because they were not modern, but it required them to prove their case even if they were old. St. Paul probably had that need in mind when he said: "Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

No limitation or test had ever been imposed by the Society upon its speakers. The only thing demanded of them had been that they should speak the truth as they knew it. It had been in the highest sense a Society of Free Thinkers.

Lord Snell added that his memories of the Society covered more than 50 years.

Mr. Joseph McCabe said that South Place Ethical Society had developed from a small Universalist congregation of ex-Baptists under Elhanan Winchester which, under Vidler, later adopted Unitarianism. The doctrine of eternal punishment 150 years ago was the basis of ethical teaching throughout England. Fox had already discarded that dogma when he took up his ministry. But the Society began with it in a modified form. Even Fox believed that the Bible was inspired and must have a kind of worship and adoration which no one except certain very backward bodies give it to-day. Fox was a great man. Year by year he looked upon this changing England and said that we of South Place must teach what is true and sound. All other churches were struggling with the old bonds. But those two great men, Fox and Conway, who led this congregation never troubled for a single moment to invent new phrases. Once it was plain that man had taken the sacred fire from heaven and that humanism was the goal, South Place became humanist.

There was a critic of the last century, W. H. Mallock, who said, "You will go on for some time because you are burning the oil that you stole from the sanctuary when you left it." But Fox and Conway knew better. They burned a new oil when the old was found faulty. One dogma sufficed, that man should inspire his own power, that all power came from him, and that there was almost an indefinite advance in front of man for that power. It was said of Fox that he made Unitarianism respectable, but Conway made humanism respectable.

Joseph McCabe added that he came into the Society 47 years ago wondering, as he came out of the gloom and isolation of the cloister, whether he was alone in the Universe. Within two months he found that there was at least one Society which held those ideals which he had built up in his own mind during a year or two of trouble.

Professor C. E. Joad said that mankind had been always, and still was, under the domination of two great fallacies. The first was that there was something morally good in believing—irrespective of what it was that one believed. The second fallacy was that it was right or virtuous to share the beliefs of others. In 1859 John Stuart Mill had discounted the idea that barbarism could revive and conquer civilisation. Professor Bury had been as optimistic in 1913, when he averred that the struggle of reason against authority had ended in a decisive and permanent victory for liberty.

Professor Joad spoke of the power of advertisement in the modern world as an instrument for the manufacture of mass opinion :—

I believe that if every hoarding in the country were covered with announcements to the effect that C. E. M. Joad was the most modest man alive, supported by a myriad leaflets and a brass band, it would soon become a received opinion that I was consumed by an abnormal shrinking from publicity.

Professor J. C. Flugel expressed the confidence he felt that the Society, which had survived two great wars, the Napoleonic and the first World War, was in process of surviving the third.

Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe spoke of the age and continuity of the South Place Society. The parent Society was formed within four years of the outbreak of the French Revolution. The repercussions on our side of the Channel were many. Men and women were thinking about the fundamentals of life and society with a new freedom and intensity. America was beginning to make itself felt in England. Benjamin Franklin had appeared in London, and had been recognised as the first original American. It was not unfitting that the first minister of the congregation that was to become South Place should have come from America; and it was more significant still that the second of the famous leaders who shaped the character of the Society should be American, a friend of those poets and teachers in the United States who were looked upon in the middle of the 19th century with especial admiration from our side. They were fresh and inspiriting, and they sounded a fine equalitarian note, the best of all tonics for Victorian England. Emerson's early essays came over while W. J. Fox was still in charge, and when Moncure Conway arrived Emerson's lecture tour in England (1847) was a recent memory. South Place was one of the cradles of the English-speaking Entente upon which so great a measure of our hopes now depends.

Mr. C. J. Pollard mentioned that he held a certificate of his membership of the National Secular Society, signed by Charles Bradlaugh.

Professor G. W. Keeton sent a letter in which he stated that one or two of the addresses delivered by W. J. Fox on such topics as "War" and "Imperialism," would have resulted in a period of detention if delivered to-day. Fox was not content to deliver Sunday addresses. He organised discussion classes on the problems of the day, and held public disputations with leaders of public thought.

Other letters included one from Laurence Housman, who wrote :—

Though I am a member of a Christian Community, I welcome the 150th anniversary of your Society as a proof that the Ethical Movement is still going strong. It has, in the past, done much to lessen the hold which bigotry, intolerance and superstition have had on the religious world in general; and even on theologians its influence has been wholly for good.

Christians do not sufficiently realise how much they owe to the Humanist movement for the lessening of religious persecution in their various societies and for its removal from legislation. The more we are Freethinkers the better shall we be qualified to discover what is worth believing. For what is true Religion but right relation to Reality?

Mrs. E. Holyoake Marsh, daughter of George Jacob Holyoake, wrote: "My father joined South Place in or about 1858 and our family have belonged ever since."

Mr. George E. O'Dell, Secretary, The American Ethical Union, sent the greetings of the Officers and Executive Board of the American Ethical Union and wrote of his respect for the unique, pioneering place in the history of the Movement for freedom of thought in matters of religion and ethics enjoyed by South Place.

Dr. Henry Neumann, on behalf of the Brooklyn Society for Ethical Culture, sent congratulations; and Mr. H. V. Putzel, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Ethical Society of St. Louis, Missouri, sent his greetings on the occasion of South Place Society's "sesquicentennial." He wrote of Lord Snell's visits to America and St. Louis.

Mr. J. Hulton Hynd, of the St. Louis Society, sent his personal greetings, and recalled his own activities, for four or five years, in the Ethical Church in Bayswater, as the assistant to Dr. Stanton Coit.

Stanton Coit's activity was recalled by Mr. W. Edwin Collier, who wrote on behalf of the Philadelphia Ethical Society. Stanton Coit had made it his life work to actualise Emerson's vision of "a church founded on moral science"; thus establishing an historical linkage with the Unitarians. On the other hand, with the Universalists, South Place shared a common descent from Elhanan Winchester. These facts had been brought out during the past year when the Unitarians and Universalists had accepted the invitation of the Religion and Ethics Study Group of the Philadelphia Society to give first-hand accounts of their beliefs.

David S. Muzzey, Chairman, The Society for Ethical Culture in the city of New York, sent a message wishing good fortune to the South Place activities.

At the luncheon meeting, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh Bonner recalled the lectures delivered by Moncure Conway in defence of his grandfather, Charles Bradlaugh, when the latter made his famous struggle at Northampton.

THE EDITOR'S APPEAL.

In November, 1942, we asked for £1500 to enable us to meet the immediate deficit on our propaganda. By March we had received £551 4s. 7½d. Since then only £33 2s. 10d. has been received. The total response from our readers stands to date at £584 7s. 5½d. The sum required still is £915 12s. 6½d. We ask for this sum to be sent in before June 1. Final acknowledgments will be made in the July issue.

Many readers have asked us to fix the definite sum required from each reader. Frankly we think it is impossible to do this, as some of our readers live in very poor circumstances indeed. To meet the suggestion, however, we ask every reader—who can do so—on receipt of this issue to send a donation of 5/-. The important point is to send a donation AT ONCE.

Some readers have urged us to increase the price of the paper to 3d. per copy. To meet expenses the price should be 4d. We ask readers who wish to pay 3d. to send an annual subscription of 4/-, in place of the present subscription of 3/-. That is a voluntary increase. We do not intend to increase the price officially. The paper will remain at 2d. per copy, and the annual subscription remains at 3/- per annum, post free. Many of our C.O. readers cannot afford to pay more.

We ask every reader to become an annual subscriber. Please become a postal subscriber immediately, if you do not subscribe at present. This secures your paper to you.

Address subscriptions and donations to The Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

"JUST AND COURAGEOUS"

An 18B View of Herbert Morrison.

[We have received the following letter from Mr. John P. Dennis, who has suffered internment under 18B. It is right that this view of Herbert Morrison's attitude as the administrator of 18B should be published. We are opposed to 18B, just as we are opposed to the avowed views of many of the persons who have been interned under 18B. We are opposed to Mr. Morrison for being a conscientious objector during the last war and a militarist in this. Here is another view of Mr. Morrison, paying a tribute to Mr. Morrison's sense of justice and courage, under circumstances of prejudice and difficulty.—Ed.]

Sir,—Apropos your list of Officers and other ranks detained under 18B I would point out that the total number of servicemen and ex-servicemen detained is between five and six hundred. Speaking from memory I think something like three hundred signed the telegram to His Majesty the King from the Ascot Concentration Camp in the summer of 1940. Although I composed this telegram, except for the last sentence asking for release, I did not myself sign it although I served in the 26th, 90th and 42nd regiments from 1919-24. I am now a C.O.

It may interest your readers to know that many 18B's now bear the King's Commission and many others are Warrant Officers, etc. This fact is the most eloquent proof of either their loyalty or the Government's stupidity. I understand one man in the service has to report to the police daily.

I cannot concur in your opinion that the Home Secretary's detention of servicemen "does not make sense" or that his attitude to the last war impairs his attitude to this. Many who fought and approved of the last war disapprove of this one and we do not charge them with hypocrisy or cant. Conscience after all is but the discerning between right and wrong in conformity with moral law as he or she understands it and that in turn is determined as to whether or not remorse follows the one or the other action. Supposing the Home Secretary to be in support of this war, that does not necessarily infer or prove he has changed his opinion as to the morality of war. A Minister of the Crown is there to do his duty and his personal opinions have nothing to do with it. You, Sir, have experienced much litigation and doubtless have observed that Judges have frequently to give judgments contrary to their personal opinions and sympathies.

In my opinion the Home Secretary is morally wrong and politically in error to support this war but his attitude to many aspects of it I think to be eminently sensible and at times positively courageous (i.e., justice for Germany).

Of his attitude to we 18B's I would say he has been in great measure just and has righted many injustices and is constantly "kicking 18B about in order to get rid of it," but he is not aided in this effort by recalcitrant prisoners and politically prejudiced persons, especially when a hostile and ignorant public watches his every movement and release. Despite this he has bundled hundreds out and a few weeks after his appointment to the Home Secretaryship he released us by batches until silly demonstrations put the stopper on that process.

It is well to keep in mind that the progeniture of 18B was Sir John Anderson and The Defence Committee and the nurse is being wrongly abused for her charge.

If it be suggested I am "buttering my gaoler" I would say Mr. Morrison is fully aware of my hostility to this war and his political ideas, but as with me so I hope it is with him—we are opponents and not enemies, that to me is English.

Yours faithfully,

JOHN P. DENNIS.

EDITOR'S RADICAL LIBERAL ACTIVITY

AMERICAN HUMANIST RECOGNITION

For a long time past, as the readers of these columns are aware, we have been in close contact with the various sections of the Humanist Movement in the United States. Reference is made to this Movement on page 68 of our pamphlet, "Why Jesus Wept."

One of the most interesting sections of the Humanist Movement is the Humanist Society of Friends. In January of this year, the General Board of Directors of the Humanist Society of Friends considered some of the literature we had issued, especially that dealing with Christianity and religion, and our activity since we began our career as a boy preacher. The Board considered our long opposition to war, our imprisonments for Freedom of Thought and Speech, and decided that our activity ought to receive constitutional recognition and be rescued from its false status of seeming outlawry. The Board felt that our heresy was useful pioneering activity and that our refusal to be trammelled by the routine requirements of orthodox scholarship ought not to be allowed to handicap our activity any longer. As a result, the Board decided to confer on us the status of a Minister of the Humanist Society of Friends. We reproduce the certificate sent to us by the Board.

Dr. Lowell Harris Coate, M.A., Ph.D., LL.D., President of the Humanist Society of Friends, addressed to us the following letter, announcing the decision of the organisation:—

FOREIGN POLICY COUNCIL

Los Angeles, California,
January 7th, 1943.

Guy A. Aldred,
Editor, "The Word,"
104 George Street,
Glasgow, C.1.

My Dear Friend Aldred,

Although it will be considerably past the New Year season by the time you receive this letter, yet at this time I desire to wish for you the very best New Year of your life, for I see from the very fine literature which has just arrived from your office that you are "one of our kind," and we are indeed intensely interested in the grand work you are doing.

In fact, we are so much interested that we, as a General Board of Directors of the Humanist Society of Friends, have unanimously elected you a Minister of the Society and I am inclosing herewith your official Ordination Certificate. We have also designated you as Superintendent of the British Isles for the Society if you are agreeable to that arrangement.

Our Ministers are duly authorised to officiate at wedding ceremonies and memorial services exactly the same as the more orthodox churches, and all other privileges which Ministers enjoy.

I am looking forward with joyful anticipation to reading that very fine set of books which you have been good enough to send me.

I have just re-read your very interesting biographical sketch on pages 42 and 43 of the November, 1942, issue of "The Word," and find myself sharing your unique experiences. You are just two years my senior; I shall be 54 this coming February 1st, 1943.

We certainly admire both your ideals and your courage, and wish to give you all the constitutional protection to which you are entitled in the great work you are doing.

One important reason for incorporating the Humanist Society of Friends as a "Religious Organisation" was because the Constitutional Guarantees in both England and America are greater than any other guarantees under the present constitution. You will also note that several of our Humanist Friends' Ministers were born in England.

In a recent letter you mentioned your desire to visit America at some future time. It will be a mutual pleasure to have you visit this country, and especially our beautiful California. We should be glad to have you address some of our Humanist Societies, especially here on the Pacific Coast. I, too, hope to visit your grand British Isles within the next ten years. I tell my friends that my name, Coate, is as English as "Coates Thread." All my father's ancestors have come from Cumberland, or the English "Lake District," I believe they call it sometimes.

I am sending you a copy of my book, "The Conscription of Conscience," which I am confident you will find interesting these days. My people have been Quakers, and I was reared in a Quaker community, at New London, Indiana. I hold the Quaker viewpoint on war, but their orthodox theology is irrational. Naturally, I read, in addition to our own Humanist publications, and such journals as "The Christian Sentinel," the famous Boston Humanist and Unitarian paper, the "New Zealand Rationalist," Bombay "Reason," and "The Freethinker," of London.

Will close now, wishing for you and yours the very best and most satisfactory and significant year of your life. Kindly communicate my best regards to your splendid friends and associates there.

Sincerely and fraternally yours,
LOWELL H. COATE,
President and Founder
The Humanist Society of Friends.

As President of the Foreign Policy Council of Los Angeles which is affiliated with the Foreign Policy Association of New York, Dr. Coate is conducting an educational propaganda directed towards creating a sufficient body of public opinion to insure genuine international cooperation in the new post-war world.

As President and Founder of the Humanist Society of Friends, Dr. Coate is directing one of the most significant religious movements of this generation, which has already received full official recognition and legal status from both the State of California and the Government of the United States. It has now 50 regular Ministers, and many members throughout the United States.

He is Minister of the Humanist Society of Friends in Los Angeles. This section is known as Liberal Quakers. Anyone whose parents were both Quakers at the time of his birth was known as a "Birth-right Quaker," as was the case with Dr. Coate.

Dr. Coate has read widely and written extensively. He desires, as a thinker, to contribute his bit to the advancement of human knowledge and to the building of a better world community in which to live, especially by the elimination of superstition from religion and hatred from the social life of mankind. He shares the sentiment of that great God-father of American Democracy, Thomas Paine: "The world is my country and to do good is my religion."

The Ministers of the Humanist Society of Friends include Dr. George T. Ashley, who was born in Copiah County, Mississippi, on November 20, 1863. His parents were Primitive Baptists and he was educated for the Ministry. He rebelled against "Close Communion" and studied for the Law. He turned aside to the Ministry again and entered the Methodist Church and served as a Methodist pastor for eight years. The itinerant wheel of Methodism" landed him in Southern Illinois, where he left the Ministry, and settled in the practice of law for fifteen years. A business visit took him to Dallas, Texas, in 1912, and he was brought in contact with the Unitarian Church. The liberal principles of this Church appealed to him and he abandoned law to enter the Unitarian Ministry. He remained a Unitarian Minister for twenty-two years, and held important pastorates at Wichita, Kansas; Seattle, Washington; and Hollywood, California. He retired from the Ministry of the Church in 1934.

The Humanist Movement began to take root in the Unitarian Church about the time that Dr. Ashley entered its Ministry. Membership of the Humanist Movement has never caused any real disturbance in the Unitarian fellowship. So Dr. Ashley links officially the Unitarian Ministry to the Humanist Society of Friends.

Dr. Ashley is a keen student of Social Credit and has written several books on economics and monetary reform. He believes in democracy and liberty and is opposed to the modern tendency towards dictatorships and bureaucracy. He believes that Humanism will be the religion of the post-war world.

Dr. Lowell H. Coate is one of the most distinguished scholars in the United States. Born of Quaker parentage, near Dayton, Ohio, on February 1, 1889, he was taken by his parents to the Quaker Community at New London, Indiana, where he attended the Public Elementary School and High School. At 17 he left his father's farm to attend college at Taylor University (Indiana), and later graduated at Olivet College (Illinois) with the A.B. degree. He taught in the departments of Sociology and Education at Olivet College for four years, and then became Dean of Marion College (Indiana) where he remained until he went to California in 1923.

Dr. Coate did considerable graduate work at the University of Southern California and travelled extensively in Mexico and Central America with the U.S.C. Archeological Expedition. He received the M.A. degree from the University.

Later, he undertook Sociology work at Milton University, and he received the Ph.D. degree. The Metropolitan University (Los Angeles) has honoured him with the LL.D. degree.

Dr. Coate taught for three years in Pasadena College, and was invited to take charge of the Cooperative College (Louisiana) as its President. He was the first President of the Northwest College at Nampa, Idaho. Dr. Coate considers his work in the Public Schools as his vocation, while he regards Adult Education as his avocation.

Another Minister of the Humanist Society of Friends, who has travelled from Orthodoxy through Unitarianism, is Dr. James Covington Coleman, A.B., of the University of Chattanooga, and S.T.D., of Boston University. He was Minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Pinners, Va., 1912-13, and Niantic, Illinois, 1915-17. He resigned from the pulpit of that church because he was opposed to war, and went to Fresno, California. There he became Acting Minister of the First Unitarian Church at Fresno. Minister since then of several Liberal or Unitarian Churches in the United States, he was the first Minister to conduct Humanist Church Services in the United States. These were held in the Church of the Universal Fellowship at Los Gatos, 1920-21. During 1935-36 he assisted Dr. Coate to found the Modern Humanist Church and to conduct a temporary Humanist programme in a theatre building in Los Angeles. In 1941 he received the Litt.D degree from De Landas University.

Other Ministers of the Humanist Society of Friends include:—

Dr. Hugh Ellwood Macbeth, LL.B., of Howard, Executive Secretary of the California Race Relations Commission; President of the United Races of America; Chairman of the Prison Reform Committee of the Lawyers' Club of Los Angeles; Consul of the Republic of Liberia, etc.

Parker Holmes Sercombe, named after Theodore Parker and Oliver Wendell Holmes; sometime Editor of the "Daily Mexican Herald." Mexico City; in association with Clarence Darrow, and others, Editor of "To-morrow Magazine"; member of the Chicago Board of Education for a while, and a Life Member of the American Statistical Association. Has been always a "misfit" among all those who employ the theological method of reasoning.

Theodore Schroeder, the famous lawyer psychologist and authority on the history of the struggle for Freedom of Thought, Speech, and Writing. Probably, the outstanding legal scholar and jurist in the English speaking world on this subject.

The work of Theodore Schroeder, and the names and careers of other pioneers and ministers of the Humanist Movement in general, and its particular branch, the Humanist Society of Friends, will be published in our columns at an early date. This study will be illustrated very fully.

Of Unitarian Ministers in Great Britain, our close comrade and friend, the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., now of Coventry, is in close contact with the Humanist movements in the United States. To "The Humanist," organ of the American Humanist Association, published in Schenectady, N.Y., for the Summer, 1942, Richard Lee contributed a striking article headed, "Humanism or World Anarchy." Comrade Lee's strong plea for Humanism will be reprinted at an early date. In this way we hope to link up all the forces and centres of the great Humanist movement of Britain and the United States, as part of a world federation towards world commonweal.

"JUSTICE UNDER 18B."

Our comrade, C. H. Norman has directed our attention to two serious errors that spoil his excellent letters published in the April Word (page 101):—

1st Letter: line "And Act of Parliament" should read: "And other Acts of Parliament."

2nd Letter: lines 26 (end)-28: "Had they been, men like Fox, Sheridan, and Hazelitt, would have been held untried", etc.

Next month, Norman's articles will be resumed. We shall publish also his protest to the National Council of Civil Liberties about their statement on 18B.

RICHARD CARLILE

[The following summary of Mr. Joseph McCabe's lecture to The South Place Ethical Society, at Conway Hall, London, is reproduced from the April issue of "The Monthly Record" of the Society, with the permission of the Society.—Ed.]

Mr. Joseph McCabe on "The Centenary of Richard Carlile."

Readings from: (1) Carlile's "Jail Journal"; (2) W. J. Fox's Sermon on the Trial of Carlile, February 7, 1943.

Richard Carlile, whose memory we recall, was one of the outstanding figures amongst several millions who suffered in modern times for the right of free discussion and self-government. When he was condemned to three years' imprisonment with a sure prospect of further years in a vile jail because he could not pay an impossible fine, William Johnson Fox, the Minister of this Society, which was then a Unitarian Chapel, was the only Minister of religion to protest publicly and unreservedly against the crime. The clergy of all denominations rejoiced, as Moncure Conway says, as if they had won a Waterloo over Infidelity. So we honour the memory of Fox as well as that of Carlile. But there is a more cogent reason for this celebration. So obsequious have education and literature become in this country that while practically all the world knows how Christians were thrown to the lions in the Roman Amphitheatre, which a Catholic expert has shown to be a piece of sheer fiction, not one in a thousand knows of the millions who died or suffered to give Europe the freedom and democracy it professes to cherish. From the highest modern Catholic authorities we gather that hardly 250 early Christians suffered martyrdom in 250 years. Between 1768 and 1868 half a million unarmed men, women and children were done to death for the democratic faith, and three or four times as many suffered in unspeakable jails, in exile, or by confiscation.

That is the lost perspective in which we must put the story of Carlile. Our American friends naturally believe—for history is as badly taught there as here—that they led the world in its modern struggle for freedom. Five years before the Boston Tea Party the workers of Westminster faced the troops in defence of their picturesque leader, John Wilkes, and left a hundred of their fellows dead or severely wounded on St. George's Fields. When the American Revolution occurred even C. J. Fox, one of our greatest statesmen, wore the colours of the rebels in the House of Commons, and London and Bristol refused the King's entreaty that every city would raise a regiment. The country filled with reform clubs of one type or another, and when the French Revolution broke out they trebled in numbers and enthusiasm. Even Oxford had its group tended by Savage Landor and Southey, with young Shelley learning the gospel. Who knows more of the time than that the French nation went mad and threw Europe into convulsions, and it was the great Pitt who saved England from the Revolution and Napoleon?

We hear a good deal about Pitt to-day, but we are not reminded that he was the bitterest enemy of freedom and democracy, and that he set up again in England a vile aristocratic tyranny that had not been known since Charles I lost his head. Our standard history, the Cambridge Modern History, says that Pitt's own distinction was in finance and that in his repressive legislation which was "grievously wrong," he was moved by panic. He, through Peel, with William Wilberforce egging him on, truculently destroyed the whole liberal movement, which was nation-wide, sent thousands to appalling jails, to the hulks and the penal colonies, and suppressed all the rights and liberties of Englishmen. He employed armies of spies and "agents provocateurs" of the most despicable type. He welcomed the French refugees who brought such lies as that 15,000 priests and nobles had perished in the September Massacre, whereas we now know that there were only 2,000 victims, the majority of which were criminals and prostitutes from the jails. In three years of power Pitt, who had ten years before dropped the little liberalism his father had given him, destroyed all that had been won in a century. When Pitt died the spirit of liberty re-awakened, and Pitt's successors revived his immense Gestapo. When Burdett was threatened with prison for a a just and noble protest the London workers offered to defend the Piccadilly mansion of the rich banker against the troops, and later they plotted to loot the gunshops and storm the Tower, so the black army moved again and the jails groaned with victims.

What was it all about? Simply parliamentary reform and free discussion. Of 489 Members of Parliament 307 were puppets of 150 rich men who had bought their success. Votes sold everywhere for from ten to forty guineas; when there were voters, for often a corner of a field, a heap of stones, or a pig-stye was a constituency. Parliament existed to protect a social order in which vice and crime were appalling and the vast majority of the people led almost animal lives. The average wage was about ten shillings a week and bread was as dear as in 1939. The cheapest tea was eight shillings a pound and sugar one shilling. A high London official estimated that in the metropolis the consumption of milk (heavily watered, as all food was heavily adulterated) was one-tenth of a pint per person daily. But beer was almost given away.

This was the world into which Carlile entered. He was one of what we call the common people. He had been educated in a village school in Devon, and he was a young tinsmith in London when Wooler's "Black Dwarf" and Paine's works fired his mind. We often still ask how to change human nature, though science and world experience have amply told us how. We see it in the case of Carlile. Alone, a mere youth, he flung himself against Castlereagh's monstrous repressive system. Reformers were falling into silence, writers trimming their pens. Carlile borrowed a pound, bought a hundred copies of "The Black Dwarf," and walked the streets of London, sometimes 30 miles a day, selling them. The police ignored him and he made his way into publishing and got 18 weeks in jail. He opened a shop in Fleet Street, and spies were as thick as flies about it. When he published Paine's "Age of Reason" and Palmer's "Principles of Nature" (on birth control), they struck. He claimed, and won, the right to read the whole of the "Age of Reason" in court. But it ended with fines amounting to £1,500 and three years in jail, with further years until he paid. His wife, who did not share his ideas—he was now a dogmatic atheist—took over the work of selling and joined him in Dorchester jail. Nine assistants followed them and he had an automatic machine set up to sell his books. And the good folks headed by the Duke of Wellington raised a fund of £6,000 to get a law of transportation passed against these pestilential rebels. He resumed the work when he came out and was again imprisoned. He took the old Music Hall, the Rotunda, in Blackfriars, and there he and Robert Taylor, the Devil's Chaplain, drew crowds. One night a detachment of soldiers marched to the doors and sent in word that they had mutinied and were ready to open a civil war. Carlile let them cool their heels in the street for two hours. The government had sent them.

Are we worthy of the sacrifices of those men and women who laid down their lives for or devoted their lives to the cause of freedom? By ten years of sloth we nearly lost the fruits of a century and a half of grim sacrifice. Shall we have another attempt at repression after another Waterloo? It is your world, not mine, but it is these things that have inspired my deliberate, life-long policy; the relentless criticism of all that I find ugly, untrue, or unjust in life.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

By

The Rev. F. H. Amphlett Micklewright, M.A.
Minister, Southampton Unitarian Church, and Minister-to-be of Cross St. Unitarian Chapel, Manchester.

We are fighting a great fight for civil liberty for every man. Let us not forget that civil liberties have been in decline in England for some years past. The Trades Disputes Act of 1927, which took away the right of general strike, was a serious legal blow at autonous action in face of common grievance. The Sedition Bill of 1934 gave the police powers which they had not possessed since the end of the XVIIIth Century; the Uniform Bill of 1936 interfered with the right of lawful assembly. Complaints were heard of police discrimination in such districts as East London; the British Union of Fascists were protected whilst persons of another political colour were harried and persecuted. Things had become so bad that East London members of Parliament were forced to interfere and, in 1935, a body of responsible private citizens founded the National Council of Civil Liberties to protect themselves against the activities of the corporate state. On the non-political side, there has been a marked tendency to interfere with opinion as in the case of the banning of books by prominent authors and scientists when the standard of morality within them does not reach the high desires of the Home Secretary or some police magistrate; The Blasphemy Acts remain unrepealed in spite of Mr. Thurtle's effort in 1930; they could still be invoked to-day against anybody who inveighed too hotly against the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England as by law established. The archiepiscopal effort to capture and lobby national state-aided education on behalf of the same body is a further onslaught upon the absolute freedom of the mind and of the conscience. We are driven to the conclusion that man will only be free when the church is disestablished and the state is treated as being no more than a convenient secular organ to protect and to further both individual and corporate liberties.

In some ways these matters may be said to be political issues. Mr. Spencer might be accused of takin his stand upon a matter of political principle and of acting in its light. In one sense, this is true; in questions of liberty, it is usually the political and governmental organ which is disputed. But the issues are not solely political in implication. They are great issues of principle, of society and of religious belief. Religion is the qualitative valuation of life; it demands some criterion by which the whole of living may be judged. It affords the inspiration by which further achievement becomes possible. From our Unitarian point of view, a religious view of life implies several features. It demands liberty of conscience, of opinion, and of expression. The authoritarian rule of state and church is set aside; the individual is bidden to look upon the examples of Jesus of Nazareth and other great leaders of the past but to stand upon his own feet, to be guided by his own reason and conscience, to make his own way in the world. A true and valid Unitarianism is not content to keep these things in individual isolation but insists upon a social philosophy which shall embody them. The isolated individual is only an organism; his natural existence is within a social environment. It is therefore a religious duty to build human society in such a way that the fullness of individual powers may become actual. The Unitarian message is one of liberty for man within a free social order. A loyalty to this tradition means that it must be ready to adopt its implications whether in the case of Mr. Spencer or of anybody else.

It is not too much to urge that this attitude to life is, in some ways, strangely reminiscent to that adopted by Jesus of Nazareth even though his outlook was coloured by the particular beliefs of his own day. Jesus cared for the spirit of man and had contempt for riches or regard for mere possession. We should realise that human happiness and well-being are dependant upon singleness of mind and purpose rather than any vaunting of possession whether individually or nationally. Jesus stood out in antagonism to the formal religion and time-serving politics of his day, rebuking both the Pharisees and Herod for their complaisant laxity. We too should set aside the narrow worship of the dictates of an authoritarian state and a formal church by seeking the inspiration and the freedom which can only come through a looking within, to one's own mind and reason. Jesus showed no sympathy with mere retaliation for evil as a principal and his concern was that the individual should be free to adopt a higher standard of judgment. We too should be bent upon seeking out a broader and higher path than the pettl loyalties which can lead to the persecution of some of our best, ablest, and most public-spirited of citizens. In the last resort, the message of Jesus of Nazareth was that every man should be free to approach that which he regarded as Divine in the way which appealed to his own life, that he should be at liberty to follow the dictates which his conscience might approve, that he should have freedom to accept loyalties which his reason might commend. The message of Jesus was inspired by religious experience; it was rationalised by him into a chapter of freedom for every man. It could only exist within the confines of a society large-minded enough to be tolerant of widespread differences of opinion. The Unitarian churches are only loyal to their heritage if they struggle to that end and seek to promote a wider freedom. "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," wrote Paul as he gazed upon the early church. Unitarianism is a qualitative spirit by which life may be assessed; it is only true, sound and loyal when it is a spirit of liberty, of freedom, and of justice.

The imprisonment of Mr. Spencer is a clarion-call that voices should be raised on behalf of these great ideals. Freedom and equity have been in decline for many years; they must be invigorated and brought to birth once more if the qualities of civilization are to be saved. Their denial is a far more insiduous peril than anything which Hitler might do through his armies; a war fought on a lower level can only end in orgy of bragging patriotism and racketeering behaviour. As Mr. Spencer sits in his prison-cell, he may draw some comfort from the fact that these high qualities were overlooked in the last war; public opinion ignored some of its most high-minded citizens to listen to the dulcet-tones of Mr. Horatio Bottomley. It paid the price of its escape from all that is noble and worthwhile in life through the social evolution which has led on to another awful war. Upon us is laid the responsibility of seeking a higher level and of urging a nobler view of life. We must stand for that principle which Paul was expressing when he wrote, "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." We must seek to promote civil and religious liberty for every man, both by teaching men to use their reasons and by seeking the evolution of society in a manner which may protect human freedom. In spite of the high-sounding notes of the Atlantic Charter, we may have our reasonable doubts when we look upon certain aspects of the war-effort as it is being conducted. Unitarianism has a long tradition and a great principle; both are now at stake and, if Unitarian heritage is worth preserving, they are worth striving for and safeguarding.

After all, we may reverse the Pauline remark and say: Where liberty is, there is the spirit of the Lord. Our stand is on a religious principle, that of the free conscience and the free mind. We do not believe that the Divine in life can be appreciated at its fulness in any other way. Only with an eye that is free can we see the Divine in nature or in man. As such, our stand is upon exactly the same principles as were urged by Jesus of Nazareth. The present persecution of some, both within and without our body, for loyalty to these principles should compel us to speak out and to urge that world-liberty may be won on a far higher plane. The challenge now comes to us in this fourth year of war—like a prophet of old, we hear the voice saying—Whom shall I send and who shall go for us? Are we to be loyal to that voice, striving to obey its inner commands? Or shall we just sit back and say—Lord, here am I, send him?

TOWARDS THE DAY.

Fresh and free, the windy morning
Blows the clouds of night away:
Hope anew in hearts is dawning—
Expectation greets the day.

Nightfall brings the world's deep sorrow
Crushingly to weight our hearts:
Morning from the future borrows
Courage, and new strength imparts.

Give not way to sad complaining
When oppressed by evil's night;
Rather take it as life's training
For the work of morning light.

PRISONERS AT THE BAR

George Pleydell Bancroft, Clerk of Assize for the Midland Circuit since 1913, has many interesting and valuable notes and anecdotes in his volume of recollections, published in 1939, under the title of "Stage and Bar," by Faber and Faber, Ltd., of Russell Square, London. Bancroft, the son of Sir Squire Bancroft and Marie Wilton, is the author of the famous play, "The Ware Case."

In these recollections Bancroft recalls the stand made on behalf of prisoners by Maurice Healy, K.C., who has been Recorder of Coventry since 1941. Born on November 16, 1887, Healey was called to the Irish Bar in 1913 and to the English Bar in 1914. When he was a Junior in 1922, the historic incident occurred in which he proves himself a hero of very unusual courage.

The Judge of the Assize was Mr. Justice Horridge. Born in 1857, Horridge became a K.C. in 1901, and sat as Liberal M.P. for Manchester E., 1906-10. In that year he became a Judge of the King's Bench Division of the High Court. He died in 1938. He lived much too long for a man of such reactionary views and how he managed to be returned as a Liberal for such a radical city as Manchester, with all its traditions of freedom of thought, it is hard to understand. Bancroft refers mildly to the reactionary impertinence of Horridge in three classic sentences of delightful understatement, and then proceeds to describe Healey's reaction to the judge's attitude when he was made aware of it:—

The Judge of the Assize was that able Civil judge, Mr. Justice Horridge. In trying crime he had a peculiar idiosyncrasy. He did not approve of allowing a prisoner on trial to be SEATED in the dock. The prisoner, innocent in our Law until proved guilty, had to stand, broadly speaking, throughout the proceedings.

Well, Healy, on hearing of this was amazed, and out of court expressed his views with some degree of Irish emphasis. Then it happened at Nottingham one day that counsel for the defence asked the judge if the prisoner might be seated. This was after his trial had proceeded for a considerable time.

"Why?" asked the judge sternly. Whereupon the prisoner fainted. There was a good deal of comment about this, and at Derby, the next town, the historic incident happened.

Bancroft gives the shorthand note in full:—

Upon the prisoner's plea of not guilty being taken by me and the jury sworn, Healy rose very quickly and spoke very quietly throughout what follows.

Mr. Maurice Healy: "My lord, may the prisoner sit down?"

Mr. Justice Horridge (sternly): "Why?"

Mr. Maurice Healy: "With great respect, my lord, why not?"

Mr. Justice Horridge: "Because I do not allow prisoners to be seated unless there is some special reason for it."

Mr. Maurice Healy: "Your lordship misunderstands me. I am claiming this for the prisoner as a matter of right."

Mr. Justice Horridge (firmly): "I disallow it."

Mr. Maurice Healy: "I would ask your lordship to allow me to argue it. Before ever the Criminal Evidence Act was passed it was the rule of law laid down in many authorities."

Mr. Justice Horridge: "Will you cite me one?"

Mr. Maurice Healy: "If I may, I will cite from Archbold (the textbook). I am citing from page 163, where it is laid down: 'The prisoner is to be brought to the bar without irons, shackles, or other restraint, unless there is danger of escape and ought to be used with all the humanity and gentleness which is consistent with the nature of the thing, and under no other terror, or uneasiness than that which proceeds from a sense of his guilt and the misfortune of his present circumstances.' Now, my lord, if the prisoner were here charged with a misdemeanour and not a felony, it would not be necessary for him to go into the dock at all. He could be accommodated with a seat by his counsel so that he might instruct him. If that were so before the passing of the Criminal Evidence Act, when the prisoner could not be a witness, it is all the more so after the passing of that Act. How can a prisoner be placed in a position in which no witness for the prosecution could be; asked to stand with an anxiety upon his mind, which no witness for the prosecution could have, before he went into the box to give his evidence, and after that to go in to give his evidence on his behalf, to stand the ordeal of examination and cross-examination? I submit under those circumstances that the prisoner is put in such a position of uneasiness as is not contemplated by the law. I think I am right in saying that your lordship is the only judge that follows that practice. Either this is a matter of practice or law. If it is a matter of practice I submit the practice ought to be governed by the same principles, and the very last judge who came this circuit never allowed any case to be opened for the prosecution before he directed that the prisoner was to be accommodated with a seat if he so desired. I submit with great respect that there ought to be uniformity. The prisoner comes to the bar as an innocent man. He is entitled not only to every right but to every privilege which is granted to every other person in court. When your lordship comes into court we all stand up because your lordship represents the Majesty of the King, but your lordship also represents the courtesy of the King, and when your lordship sits down we are all allowed, by that courtesy, to resume our ease as enables us to perform our respective duties, and I submit that that courtesy should be extended as much to an unconvicted prisoner as to anybody in court. I am extremely sorry that I should make a demand which is unpleasant to your lordship, but there is something which all counsel should do, and that is that they should have courage in defending the rights and in defending the liberties of their clients, and the constitution of this country has never been more jealous than in pruning all relics of harsh and cruel treatment of prisoners. For these reasons I submit that as a matter of right the prisoner, unless there is a danger of his escape, should be allowed to be seated. My lord, I have spoken boldly, but I hope I have not said anything that was undue."

Mr. Justice Horridge: "Mr. Healy, you have made your submission with all due respect. I intend to control, until I am told by a superior authority that I ought not to do it, the conduct of the court in which I preside. In my view if there are special reasons, or I think the trial is likely to be a long one, I allow the prisoner to be seated, but I recognise no right on the part of the prisoner or counsel to say as to how prisoners are to be treated. Prisoners will stand unless there are special reasons for their being seated. Where I think it right I shall direct them to be seated."

Mr. Maurice Healy: "If your lordship pleases."

The case then proceeded. On the fourth witness for the prosecution being called:

Mr. Justice Horridge: "You have a good many more witnesses, Mr. Winning?"

Mr. Winning (for the prosecution): "Yes, my lord."

Mr. Justice Horridge: "This case will last some time. Therefore the prisoner may be seated."

Mr. Maurice Healy: "I am much obliged, my lord."

Bancroft records to the credit of Horridge that he bore no malice for this rebuke. Immediately after the argument he said to Bancroft: "Healy did that very well."

Bancroft adds:—

But the fact remains that from the publication of the incident the invariable practice of every judge is to order that the prisoner be seated immediately before he has been "given in charge" of the jury.

I think the whole handling of the difficulty by Healy was masterly both in its courtesy and in its courage. That day, 16th February, 1922, at Derby Assizes is very prominent in my memory.

It deserves to be a prominent day and it should be remembered as a day of credit to Maurice Healy. It never ought to have been necessary for him to have made such a stand. That he had to do so is a disgrace to Bench and Bar alike.

The incident is referred to and the entire question of the status in Court of an accused person is dealt with admirably by Albert Lieck, lately Chief Clerk of the Bow Street Police Court, in his excellent "Bow Street World," published in 1938.

Mr. Lieck quotes from Stephen, "A Digest of Law of Evidence," Article 94:

The burden of proving that any person has been guilty of a crime is on the person who asserts it.

Mr. Lieck says that this quotation "enshires what is called the presumption of innocence." He continues:—

A person accused, we proudly boast in England, is held to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. That, though an undoubted proposition of law, emphatically restated in 1935 by the House of Lords, is in practice often simply untrue.

It is true of many prisoners in many courts, of perhaps all prisoners in some courts. But of many in some courts it is sufficient to be charged, for guilt to be assumed by the bench. The burden of proof is, from the beginning, unlawfully shifted to the accused to prove his innocence. Sometimes he succeeds, sometimes he fails. The failure goes unnoticed because the immense majority of persons charged are in fact guilty of the offence alleged. Of this majority by far the greater majority plead guilty. In some courts it is made a matter of aggravation not to plead guilty.

Here I remark that the placing of a man in the dock already begins to whittle away the presumption of innocence. The dock is too freely used. It is merely a place of restraint for a person who may become violent. If there is no reason to expect this he ought to be allowed to be placed at the bar and not to be shut into a cage.

Its use is arbitrary. In some police courts every accused person is put in the dock. In the metropolitan police courts persons arrested go into the dock: persons summoned stand (or sit) at the bar. The summons may be for outrageous violence. The charge may be obstruction with a motor car, where the accused has been arrested on a warrant, endorsed for bail, merely because he has failed to appear to a summons.

I am told by experienced gaolers that it is easier to control a violent person in the dock. In thirty years I have seen less than half a dozen violent prisoners. Moreover, the time comes when the prisoner, of disposition mild or violent, has the right to go into the witness-box to give evidence on his own behalf. The only assault I have ever known of on a magistrate was not by a prisoner, but by a man who suddenly rushed from beside the witness-box and struck the magistrate on the bench. That represented carelessness on the part of the officials, or bad construction of the court.

All defendants ought to be allowed to sit, whether in the dock or elsewhere, if their case will take time. In these days they are frequently invited to do so. But one judge was until recently on the bench who refused counsel's request for his client to sit down, with the result that the man fainted with fatigue. This is to punish before conviction. How can a man who is physically tired conduct his defence? or properly attend to what is going on? The man should, of course, have sat down, and braved the consequences. Had the judge then ordered the gaolers to compel him to stand, the judge and the gaolers would have been guilty of assault. There is no law compelling a prisoner to stand in court.

There are not many counsel as fearless as Horace Avory in standing up for their clients. In that fine book, "My Sixty Years in the Law," Mr. Ashley tells how the cruel old Sir William Hardman, after trying to get a woman convicted against whom there was no case, ordered her to remain in the dock when acquitted. Avory said, "This is monstrous, and unless she is released at once I shall advise her to bring an action against you for false imprisonment." She was at once allowed to go. A judge is a great man, but, emphatically, not above the law.

In advocating the almost complete disuse of the dock, I shall be sure to be reminded of Fowler and Milsom, the murderers, and of how Fowler made a violent attempt to get at Milsom to do him an injury or perhaps to kill him in the dock. But everyone knew what wicked fellows these were, and what an exceptionally brutal ruffian Fowler was. The officials knew that precautions must be taken, and took them though hardly sufficiently as it turned out. Such precautions were not necessary with a feeble old man whom I saw in the dock charged with murder, because weary of life, he and his old wife had agreed to commit suicide together, and she had succeeded.

By all means have a cage for dangerous beasts, but for men and women who are not dangerous beasts the presumption of innocence demands a trial in such moderate comfort as can be compassed in a court of justice.

But comfort is rarely studied for anyone in a court.

Mr. Lieck draws attention to the poverty of many persons who are compelled, on that account, to submit to all the errors and bullyings that can be imposed upon them in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. To these people a magistrate, however ignorant he may be of the principles of law, is at once the law and above the law.

Over a period of years a notorious offender in this respect has been a Metropolitan Police Court Magistrate since 1931. Mr. Mullins is not without legal knowledge and has distinguished himself as an author. His behaviour on the Bench is less forgiveable on that account for he is a man of authority by virtue of his knowledge and not merely on account of his position. We sometimes suspect that his outbursts on the Bench must have a physical explanation. There must be health trouble, probably liver disorder, to turn a man of knowledge into an ignoramus and a bully at the time when his learning ought to be informing his discretion and controlling his judgment.

On Wednesday, December 2, 1942, Mr. Mullins, at the London South Western Police Court, tried a woman for the theft of a book.

The woman was Celia Naomi James, 32, of Longfield-street, Wandsworth. She was accused of stealing a 4s. book from a Putney shop.

She was described as a housekeeper.

Mr. Mullins used his position to air his impertinent opinions about the women who are housekeepers. Said this mockery of justice to the Court and whatever public were permitted to be present:—

I don't like this word housekeeper. It USUALLY means something immoral.

Courts have nothing to do with morals. Mr. Mullins is not a judge of morals. Whether women are mistresses or otherwise is none of his business. Nor did it arise in the case. The charge was the alleged theft of a book. That, and that alone, was the business of Mr. Mullins. After all, whatever legal airs and graces he may give to himself, he presides merely over a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. He does that not too well.

Detective Anderson said that Celia Naomi James was employed as a housekeeper. Part of her work was to look after a woman who was very ill.

Evidence was given on the alleged theft. Mr. Mullins brushed such a mere question of fact, the actual charge and his sole concern, to one side. He had to express once more his opinions. He did so with gross arrogance, judicial incompetence, and the most outrageous misbehaviour. Did we persist in the practice of our ancestors, Claude Mullins ought to have been taken from the Bench and placed in the public stocks as a warning to magistrates not to exceed their powers. With a grand air, this magistrate clowned out this absurd sentence:—

I shall give her the benefit of the doubt and assume that she is a real housekeeper and not a mistress.

The charge was stealing a book. The other question was never before him. He had no right to assume anything as to her housekeeping. He had no power to give her the benefit of the doubt. Presumably the liver disorder eased itself for on the only charge on which he had the right to speak, he sentenced Celia Naomi James to one day's imprisonment.

Hilde Marchant reported the case for the "Daily Mirror." She took immediate action and reports the result in the "Daily Mirror," for Thursday, December 3, 1942:—

I phoned Mrs. Claud Mullins, described as a housewife, and asked her if the word "housekeeper" carried any implications of immorality for her.

"No, nothing at all," she replied.

I quoted her husband's words in court, and she said: "Well, I don't know the case."

When I asked her again if, on its own value, the word housekeeper meant immorality to her she repeated, "Nothing at all."

When the conduct of a magistrate brings his court, and justice itself, into contempt, it is time that he was retired into obscurity. Yet we have records of abuses, not only in the lower courts, but in the very courts of the King's Bench itself. One day we will list and expose the judges concerned, giving a full record of their misdemeanours.

In Glasgow, many poor folk come to us daily for advice, full of fear and trembling. Over 100 people consult us nearly every week. We place our knowledge and energy freely at their service and the result is an unpaid treadmill of overwork. A little good is done and some misery eased. We do not know what else to do. The unnecessary oppression of the poor, even beyond the fact of their poverty, is a sorry problem. We often wish we could give courage and understanding to these folk and act as public defender on their behalf. We resent their vital lack of character. They are trapped. Until our social order is changed, as changed it will be and how, the well-being of the common people, the development of their character, and the protection of their small rights, calls much more for the establishment of an office of unpaid public defender, than for the enlargement, of which there is a tendency, of the office of paid public prosecutor.

In every city and village, there ought to be recognised a public defender. Such a person should be a layman skilled in knowledge of law rather than a lawyer practised in craft. Few professional lawyers are true or able jurists or men filled with the genius of legal understanding. Respect for principles and love of right, are the true ingredients of law. A true lawyer is one who knows and upholds the Rights of Man, aims to establish the Age of Reason, and practises Commonsense. He may be a layman but if this is the measurement of his vision, he should be called to be the defender of the poor so long as this system lasts. Whilst defending the prisoner at the bar he should work diligently and continuously for the social transformation which will liquidate all that creates and necessitates such anachronisms as "prisoners at the bar."

MOTHERS, 1943.

The tale is told—Alas! the tale is told.
Chapter and verse—it's through, and we are old
Great faith we had in life and laughter;
Now dead sea fruit—we look back after
All the happenings of these heart break years
And see ourselves frustrated—death and tears
And sorrow—the obscenity of war.
Our children murdered. They can laugh no more.
Far better, not to have been born, than know
The degradation war makes men endure.
This travesty of living.
The tale is told—Alas! the tale is told.

ministrate it themselves by controlling and running the industries and communities themselves—not by labour leaders—or communist or any other leaders—then I'm quite sure they can manage a free distribution of their own wealth. Moreover they will have plenty to distribute as under Socialism wealth will be augmented, ever increasing; not like Capitalism for ever being destroyed by war, by deliberate cutting down of production, by the burning of wheat and coffee and by flinging back into the sea enormous quantities of fish, oranges, etc. Or by the destruction of five million pigs under Mr. Roosevelt. And all the while fifty million unemployed with Heaven alone knows how many distressed wives and children behind them.

No and no! Under Socialism I cannot see us paying ourselves rent for our own houses, paying ourselves wages for our own work, buying our own stuff from ourselves. Nor can I see us going about the world with weapons bent on somebody else's death. Instead, I can see us going about bent on living and helping others to live.

Yours comradely,

ISAAC W. BRAITHWAITE.

SOCIALISM AND MONETARY REFORM

Dear Editor,—You invite Socialists to discuss the correspondence on currency by Mr. Verdon-Roe.

As far as I'm concerned, currency reform is only a reform of the Capitalist system. As one who spent three agonising, brutalizing, degrading years in France in the last great war, I've never been interested in any reform in Capitalism — only interested in its complete abolition.

As I see it, this country is bankrupt internally and externally. I've written a number of letters to the local Liberal daily paper pointing out this is a Capitalist-Imperialist war. Most of them were wholly or partly published. But one I sent on money was not published. In that letter I pointed out that gold was practically the only true money that had existed under Capitalism. It was a commodity the same as the commodities it exchanged. In whatever gold exchanged, with whatever commodities there was always something equal, something the same as in the commodities. That something being average labour time spent in producing the gold and the commodities.

Continuing, I pointed out that standard of exchange had been destroyed by the effects of the Great War such as enormous ex. and internal debts, by mass machinery flinging fifty million unemployed and by cut-throat competition on the world's markets. In short, the gold standard became a fiction.

Then on to paper money which is faith, credit on belief money. A belief that the wheels of industry will keep turning and back up every pound note with a pound's worth of wealth. As the war is rapidly shooting the National Debt alone up to twenty thousand million pounds, evidently all paper money, and evidently the labour wealth which should back it up all gone and going down the sink of war, then I expressed my conviction that I was entitled to assume that paper money was also a fiction as far as any honest use was concerned.

That I might assume also that paper money had only one use. The use to our rulers of regulating, managing our lives with it. And the term, "a managed currency" invented by our rulers, our bosses, was very apt in the above sense. Finally, I described the term "managed currency" as the greatest euphemism of the 20th century.

This letter was in answer to an exponent of Social Credit. Other baffling, trivial letters were published in answer to this Social Creditor but as mine wasn't, I am, rightly or wrongly, more convinced still that despite my amateur knowledge of finance, I am somewhere about the truth of it.

There I leave my views on finance, convinced there can be nothing to base money on any longer. If it has no base, what can be the use of juggling on with it?

Next, as to the distribution of goods under the Socialist Commonwealth. My view is this. Under Socialism the people will own and produce everything so everything will belong to the people. The point arises, are the people going to buy their own goods from themselves? As that seems the full height of absurdity, I rule it out. (In passing, how could Socialists any more than Capitalists base their money? I think, like them we wouldn't know what on earth to base it on.)

Under Socialism genuine, there can be no means of exchange, Social Credit notes, Labour notes or what not. There can only be distribution.

A workman, my fellow workers agree with me it is possible. And that to get rid of dole, poverty, war, ignorance and instead substitute happy creative activity that it would be well worth it. They see the workers have sense enough to co-operate in a sane free distribution. For instance they are with me that the average housewife who needs say two stones of flour per week is not going to ask for three or four. It would be no use to her if she did. And so with other things.

Take cigarettes when they are free. Because they will be free, are people going to smoke more than is good for them? Make themselves ill? Take the diverting topic of free beer! Is a man that's got anything to live for, going to become a drunkard because it's free? Will he prefer to lose self-respect, the respect of his friends, his children? And will he decide to lose his health and strength and his interest in the thrill of being alive—because beer is free?

True enough let Socialism be achieved when it will we will have some awkward people to deal with or some poor devils who have been degraded. But aren't the mass of people fundamentally decent and won't they be able to maintain social order.

As my fellow workmen humorously point out, we can deal with drunkenness in our parish where we happen to have two pair of stocks on the parish common. Old inhabitants can remember men with too much drink taken being put in them for an hour or two to cool down.

All jokes aside, I'm convinced that when the workers understand Socialism and that they will have to ad-

NIGHT BOMBING:

Is It Human or Effective?

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Mr R. R. Stokes, M.P., on March 11th, 1943, delivered a courageous speech in the House of Commons, in which he attacked the strategically ineffective and needlessly brutal practice of indiscriminate night-bombing, which the B.B.C. and several organs of the Press gloat over with increasing beastliness.

A friend of mine who has made a special study of the question points out that bombing of this kind is a "lazy, ineffectual and cruel way of attempting to win the war," and puts forward some interesting arguments in proof of his assertion. He points out that 20,000 bombers would be needed to inflict 25 per cent. total damage in a town like Cologne. There are ninety such towns in the greater Reich; hence, 1,800,000 bombers would be needed to do 25 per cent. total damage. It is claimed that 5 per cent. damage, if it were done in a period of a year, would suffice, but even this would need 360,000 bombers, or 1,000 a night for a year. Replacement of this force at the rate of 25 per cent. lost, damaged or worn out would involve a total of 90,000 bombers. Each bomber represents 1,000,000 man hours for its construction. 90,000 bombers would need the total work of 30,000,000 men or women during one year, each person working 3,000 hours in the year. This gigantic labour demand is, of course, quite absurd, especially as no allowance is made for training planes, ground staff and the construction of other kinds of aircraft.

At the present moment, the bomber offensive against Germany is being carried out on nights favourable to the offence and unfavourable to the defence, and against targets that are not too far distant. The losses from all causes are probably not less than 10 per cent. under these conditions, but in order to defeat Germany by bombing, it would be necessary to bomb on every day, favourable or unfavourable to the offence, and on targets both near and distant. The loss of 25 per cent. already referred to is therefore not an excessive estimate if Germany's defences are maintained at their present standard, and if the raids are on Germany herself.

It is held by some that Germany might be bombed 24 hours a day in every zone of defence, causing the Germans to maintain three 8-hour shifts for their defence system. It is suggested that Germany could not support such a defence system, and therefore would speedily be at our mercy. In order to carry out this policy, however, 2,500 bombers would have to be used every day, and the use of aircraft on this scale would not be possible, for not only is it most unlikely that such a number of machines and the necessary fuel could be provided, but the task of organization would almost certainly prove too great.

It is also quite possible that Germany's defences would not crumble before such an attack, since it is easier to produce fighters than bombers, and the losses of fighters in conditions of defence are not nearly so high or so difficult of replacement as the losses of bombers. Moreover, the assumption that great military damage would be done is not necessarily sound. All Germany's war factories are not located in large towns. The percentage of damage to war factories in a raid is usually not higher than the percentage of total damage, and if this is negligible, so also is the damage to war potential. Last, but not least, the fact must not be lost sight of that many of Germany's war factories are out of the reach of the Air Force and could not be destroyed from this side.

Before going further in our consideration of the question of night-bombing, it is well to remember that, whether we like to admit it or not, as far as the conflict between ourselves and Germany is concerned, it is we who have the lion's share of responsibility for beginning the practice. I have been told on good authority that some months before the war the question of air attack was the subject of a quite frank discussion between Goering and a British citizen. The latter asked Goering if, in the event of war, we might expect heavy German air attacks, to which Goering replied: "We should not attack England by air, but if she attacked us, then she would get it back." That this conversation really did indicate German policy has later been confirmed by events. Captain Liddell Hart, in an interesting article written in September, 1941, pointed out some of the important stages in the development of air warfare. On May 10th, 1940, the German offensive was launched in the West, and the R.A.F., as a natural consequence, attacked the communications of the invading army, first in the invaded territory, and then in Western Germany. On the night of May 17th, the policy of confining air operations to what might be describesd as the battle zone was abandoned, and air attacks were made against targets at Hamburg and Bremen, and on the following nights also at Hanover. This new policy of attacking military objectives in the interior of Germany was continued in the weeks that followed. On May 24th, the Germans dropped their first bombs on England, although only a few and at scattered places on the East Coast. This was not repeated until British night-raiding had been in progress for a further three weeks. On the night of June 17th the first considerable German air-raid on England took place and from that time on air-raids continued nightly, although on a moderate scale and with evident care to confine their aim to military objectives.

In August the massed German daylight air offensive was launched and on the night of August 24th a single German machine dropped a few bombs on central London.

On the following night a number of British bombers attacked targets in the Berlin area for the first time. A second and heavier attack was delivered on August 28th. A third on the night of August 30th and a fourth on the 31st. The following week a fifth attack was delivered on the night of September 3rd.

The following day Hitler made a speech in which he complained that the British dropped their bombs indiscriminately and threatened reprisals if they did not stop. Next day the Air Ministry announced that on the previous night they had again bombed Berlin for the sixth time. On Saturday night, September 7th, the Germans launched the first of their heavy attacks on London.

The official view was apparently expressed in the statement of "a high authority" in London on September 9th. "The Germans had been asking what their Air Ministry were going to do about the R.A.F. night-bombing for three months. Some of them have been going to their shelters every night for six weeks. That is one of the reasons why the Germans have been stung to make it uncomfortable for us."

Not only is it difficult in view of the above facts to avoid the conclusion that the British Government had the chief share of responsibility for starting the grim contest in night bombing, but they also seem to have been mainly responsible for re-starting it in the spring of 1942, after it had more or less died down for a considerable period, by a heavy attack on civilian quarters in Lübeck which destroyed the ancient Hanseatic city which was one of the chief architectural treasures of Europe. Severe reprisal raids on Bath, Canterbury and Exeter followed. More recently a raid on Berlin obviously provoked a German reprisal raid on London, when that city had for a long time enjoyed immunity.

The friend already referred to is of opinion that there are to-day a greater number of people opposed to the bombing policy than ever before. Seven out of ten of those with whom he has been in touch, are opposed to night-bombing for one reason or another, and even of the remaining three, at least one is doubtful. Such remarks as "I cannot help feeling sorry for the poor German civilians with all those bombers overhead" and "It isn't warfare, but murder," are becoming quite ordinary and representative comments. Objection to night-bombing may be based on any of the following grounds:—(1) It is cowardly, inhuman and brutal and a contradiction of the principles for which we are supposed to stand. (2) It is unmanly, since it puts our innocents in the front line as well as being directed against the innocents of Germany and the Occupied countries. (3) It is assisting in creating hatred against us in the Occupied countries as well as in Germany. The loss of life in battle is accepted as an inevitable consequence of war, but the killing of non-combatants, particularly women, children and aged people, is regarded as murder. (4) We may have had a certain moral right to teach Germany the horrors of aerial warfare, but now we have exceeded our right and allowed the spirit of retaliation to degenerate into a plain desire for revenge. (5) We are attempting to make a sporting affair of cold-blooded massacres. (6) We are hiding behind the Russian Armies, but for whom we should receive measure for measure. If the Russians should fail to hold the Germans, or should make peace with them, we should gather a harvest of destruction and suffering which would make the hardened leaders who now order murder in the name of the British people shudder for their crimes. (7) It is a useless proceeding, with no military results of significance, failing in even its first objective of bringing the Luftwaffe to battle while at the same time weakening our resources for direct attack. (8) It is a dream of fanatics who think a war can be won from the air in violation of the convincing proofs that it cannot be so won. (9) It is a sop to the Russian demand for direct military intervention in the war, and is intended to keep Russia fighting until both she and Germany are exhausted, when Britain and America could use their fresh resources to end the war and dictate the peace which would follow. (10) It is an effort to cover our failure in military enterprises and to sustain war morale.

One of the most horrible results of the blast from the enormous bombs now dropped in air raids is the splitting of the liver and kidneys of the victims who happen to be near, death ensuing in indescribable agony. One is sometimes tempted to feel that a slight splitting of their own livers might be the best way of letting a little sense and mercy into the thick skulls and torpid imaginations of our politicians. As an alternative to this drastic remedy, all people who have any human decency left in them and an active desire to protect, as far as the conditions of war allow, their friends and relatives from a terrible and useless death, should abandon once and for all that ineffective inactivity which is such a disturbing characteristic even of many persons of more than average intelligence and goodwill. They should realise that we need to protect ourselves not merely from our enemies, but from the follies of our own rulers which at times also threaten us with destruction. When so much courage is being called for, and also shown, in other directions, a truly patriotic citizen cannot afford to be too lazy to bestir himself about a matter of urgent public importance; any more than he can afford to be afraid of the police; or afraid of losing his job; or afraid of the censure of his neighbours; or afraid of the criticism of his wife!

Politicians will always give way to the pressure of public opinion, well organised and strongly expressed.

Opponents of indiscriminate night-bombing should assure courageous M.P.s like Mr. Stokes of their active and continuous support. They should inform other M.P.s and members of the Government of their views and wishes in no uncertain manner, at regular intervals, and in increasing numbers.

Last but not least they can associate themselves with the work of the Bombing Restriction Committee, 49 Parliament Hill, London, N.W.3, whose excellent threepenny pamphlet, "Stop Bombing Civilians!" is well worth reading and bringing to the notice of friends and neighbours.

A GIANT IS AWAKING!

By C. H. V. ROSE.

It is May, and in a flight of fancy I have looked over the face of Britain. I have gazed at "Bonnie Scotland," and its "banks and braes and bonnie doons"; looked down upon the crystal clear waters of Loch Lomond, and stared in wonder at Ben Lomond beyond. Yes, this Scotland was bonnie enough.

I have passed through Carlisle and admired the cascades of water tumbling down the rugged slopes of the hills, and on through the Lake District, drank in deeply the beauty I have seen. I have breathed the sweet air of the Pennines and the Yorkshire moors and watched with interest the modern Isaac Walton on the Lincolnshire fens.

I cross the midlands, the Peak district in all its glory, the fertile fields of Nottingham, Leicester, Stafford, Shropshire and Hereford counties, and by a circuit I take in the wonders of North Wales.

I return and take the course of the lovely Severn, and take a peep at the great apple orchards of Somerset, the beauties of Devon, and round the rugged coasts of Cornwall, and through Teignmouth, Exmouth, Exeter and the sleepy pasturelands of Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, the downs of Sussex, the undulating landscape of Kent, "the Garden of England," and my eye sweeps back along the exquisite beauty of the Thames valley. Yes, this Britain is indeed a fair sight.

. . . . Now I take a closer view. I peer deep into the heart of Britain, and I see struggling masses of humanity in great cities; Glasgow and Clydeside; Tyneside, Liverpool and Manchester; Leeds, Sheffield and Bradford; Birmingham, Cardiff, Bristol, and here, what is this, greater than them all—London.

And everywhere the scene takes on a sordid appearance. There are Profiteers and Politicians, Publicans, Pawnshops, Parsons, policemen—parasites all. There are Prudes and Prostitutes mingling in Leicester Square and Piccadilly, the Regent and Oxford Streets, yet it is still easy to identify either, the only difference with old days being that to-day it is the Prude who appears like a painted doll, whilst the Prostitute can be recognised in the neat walking-out costume which yesterday was the hall-mark of respectability. So much for dame fashion in modern society. Their greatest similarity lies in the fawning, lying looks of each of them. All sacred things here are violated and profaned.

And in each of these great cities I look into the places where workers live, and from the streets of Dumbarton to those of Islington, I behold the same kind of picture. This too is sordid, but with a difference. Clad eternally in shoddy fashion, these people grow prematurely old from sorrow, suffering and want. And how much they "want." They are hungry for decent food, decent homes, decent surroundings; hungry for beauty in life, and hungry, even for love.

"The wonder is," said Sebastian Faure, "not that the people are as bad as they are, but in the circumstances they are as good as they are."

"As bad as they are"! I'll say! Here, anyway, is where we must look for the real heroes of life. Do they not produce all our wealth? Do they not render service of every kind, and receive nought but disservice in return?

They fight fires; they rescue comrades trapped in dangerous coal mines, and fellow workers and their relatives from equally dangerous bombed houses.

Yes, they produce all the wealth for their masters, and fight all their wars for them. Their own fault lies in their amazing patience.

But wait! What is this? Yes, the great giant of Labour is waking at last, and he is taking a good look round, wondering. What should he do?

Comrade, pass him "The Word."

I GOT HIS GOAT

By JOHN ROEBUCK.

I was seated in a public-park shelter reading "The Word" when another man came in and sat down beside me.

"What's the news to-day, sir?" he asked.

"This is not an ordinary newspaper, sorry," I answered, showing him the front page.

"'The Word.' Never heard of it. A religious paper, evidently?"

"No, sir," I answered, smiling. "On the contrary, an anti-militarist paper. And a much needed tonic these days, believe me."

He chuckled: "You'll be a pacifist then?"

"I am, and proud of it too. 'Praise the Lord and scrap the ammunition.' And you?"

"Me? I'm red, white and blue and proud of it too." And he literally smacked his lips over the differentiation. "And," he went on, "if you'll excuse me for saying it, I think you pacifist fellows stress too much your hatred of war. It's rather funny, you know. As if no other body hated war. As a matter of fact, nobody wants war!"

"Nobody?" I queried.

"Well, I mean nobody but those Axis thugs."

"Wouldn't it be nice if they were pacifists?"

"It certainly would," he declared fervently.

"So pacifism is a virtue only in enemy countries, eh?"

"Militarism is a very second nature to them. They don't know what Peace means. We do. We are a peace-loving people."

"And couldn't we have given them an example of it?"

"Some hope," he laughed. "What do you think would have happened then?"

"I don't know," I laughed in return. "Can you cite me a precedent to help me?"

"Can you cite me one to prove your case?" he returned.

"Yes, of course I can. Jesus Christ."

"Oh, be reasonable, man," he replied with considerable impatience. "Can't you see this is not an ordinary war? It's a crusade. It's a world conflict between Good and Evil, between God and the devil. And we are fighting under God's command."

"You are rather unfair to Churchill, aren't you?" I said, but he ignored the remark and went on: "We are fighting for world peace, a lasting peace. We do not want our children or our children's children to go through such a hell as we are going through."

"But what if God has a crusade in store for them too? Would you have them to refuse to fight under His command? Besides you forget the enemy use similar arguments to justify war."

"And do you believe them?" he snapped.

"If you mean, do I believe them or you, the answer is neither."

"Come, come, be honest. Are you for God or the devil?" he challenged me.

"Evidently I cannot be for God if you are," I answered. "But tell me, do you believe that whichever power is defeated it will humbly acknowledge that God had not been on its side? Is it not more likely to say that God Himself has been beaten for the time being, and resolve to make another effort to wrest the laurels from the devil whenever the opportunity should arise?"

"What in heaven's name does all that soap-box stuff mean?" he asked in a rasping tone of voice.

"Well, you have just stepped down off the soap-box yourself, you know. And, after all, I was simply suggesting that you were a bit egotistical in trying to plan the Future in God's behalf. At least, according to my way of thinking. But I have no desire or intention to quarrel with you, my friend."

"But heavens, man, we must plan for the Future. It's our calling. It's our duty to God and King and Country. We must safeguard our heritage. And death is the maximum price we must each be prepared to pay for Peace."

"Hear, hear," I ejaculated, and he continued, "Intolerable aggression must be put a stop to."

"It certainly must," I agreed. "That is the first essential to Peace."

"Force must be met by force," he added.

"Of course it must. There is no other way of meeting it."

He looked at me for a moment, then asked: "Are you pulling my leg?"

"I certainly am not," I declared, "I was never more serious in my life."

"Then how on earth can you claim to be a pacifist?"

"For the very reasons you have stated, my friend. Because I am prepared to pay the maximum price for Peace. Because I have put a stop to intolerable aggression, and because I am meeting force with force, the one and only force that can ever achieve victory for Peace—Soul Force. Understand?"

"Bah! You get my goat!" he declared angrily and hurried away.

"DAILY WORKER" INTERVIEW.

[As we go to press we have received the following brief comment on his "Daily Worker" interview from the Duke of Bedford. The interview was published in our contemporary for April 20. We differ completely from the Duke of Bedford's impression of the fairness of his interview. The subject will be dealt with later.—Ed.]

In spite of the fact that our Editor is inclined to take me somewhat sternly to task for consenting to see Mr. Hyde of the "Daily Worker," I must say that, notwithstanding his unshakable conviction that I should be interned, I rather LIKE Mr. Hyde!

Though, in my opinion, gravely mistaken in many of his views and judgments, Mr. Hyde struck me as being both sincere and logical. Even in his ruthless disregard of liberty he was refreshingly free from that hypocrisy which often leads the Government to imprison a person on some false or trumped-up charge because it lacks the moral courage to declare that he has been arrested simply for opposing the war and favouring a negotiated peace.

Mr. Hyde—who has not been in Russia—clearly regards it as the Workers' Paradise. He believes all the Russian propaganda; considers Stalin so great a general that if he urges a Second Front it must be proof that a Second Front is, from a strategic standpoint, a practicable proposition; believes we have a good chance of victory; and considers that only by a complete military victory can the evils of the Nazi regime be removed. Holding these opinions he feels that everyone should be suppressed who decreases enthusiasm for the war, either by advocating peace by negotiation, or by suggesting, by anti-Semitic propaganda, that the war is a Jewish ramp. I disagree with Mr. Hyde in most of his premises and I also think that he wants to do evil that good may come; but granted his premises, his conclusion is not devoid of intelligibility nor even of a kind of logic.

"UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER" CRY

Lady Wedgwood Indicts IT as "a Criminal Folly."

Lady Wedgwood has addressed the following letter to us:—

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I think "The Word" is doing excellent and much needed work. I hope you will soon have an article on the criminal folly of the "Unconditional Surrender" Cry, it is equivalent to a demand for a Third World War. We would never submit to it. Why expect the German nation to do so? A negotiated peace is the only one that would have any chance of lasting, and it would save thousands of lives and millions of money. It would be no sign of weakness, but (as Sir Ian Hamilton said in 1926 re the Boer War agreed peace) "a sign of Courage, Christianity and Common Sense."

Yours sincerely, with kind regards and good wishes.

FLORENCE WEDGWOOD.

WASTE!

Waste! Waste! Oh, squander and waste,
Lives, homes, food—everything!
Pause not to reason, but haste,
Speed on the mass massacring!

Spend! Spend! Unceasingly spend!
Buy all the bane of mankind:
Break all you never can mend:
Lose what you never will find.

Kill! Kill! Bring ruin until
The world is seething with hate:
Crush all the latent good will:
Then THINK: when thought is TOO LATE!

CHURCHILL AND HITLER.

HARRY POLLITT'S VIEW.

Labour's own daily newspaper, the "Daily Herald," hails Churchill as Britain's man of destiny. That is the measure of Labour's shame, the betrayal of every principle of Socialism and Peace. For one thing now understood by our people is that wherever Churchill speaks or acts, suffering and death are the result, exactly the same as when Hitler speaks or acts.—HARRY POLLITT in "Labour Monthly," December, 1940.

LABOUR MUST BECOME ONE.

Circumstances demand that Abraham Lincoln's famous demand for unity, slave or free, shall be applied to the Labour movement in Britain at the present hour of crisis. Lincoln was pledged to end slavery as we are pledged to end war. But he saw that nothing could be done without union. His logic applies to-day. We recant none of our anti-Parliamentary views and we recant none of our pacifism. But democracy will be destroyed and civilization will perish unless we develop a genuine all-in Labour movement, for war or peace, in Great Britain. That does not mean a movement wrecked by Communist Party affiliation or membership. The Communist Party has no place in the Labour movement in Great Britain and should be repudiated and boycotted by every honest worker. We believe in the fullest and most open discussion of Socialist views and approaches, and of Pacifist understanding, inside the Labour movement. We believe also that, if war is to be overcome, and mankind saved, the workers must rally round the Labour Party Executive in its firm struggle against the Communist Party conspiracy for power and dictatorship and the Tory conspiracy for Vansittartism and a Third World War. Labour must unite in a spirit of full and free democracy.

G. B. S. ON MARX AND RUSSIA.

By C. H. Norman.

Mr. Bernard Shaw, on March 10, 1943, contributed to The Daily Herald a curious article entitled "What would Marx say about Beveridge?" in the course of which Mr. Shaw declared that Marx's name was not mentioned in the Fabian Essays on Socialism. This statement (which is erroneous) confirmed a suspicion that I have long held that Mr. Shaw has never read the Fabian Essays, except, possibly, the one that he wrote himself on the Rent Theory. The remainder of The Daily Herald article also convinced me of the truth of two other long-held suspicions, namely, that Mr. Shaw has never read Das Capital, nor the Webb's book on Soviet Communism, for, whatever else this book proved, it proved that there was no real Communism (as that word was understood by William Morris, Kropotkin and others) in Russia under the Soviet system. It is simply a system of State exploitation under an uncontrolled bureaucracy.

One handicap in discussing political theory and practice at the present time is the lack of any meaning in words. To speak of the Western "Democracies" is an absurdity. The finance-capital which rules the United States, Britain, France and Holland has about as much to do with democracy (in the sense of government by the people) as the Nazionalé-Socialist Party in Germany has to do with true Socialism, or the Soviet system of bureaucratic control has to do with Communism: which is exactly nothing.

Mr. Richard Law, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was certainly very frank about the non-existence of democracy in the Western communities, when he made his statement on March 18, 1943, in the House of Commons: "Until relatively recently" (which may be defined as till last week) "in every Western country there was a small and restricted class which was responsible for the government and for the policy of that country. In every country that class was the same" and still is. "It had the same traditions, the same outlook, the same standards of education and of values. In those days it was necessary only that our diplomats should be members of the governing class. Indeed, in those days it was essential that they should be members of that restricted class, because, if they were not, they would have had very little influence in the countries to which they were accredited." In an earlier passage in the same speech, Mr. Richard Law made the following admissions about the competence of these gentlemen in his own time. "It may be said that our foreign policy between the wars was mistaken. Speaking from this vantage point of time, I would say myself that it was tragically mistaken, and I think all hon. members of this House would agree with me, though the basis of their agreement might be different from mine."

These remarks are strengthened on the economic side by Lord Acton's criticism of the membership of "democratic" Parliaments. In the following passage from a letter quoted in the introduction to Lord Acton's Essays entitled: History of Freedom, Lord Acton declared: "The men who pay wages ought not to be the political masters of those men who earn them, for laws should be adapted to those who have the heaviest stake in the country, for whom misgovernment means not mortified pride or stinted luxury, but want and pain and degradation and risk to their own lives and to their children's souls." The last two lines are specially applicable to the present activities of the House of Commons in England and the House of Representatives in the United States.

The verbatim report of the Second Session of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R., held from August 10–21, 1938, has some instructive passages indicating how absurd is the pretence of treating the Russian community as based on Socialist or Communist principles. The debates on the Russian legal system are very instructive. It is noteworthy that August 1938 was the height of the crisis in the relations between Germany and Czecho-Slovakia; yet in the review of foreign affairs the name of Czech-Slovakia is not even mentioned, which may explain why Russia felt able to enter into a pact with Germany a few months after August, 1938.

The discussion on the legal system is certainly prophetic in its forecast of the collapse of bourgeois justice, in Great Britain, particularly, as a safeguard of liberty. The Russian speakers seem to have anticipated the introduction of Regulation 18B in Britain even in 1938!

The following extracts are difficult to reconcile with the idea that the Soviet system is based on non-recognition of any system of private property or exploitation. On page 163 of the debates on the legal system, the following appears: "The case of the citizens Zheglov, who reside in the city of Cheboksary, concerning a partition of property, has been dragging on since 1933. It has been heard seven times before political tribunals; before the Appellate Collegium, the Presidium, the plenary sitting of the Supreme Court of the Chuvash Republic, and before the Supreme Court of the R.S.F.S.R. It has also come before the Procuratorship. The endless peregrinations of the case from one judicial tribunal to another are responsible for the fact that it has not been decided. I will cite another case of redtape in the Courts. In 1936 Citizeness A brought a suit for alimony. The case was heard twice before a People's Court, four times in the Supreme Court of the Chuvash Republic, once in the Supreme Court of the R.S.F.S.R. and is still undecided." So there is a legal problem in Soviet Russia concerning the exercise of property rights just as there is in capitalist or democratic states. The following statement echoes a familiar complaint to those connected with the legal system in England. "There are quite a number of complaints from citizens about the bad practice in People's Courts of postponing and deferring hearing. Many people are summoned to attend Court to the detriment of their ordinary work, and all to no purpose. This entails unnecessary expense and gives rise to dissatisfaction." (page 187). Another interesting observation is: "The trial of civil cases occupies an enormous place in the work of the Courts." So, Russian "Communism" has not modified the contentiousness which some people attribute mainly to the existence of the system of private ownership in land and capital.

These passages have been brought together to illustrate the thesis that the real cause for the apathy of the mass of the people concerning the monstrous misgovernment (of which the war is the most dreadful example) of Britain, Europe, and the United States, lies in the fact that all these systems of government are shams. The peoples all the time are under the control of men in administrative, judicial, political or military office who are quite incapable, morally and practically, of exercising fairly the enormous power that the modern machinery of government has given to the State over the individual. The government of Britain and Europe is an intolerable nuisance in 1943 and an oppression of the rights of men to a decent life. Whatever "ism" is put up, the same evils develop for the same cause—namely, that the pretensions of these governments are shams, their real purpose being the maintenance of a small section of the community in an advantageous position over the mass of the community. It is the evil of Fabianism, as represented by G.B.S. and the Webbs that this abominable system has been promoted under the pretence that it was contributory to the freeing of mankind from the thraldom of Capitalism, when in fact the bureaucracy of to-day has rendered the chains forged by Feudalism and Capitalism heavier than ever, as there is no escape from this outrageous system of mal-administered industrial and military conscription now afflicting almost the whole of civilised society. That is the plain truth of the situation whether the system be "democratic," "Soviet Communism," National Socialism, or Fascism in its Italian, French and Spanish varieties. The bases of all these systems is rotten; and their rottenness is proved by the calamities they have brought upon the nations from 1914 to 1943.

EDUCATING GERMANS

In our last issue we reprinted from the columns of the "Manchester Guardian," for April 6, a letter to the editor from the pen of our comrade, Rhys J. Davies, M.P. This letter gave rise to some criticism and comrade Rhys Davies replied to his critics in our contemporary for April 27. This unanswerable reply is reproduced below:—

Sir,—None of your many correspondents who disagree with me has attempted to answer even one of the series of very practical questions I ventured to put on this war-time agitation, which, incidentally, falls into much the same category as the "Hang the Kaiser" of the last war. What they have accomplished is to reiterate the necessity of undertaking the task; they have failed ignominiously to show how it is to be done. The truth is that their hatred has blurred their powers of reasoning.

It is said that just after we defeated the Boers many went out from this country to "teach better manners to those foul folk of the South African veld." In less than two years hardly one of them remained at his post. To coin a contradiction, the natives made it too hot for them by freezing them out; and the same would apply in Germany or any other country if a similar attempt were made.

We sent the Black and Tans to "educate" the Irish; we "taught" them so successfully that they have flatly refused to join Britain in its present fight for "freedom and religion." We spent £100,000,000 of British money in an endeavour to "teach" the Russians that Lenin was just an ordinary criminal, that the Whites were the real gentlemen. In the final "examination" Lenin became the hero of the 130,000,000 inhabitants of that territory and the British, until quite recently, were regarded as hooligans by the Soviets.

We felt sure that we had "taught" the Germans a sharp lesson by imposing most savage penalties on them in 1919; we compelled them to provide coal for nothing for Belgium, Italy and France.

As a consequence, German miners worked for a pittance, scores of thousands of our own colliers were out of work for 15 years or more living in abject poverty, our shipyards became derelict, and our unemployed ran into about 3,000,000. But boomerangs like those have not, apparently, the slightest effect on our present purveyors of hate!

Farther back in history we "taught" even our own kith and kin so very successfully that in the end they threw us out into the sea and established for themselves that independent sovereign Power the United States of America.

It is well that those consumed with a colossal conceit and vanity, including British, Germans, and Italians, who possess an inordinate desire to correct the habits of other nations, who are so certain that they are superior to the rest of mankind, should be reminded what their own history teaches. In all this "Physician, heal thyself" is still an appropriate injunction.

Finally, Dr. Gilbert Murray knows better than any of us the real issues involved here. It is not sufficient to say that Hitler and Fascism caused this war. The fundamental problem is, What made Hitler? He knows too that until the territorial, economic, and financial causes that made it are eradicated there is not the slightest prospect of destroying the totalitarian spirit in Europe either by a military victory or by educating the Germans by foreigners who hate them.—Yours, &c.,

RHYS J. DAVIES.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Tories and "Communists" Engage in Hypocritical War Campaign.

The Duke of Bedford is in the news once again owing to the activity of his enemies.

On April 29 last the Daily Mirror, London, published the following splash heading and letterpress :—

CLUB BANS NAME OF PEACE DUKE

The inscription on Leighton Buzzard (Beds) Conservative Club recording that on April 29, 1913, the Marquis of Tavistock, prominent Pacifist (now the Duke of Bedford), laid the foundation stone, was yesterday erased by a stonemason.

For some time the inscription has been covered over with notices.

The decision to remove the inscription was taken by the Club about two years ago, but recent speeches of the Duke in Parliament decided the members to make their old resolution effective.

Chairman to Resign.

When Mr. W. G. W. Willis was elected president of the club at the annual meeting some weeks ago he expressed the hope that the inscription outside the building would be removed during his term of office.

Mr. B. L. Faulkner, the club's chairman, said yesterday:

"I dissociate myself with this action, and shall resign the chairmanship though remaining a member. To my mind it is ridiculous and childish.

"The Marquis laid the foundation stone because his father could not come, and his father's money built the place."

The Bath and Wilts Chronicle, for April 28, headed its report :—

DUKE OF BEDFORD

Conservative Club Cuts Out a Record

After recording the facts about the stone mason's activities, the report explained :—

The Duke of Bedford has taken a very independent attitude on public questions in recent years, and his attitude on the war, frequently expressed in speeches in the House of Lords, has met with widespread disfavour and criticism.

It is a crime in Britain for an English citizen to venture to think for himself.

Here are some headings from other papers published in various parts of the country.

The Portsmouth Evening News :—

HIS NAME HAS BEEN ERASED

The Oxford Mail :

RECORD ERASED FROM STONE DUKE LAID

The Evening Standard, London :

DUKE OF BEDFORD—CLUB ACTS

The Star, London :

CLUB ERASES DUKE'S NAME FROM STONE

The West Lancashire Evening Gazette, Blackpool, employed a double heading :—

DUKE OF BEDFORD

Club Removes An Inscription

The Nottingham Evening News contented itself with the second of the above headings for its account.

The Eastern Evening News, Norwich :

DUKE'S NAME REMOVED FROM CLUB STONE

The Evening News, London :

OBLITERATED

Inscription About The Duke of Bedford

The News published an interview with the president of the club, that did not appear in any other paper :—

Mr. W. G. W. Willis, solicitor, president of the club, said to an "Evening News" representative:—

"This action was ordered by the club for reasons mentioned in committee, that I am not prepared to give now.

"The Duke has his views. We have ours. You will have to read between the lines for the rest. Similarly, it is necessary to read between the lines to discover why the stonemason on the job refused to have a drink with me or accept a tip.

"When the club was founded the late Duke helped us financially. We wanted him to lay the foundation stone, but he was ill. So the Marquis, the present Duke, did it."

We congratulate the stone-mason on his independence. As though history can be falsified by the Leighton Buzzard Conservatives! Did these people never hear of Lossiemouth and its golf club? Did they never hear how Ramsay MacDonald's name was removed? Have they never calculated the interval between that event and the day when Ramsay MacDonald was summoned to become Premier? Are Conservatives beyond all capacity for thinking and for learning from the past?

The Daily Telegraph, London, the Dundee Evening Telegraph, and the Liverpool Evening Express, were satisfied to employ a sober heading : DUKE OF BEDFORD.

The Nottingham Evening Post published its account beneath the heading :—

THE CLUB AND THE DUKE

The Aberdeen Evening Express cut out the first "The."

The East Anglican Daily Times, Ipswich, and the Torbay Herald, Torquay, used the heading :

DUKE OF BEDFORD:

Club Removes Inscription

The Yorkshire Evening News, Leeds, was content to use the second portion of the above heading for its caption.

The Yorkshire Evening Press, York, varied its heading somewhat :—

INSCRIPTION REMOVED BY CLUB

The Daily Mail, London, said :—

DUKE'S NAME ERASED

But the Daily Worker did not resist the temptation to make its heading define its antagonism. The Daily Worker heading read :—

CHISELLING OFF THE DUKE

Which brings us to a consideration of the Daily Worker campaign against the Duke of Bedford.

In its issue for April 20, the Daily Worker published an interview with the Duke of Bedford. We reproduce the headings and opening paragraphs :—

DUKE ADMITS PROPAGANDA IS TO WEAKEN WAR EFFORT

Aims At Negotiated Peace

From Douglas Hyde

After a four-hour argument with the Duke of Bedford, I am more convinced than ever that he ought to be under lock and key.

The interview had been arranged by someone who believed that, in describing the Duke as a Fascist and demanding his internment, the "Daily Worker" was doing him a grave injustice.

The rest of this one-sided account of the interview does not matter. What stands out is the impertinent demand of a mere hireling that a man who dares to think for himself in war-time should be interned.

The interview report concluded by stating :—

But while the British people are busy cementing their alliance with the people of the Soviet Union the Duke finds his allies among every type of Fascist thug and Nazi agent inside or outside Brixton jail.

Immediately beneath this choice concluding paragraph, appeared the following alleged news-item :—

SHOPPERS APPLAUD 'INTERN DUKE'

DEMAND

Shoppers applauded when posters calling for the internment of the Duke of Bedford were carrried through the streets of Luton as parts of a poster parade advertising a Second Front meeting at the week-end.

Demand for the Duke's internment was also made by a public meeting held in the Cosy Cinema, Whitby, on Sunday.

The Daily Worker continued its campaign in its issue for April 26. We excerpt the following paragraphs :—

'INTERN DUKE' DEMANDS BEDFORD BUILDERS

A canteen meeting of 300 workers on a building job in Bedfordshire has passed a resolution demanding the internment of the Duke of Bedford.

When the question of the Duke's internment was raised at the Biggleswade Urban District Council no resolution was passed as it was felt that the matter was outside the council's province.

The Duke's activities, however, were condemned by every councillor who took part in the discussion.

The following day our contemporary published this item of propaganda incitement :—

'INTERN DUKE': NEW CALL TO MORRISON

From Douglas Hyde

A call to the Home Secretary to intern the Duke of Bedford "for his pro-Fascist activity" was made by the Luton, Dunstable and District Trades Council at its last meeting. . . .

Over 20 organisations in Bedfordshire have now demanded the Duke's internment at Luton, Bedford and Leighton Buzzard.

In a later issue, we shall show how these 20 organisations are manufactured. Before the Soviet Union was invaded, readers of the Daily Worker will recall how vast organisations were demanding a Peoples' Convention. These organisations vanished in a night. They vanished because they were bogus, like all C.P. activities.

And here is a clipping from the Daily Worker for April 30 :—

'READY TO LIVE ON SPUDS FOR 2nd FRONT

From a Worker Correspondent

Twenty-one workers, representing 12 Luton organisations from various factories and trade union branches, on Wednesday went to see Mr. Leslie Burgin, their M.P.

They went to ask him what he thought about a Second Front in Europe, the action of the Polish Government, pro-Fascists, the Duke of Bedford, and the Beveridge Report.

It records the answers. Here is the one concerning the Duke of Bedford :—

The Duke of Bedford, said Mr. Burgin, should "not be taken too seriously"—and the deputation pointed out that that had once been said of Hitler.

During the whole period that this contemptible contemporary has been carrying on its campaign against the Duke of Bedford, for no other reason than his opposition to war, J. B. S. Haldane, F.R.S., has been writing for its columns. Haldane enjoys some reputation as a scientist. Above all else, a scientist is expected to be a man of truth and not a political panderer.

During the period that the Daily Worker was suppressed, Professor Haldane spoke on its behalf in Glasgow. He spoke at St. Andrew's Hall on Sunday, February 23, 1941, and his address was reported fully in Forward, for Saturday, March 1.

We reproduce the first portion of this report :

PROFESSOR HALDANE DEFENDS "DAILY WORKER"

A large audience assembled at St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, last Sunday night to hear Professor J. B. S. Haldane of the Editorial Board of the "Daily Worker," Ex-Commander Edgar P. Young and Randall Swingler protest against the suppression of the "Daily Worker."

Professor Haldane declared that "the 'Daily Worker' was suppressed by the Home Secretary. Mr. Herbert Morrison was a conscientious objector in the last war. Now, however, when he has reached beyond the age of military service he has become quite a fire-eater. I sometimes wish I had a conscience like that. I feel I would not need a gas mask or a steel helmet.

The Home Secretary has acted as prosecutor, judge, jury and executioner with no right of appeal. When Sir John Anderson first warned the "Daily Worker" that it was liable to suppression, I immediately asked him to state to what specific items he referred. I asked what it was that had been printed which he considered dangerous. He refused to give us any specific examples.

That is a new principle in justice. Even under the Inquisition, when men were accused of high treason, they were told of what specific acts of treason they were supposed to have been guilty, but all we would learn was that a high member of the Civil Service had read this paper and had come to the conclusion that it was not the kind of paper he cared for.

We said that if we had done anything wrong we should be brought to trial, but one of the most sinister facts of present day life is that the right to trial by jury is now denied to hundreds of British citizens who are put behind barbed wire without trial.

I am absolutely opposed even to the imprisonment of men like Mosley and Ramsay without trial.

The Government dared not bring these men to trial because their defence would show that they had done no worse than men who to-day are occupying high places.

We have been suppressed on the ground that we published matter calculated to prevent the successful prosecution of the war. If we had been brought to trial I will tell you something of what our defence would have been.

We would have said: "You speak of the successful prosecution of the war and I ask you, which war do you mean? Because there are two wars being waged at the present time.

There is a war against Germany and there is a war against the British people.

If you mean that we are inhibiting men like Lord Stamp from the successful prosecution of the war, we should have to plead guilty.

We should have to admit in Court that we had done our best to prevent Lord Stamp from prosecuting his war successfully."

Professor Haldane proceeded to deal with the question of output and fatigue. He accused the Government of suppressing "a document which interests me as a scientist very greatly." This was the Emergency Report of the Medical Research Council on the Health of Munition Workers, published by the British Government in January, 1940, and signed, among others, by an Air Vice Marshal.

Haldane cited these extracts from the Report:

"The country cannot afford the extravagance of paying for work done during incapacity from fatigue just because so many hours are spent on it.

"Misguided efforts to stimulate workers to a feverish activity in the supposed interests of output are useless, as would be the cheers of partisans encouraging a long-distance runner to a futile sprint at the beginning of the race."

"Avoid over-long hours and continuous work with intervals for rest, and allow Sunday rest and ordinary holidays."

Professor Haldane proceeded to urge deeper air-raid shelters, discussed the freedom of the press in Russia, and concluded:—

A People's Government in this country could appeal to the suffering peoples of Europe, not only to the people of France, Czechoslovakia, Belgium and Holland, but also to the people of Germany and Italy.

The same stooges and hirelings as applauded Haldane opposing internment and 18B in March, 1941, uphold the demand for internment of the Duke of Bedford in 1943!

Note the Communist Party comment on not taking Hitler too seriously! As Tom Taylor has shown in Defend Socialism From the Communists, the German Communist daily, Welt-am-Abend, the leading Communist deputy Renimele, and the German Communist Party, as a party, underestimated Hitler, supported his plebiscite, opposed the unity of the German working class movement, and helped Hitler to power. When Hitler was torturing the Jews in his concentration camps, the Communist International, because of its agreement with Hitler, opposed an international working class economic boycott of Germany. To-day, these sorry creatures pretend to be opposed to the infamous Nazi persecutions.

The official Soviet publication, the Moscow Narodny Bank, Monthly Review, May, 1933, referred to the agreements then recently made or renewed between the Soviet Union and Italy, Poland and Germany.

Here is the Soviet (1933) view of the Italian Agreement:—

The Soviet-Italian Agreement signed on May 6th by Signor Mussolini . . . and M. Levenson, the Commercial Representative of the U.S.S.R. in Italy, though not the first to be concluded between the two countries, is of special importance at the present time.

This Agreement has been welcomed in both countries as demonstrating the continued economic collaboration between the U.S.S.R. and Italy. . . .

The Soviet-Italian Agreement is a new proof of the desire of the U.S.S.R. to maintain normal relations with the rest of the world and that some countries appreciate the need of such relations and are determined to utilise them for the good of both countries.

Here is the Soviet summary of the German Agreement:—

On May 5th the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the U.S.S.R., M. Litvinov, and the German Ambassador in Moscow, M. von Dirksen, exchanged notes on the ratification of the Agreement concluded in Moscow on June 24th, 1931, which has now become operative. At the same time an exchange of Protocols took place for the continuation of the Berlin Treaty concerning neutrality and non-aggression of April 24th, 1926, and of the Convention concerning the Procedure of Conciliation of January 25th, 1929.

The Protocol states that the two Governments, by prolonging the Treaty, intend to continue the existing friendly relations between the Soviet Union and Germany, and to further collaboraffition which is in the interests of both countries and contributes towards assuring the peace of the world.—(Emphasis ours.)

The Treaty of 1926 made this provision:—

Lays down the principle that the contracting parties are not only to observe neutrality if one of them is attacked by a third Power, but they undertake not to participate in any economic or financial boycott against the other party.

This provision prevented the Soviet-Union from supporting the boycott of German goods, which the trade unions in various countries were organising as a protest against the Hitler Government's brutal treatment of Communists and others.

Fenner Brockway supported the move by the I.L.P. to form a United Front with the Communists. In this respect he differed from John McGovern whose concept of the Communist activity has been clear all the time. In his anti-parliamentary days and right on through his parliamentary I.L.P. days, McGovern's attitude towards the "Communist" gangsters has been firm and uncompromising in its hostility. Yet Brockway admitted in the New Leader, June 16, 1933, that the Communist International, because of this agreement with Hitler, "has opposed an international working class economic boycott of Germany."

The Narodny Bank Monthly Review gave us a pretty picture of the 1933 relations of the Soviet Union with Pilsudski, the then dictator of Poland, known to all Socialists as the "butcher":

On May 2nd a delegation of six representatives of the Commissariat for Foreign Trade of the U.S.S.R. arrived in Warsaw at the special invitation of the Polish Government and was accorded a very warm reception. . . .

A satisfactory improvement has taken place in the past few months in the economic and political relations between the Soviet Union and Poland.

The Non-Aggression Pact recently signed between the two countries is a very important symptom of this change, which is also reflected in the transactions between the two Governments. The recent visit of the Soviet Minister in Warsaw to Marshal Pilsudski, who very rarely receives foreign diplomats, is another indication of the welcome change that has taken place. The Governments seem determined to utilise the existing friendly relations to the best advantage of both countries.—(Emphasis ours.)

Hitler, Mussolini, Pilsudski, Stalin!

The defenders of these unholy alliances want to intern the Pacifist and Socialist enemies of war as Fascists!

"COMMUNIST" AND LABOUR

LABOUR PARTY MANIFESTO.

The Labour Party has issued from its National Headquarters, Transport House, Smith Square, London, S.W.1, an excellent manifesto, entitled "The Communist Party and The War." It is published at 2d. and will be sent post free for 3d. direct from the Labour Party. We shall endeavour to obtain copies and circulate it widely.

The pamphlet is an impressive factual indictment of the Communist Party, a very clear record of its hypocrisy and treachery to the workers of Europe. As a matter of fact, the Communist Party has betrayed the workers in every continent. Its record of infamy is not confined to Europe.

Next month we will review this invaluable pamphlet at length.

When ordering this pamphlet, readers also should purchase copies of the pamphlet "The Labour Party and The Communist Party (2d.) and ask for the following leaflets: Numbers 7, 8 and 9, 1943, dealing with the Communist Party Balance Sheet; Communist Propaganda and Labour Party Facts; and the question, "Shall Communism Smash the Labour Party?" These are powerfully written exposures, factual, direct, unanswerable. We shall recur to them later. Meanwhile every reader should obtain copies and circulate them among their mates. Flood the workshop and so answer the careerist hireling wreckers and enemies of all integrity, social and individual, who miscall themselves "Communists." Communists! Shades of William Morris!

THE MINER'S PRAYER.

God, up there, big Man in the sky!
Why do you put queer thoughts in my brain?
I, who must slave till the day I die,
Deep down in the earth, in the Devil's drain?

God, dear God, the preacher has said,
You are kind, and just, and have no axe to grind,
Then, tell me, why did you lift up my head,
And let the earth's beauty float into my mind?

God, you know I was always content,
I slaved without ever a grumbling word,
Just like the pit engine I came and went,
And nothing I saw to love, nothing I heard.

But, God, when you opened my eyes to the sky,
So lovely and blue above this dark town,
And I heard the lark singing free-hearted on high,
I wanted free, too, but the chains held me down.

You saw how my masters had held me down fast,
And bound me, a slave, in this terrible gloom,
And pray as I will now the peace of the past
Never comes back to my living tomb.

God, dear God, I am done and old,
And yet I am little more than a lad,
My brain is on fire, but my hands are cold,
And I sometimes fear I am going mad.

God on high, if You do exist,
And love us all as the preacher says,
Why don't you guide me through this mist
Into my valley of sunlit ways?

JOE CORRIE.

"COMMUNIST" INTRIGUES AND CONTORTIONS

The Communist Campaign for affiliation to the Labour Party was a feature of the Easter Conferences. Stalinist sponsored resolutions came up at Labour Party branches, at Trade Unions, and at affiliated organisations to the Labour Party, proposing support for the C.P. to become an affiliated organisation. The Daily Worker gave great space to these resolutions. Big headings recorded the fact that, at its Leeds conference, the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants and Warehousemen and Clerks, decided by a majority of two votes, that the Union should support the application of the Communist Party for affiliation to the Labour Party. On the same page, it recorded the vote of the National Union of Public Employees. 432 delegates voted for Communist affiliation and 413 against.

We believe in the unity of the working-class. But it is an illusion to believe that Stalinist "unity" can emancipate the workers from their social, political, and economic exploitation. This illusion is promoted by the Communist Party for no other reason than to forward its conquest of political power. The Stalinists are not interested in the workers' struggle. They are prepared to sacrifice the workers at every turn in order that they, the so-called Communist leaders, may climb to power. Like the Fascists, they have a greed for power, a lust to dominate. They are gangsters and degenerates of the workers' struggle.

What is the political content of Stalinism, miscalled Communism? As John McGovern well said at the Easter Conference of the I.L.P., there is little difference between "gangster-Communism" and "gangster-Fascism." Brute force is the main weapon of each. The workers of Britain may pay a terrible price for the Communist Party yet.

The present Stalinist campaign has discarded the previous Communist definition of "unity"—"unity of labour and anti-fascist forces." The new "unity" is "national unity" behind Churchill and "Soviet-British unity" behind Stalin and Churchill, with Stalin first.

The Communist Party describes itself as the British section of the Communist International. It is laid down in the constitution and rules of the Communist International that decisions of its congress or of leading committees of the Comintern must be unreservedly carried out. Decisions of the Comintern's Executive Committee are likewise obligatory, and must have prompt obedience. This fact has been made clear, with a wealth of evidence, in the Labour Party's powerful manifesto, "The Communist Party and The War."

Harry Pollitt, like William Gallacher, M.P., would have no status in British politics, but for the backing of the Comintern. Pollitt's only consistency is in his obedience to His Master's Voice! This consistent subservience explains his "political somersaulting." The man is, as the Conservatives used to urge, a foreign agent. He has been faithful to the Moscow Communist reactionaries, his paymasters, when Moscow was staging the bogus trials, when Moscow was allied with the Germans, and now when the Soviet is allied with British Imperialism.

Pollitt's career is a study in subversive activities pursued to strengthen the power of Moscow and to destroy all true working-class democracy, and all tendency towards democratic institutions. He has been general secretary of the Minority Movement, and has been in Moscow in July, September, and December, 1924; July, 1929; and February, 1930. He was one of the twelve sentenced in November, 1925, when the Communist Party asked every Socialist to rally to the defence of its imprisoned members, on the ground of Free Speech and Free Press! Always he has been faithful to Moscow and had the courage of the Moscow dictator's opinions.

Writing in the February 1943 issue of the Labour Monthly, Harry Pollitt states that:— the application of the C.P. to be accepted as an affiliated organisation with the L.P. is an important and serious political act.

The act is, indeed, a most serious act. It is an attempt to advance Fascism through pseudo-Communism.

The very methods by which the Communist Party has endeavoured to influence the working class movement have been the methods of Fascism. No one has urged the employment of those methods more consistently than Harry Pollitt.

On January 29, 1930, Harry Pollitt published an article on the editorial page of the Daily Worker, under the title, Now is the Time for Action. The action Pollitt urged included smashing up opponents' meetings. Here is an excerpt from this precious article:—

Workshop meetings should be called by such workers and resolutions for the support of our Party should be carried, but the mere passing of recolutions is not enough. There should not be a Labour meeting held anywhere, but what the revolutionary workers in that district attend such meetings and fight against the speakers, whoever they are, so-called "left," "right" or "centre."

They should never be allowed to address the workers. This would bring us in conflict with the authorities, but this must be done. The fight can no longer be conducted in a passive manner.

We must lead the masses in struggle against this Government and the time has arrived to use every conceivable means of political agitation. The Communist Party and its organ, the "Daily Worker," will lead the working class, fighting boldly and openly, against this Government of scoundrels and agents of capitalism.

Communist contortions in matters of principle have been amazing. A more unprincipled gang of unprincipled political scoundrels have never been known in the history of human struggle. Pollitt and his friends have the queerest and most insolent record in this war of any section of the community. They should be hounded out of public life by every decent citizen, whether militarist or anti-militarist. At first, despite the Soviet-Nazi pact, the "Communists" proclaimed themselves unflinching supporters of the war. But when the terms of the German-Soviet pact was announced the position became delicate, and they had to obey orders from Moscow.

In the Daily Worker of 4th November, 1939, George Dimitroff, Secretary of the Comintern, had an article in which he ordered the British Communists to stop the war by organising the proletariat for the struggle against the bourgeoisie. It was stated in this article that any members of the party who refused or failed to comply with Moscow's line on the war must be cleared out of the party. This had the effect of bringing to heel Pollitt and Campbell, who had voted against a reversal of the party's policy given in the original declarations on the war. Pollitt indeed felt constrained to publish in the Daily Worker of 23rd November, 1939, the following somewhat abject apology for his independent attitude:—

"I recognise that my action in resisting the carrying out of the line of the Communist Party and the Communist International represented an impermissible infraction of our party discipline. . . . I request the Central Committee to accept this declaration, and to give me the facilities to prove in deeds that I know how to take my place in the front ranks of our party in fighting to win the masses for support of the policy of the Communist Party of Great Britain and the Communist International."

The party line, as everyone knows, was to oppose the war. The result was the suppression of the Daily Worker under the very regulations now invoked by the Communists against others.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

The following important statement, answering his "Communist" critics and defining his anti-war attitude, was made by the Duke of Bedford in a letter to the editor, published in the Bedfordshire Times, for May 21:—

DUKE OF BEDFORD AND THE RAILWAYMEN

Sir,—I wonder if Bedford No. 2 Branch of the National Union of Railwaymen could inform me on what occasion I declared my intention of utilising my wealth to "undermine the war effort," the exact form of words I am stated to have used? There is, of course, a sense in which every advocate of a negotiated peace may be held to be "undermining the war effort," but this phrase very often connotes various forms of sabotage carried on in war industries with the aim of assisting the enemy by depriving our Fighting Forces of the necessary munitions and equipment; or it may connote anti-war propaganda carried on among members of the Forces. This form of undermining of the war effort I have never at any time either advocated or engaged in.

HUMPHREY CHALMERS

The Baptist Pacifist Fellowship, the Pacifist and Socialist movements generally, and conscientious objectors, have lost a bold and able champion in the person of the Rev. Humphrey Chalmers, M.A., for 16 years pastor of Hill Cliffe Baptist Church, Warrington. Comrade Chalmers died at his home, 26 Whitefield-road, Stockton Heath, Warrington, on Tuesday, May 4 last. In September, 1942, he underwent a serious operation and had been in failing health since. He returned to his ministerial duties but preached on only two occasions.

Sixty-three years of age, Mr. Chalmers was once a purser on the Clyde steamers. A love of the Clyde remained with him throughout his life. He entered the Baptist ministry in 1904. A Master of Arts of Glasgow University, he held pastorates at Wallingford, Berkshire, Redhill, Surrey, and Wandsworth, London, before coming to Hill Cliffe in November, 1926.

The Baptist Handbook gives the dates of his pastorates: Wallingford, 1904-1910; Redhill, 1910-15; East Hill, Wandsworth, 1915-26; Hill Cliffe (Warrington), 1926.

As Chaplain to Wandsworth Prison during the First World War, Humphrey Chalmers was a tower of strength to the Conscientious Objectors imprisoned there. When the Russian Revolution came, and Big Business was intriguing against the newly born Soviet Republic, Humphrey Chalmers was tireless in the organisation of "Hands Off Russia" Committees. The reproduction of some of the handbills, revealing his activity, would be a fitting tribute to his memory.

The funeral took place at Hill Cliffe Baptist Church on Sunday afternoon, May 9, and was followed by cremation at Manchester Crematorium. The service at the crematorium was conducted by the Rev. H. Motley, superintendent minister of the Lancashire and Cheshire Baptist Association.

A memorial service was held at Hill Cliffe on Tuesday, May 11.

The Rev. K. C. Dykes, of Wavertree Baptist Church, Liverpool, speaking at the funeral service, described Humphrey Chalmers as a genuine man, full of patience. During his last illness, Humphrey Chalmers wrote some lines, entitled "The Years Between: A Roundel to an old Friend." These read:—

The years between their tale have wrought
Of work worth while, or scamped and mean,
With cowardice and courage fraught,
The years between.

Some idle hours have fruitful been
And such I treasure in my thought,
While some were filled with sorrow keen,
And some, it may be, wisdom taught:
Goodness and mercy each has seen
And so, for all my thanks are brought—
The years between.

We remember him for his untiring and uncompromising pacifism and his loyalty to all who suffered for the cause of humanity, whether Christian or Freethinker, Gentile or Jew, Buddhist or Hindu. Humphrey Chalmers was a true Humanist and his freedom from sectarian trammels limited his social advancement under our present herd society.

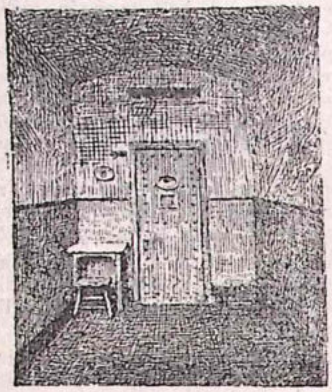
THE BAPTIST PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP has issued an interesting report for 1943. The new chairman is the Rev. Gwenyth Hubble, B.A., B.D., of the Student Christian Movement. The membership theological students, 4 Deaconesses, and 21 of the Fellowship now includes 273 Ministers, 55 Missionaries. All readers, who are Baptists, and wish to join the Fellowship, should write to the Hon. Secretary, The Rev. G. Lloyd Phelps, B.D., 21 Cambridge Drive, Denton, Manchester. Members "COVENANT TOGETHER TO RENOUNCE WAR IN ALL ITS WORK AND WAYS."

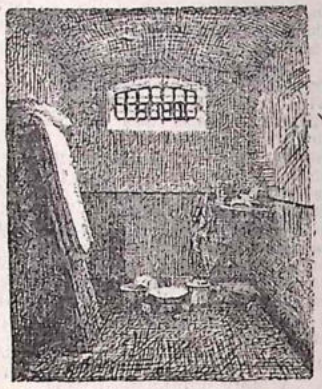
The Moscow announcement, abolishing the Communist International, was made on Saturday, May 22. This paper was in the press then and it was too late to relate our "Communist" exposures to the end of the Third International epoch.

WANDSWORTH PRISON IMPRESSIONS

By Councillor CHAS A. EARL

An Account of Six Weeks' Imprisonment in H. M. Prision, Wandsworth.

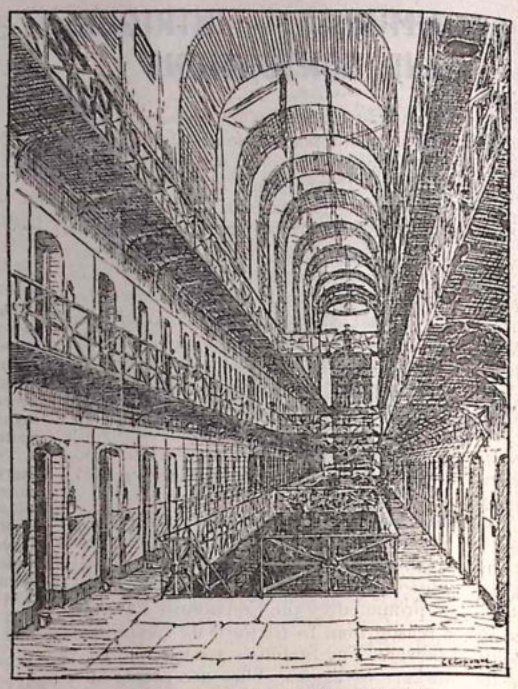




A PRISON CELL.

Sketches by E. M. Wilson, a conscientious objector during 1916-18.

(1) Looking from the door, showing spy-hole in door, and gasbox above table. The glass was broken and this was used to speak through during the C.O. Prison Strike in 1918. (2) Window looking up to exercise yard in basement cells. The bed-boards were used as sounding boards. The speaker held them over him when he spoke, slanting from floor towards gasbox. Many lectures were delivered in this way. Comrade Earl was sustained during his 1941-42 imprisonment by recalling the stand of the C.O.s of the first world war.



C-HALL, WANDSWORTH PRISON.

Drawn in June, 1917, by G. E. Gaxoigne, a conscientious objector.

This was the hall in which the C.O. strike took place in 1918 and 1919. The picture shows the stairs leading to the basement in which the editor and about 30 other C.O.s suffered solitary confinement for several months. The story of this strike was told in "The Word" for April, 1940.

On the 4th December, 1941, I was sentenced at Godalming Police Court to two months' imprisonment. My legal crime was, in the words of the summons served on me, "failing to apply to be registered, contrary to Article 2 of the Civil Defence Duties, Compulsory Enrolment Order, 1941." I was escorted from the Borough Hall to the police station by two constables and locked in a cell. This was about 11 a.m. I was given dinner and at 2.30 I was taken out to a very comfortable saloon car and, with two constables, taken to Wandsworth gaol which we reached about 4 p.m.

When I first saw the prison it reminded me of the entrance to a medieval castle. A huge grim-looking grey stone building with a massive gate. One of the policemen got out and rang a bell, and the huge gate was opened only to reveal another one three or four yards farther on. The car drove in, and the first gate was secured before the second was unlocked, and then we drove on to the reception room, and once inside that door I had really got into prison.

The warder was polite, but very curt; he asked my full name, address, age and sentence, although he had all of the particulars in front of him. (I might say here that all of the various officials I went before, both on entering the prison to serve my sentence and on leaving at the end of it, always required these particulars of me. I imagine it was to prevent any possibility of impersonation.) I was passed on to a second warder who told me to strip, and while I stood naked I had to empty the pockets of my clothes and have the contents entered into a register; this I signed and my clothes and property were then put into a locker until my release. I was then ordered into a bath, after which a complete kit of prison clothes was issued to me. The underclothes and shirt were freshly laundered, but the suit of gray cloth and shoes had been worn many times before. We were also given one pair of sheets, pillow case, shirt for night wear, dessert spoon, small piece of soap, towel, scrub brush, hair brush, small piece of comb, and I was allowed to keep my own tooth brush. This stripping and bathing is done in sight of warders and convicts.

I was then sent with the other new convicts into a long passage and was given two thick slices of very coarse bread and margarine and a pint mug of cocoa (no milk or sugar). We were then lined up to be interviewed by the chaplain and doctor. I now had a little time to look around and take stock of my brother criminals. The one immediately in front of me was a youngster of 20, who told me he had deserted from the army. He had already been considerably punished by the military authorities, and now he had to serve three months in a civil prison, after which he would be free. I was also told by one of the warders that out of approximately 2,000 prisoners at Wandsworth about 600 were deserters from the Forces and another 200 were men who, although not willing to desert, were so tired of army conditions that they committed civil offences in order to be sent to a civil prison for a few months, and I was given to understand that this state of affairs was the same in all the state prisons.

The prisoner immediately behind me was an incorrigible beggar, a man of about 30, very cheerful, with a large vocabulary of swear words. He had been in various prisons on and off for 12 years and had spent the last six Christmases in gaol, and this would make the seventh. His sentence this time was 12 months hard labour. In this day's lot of prisoners there were several soldiers and eight young conscientious objectors.

The chaplain attached to the prison (a full-time position) is, of course, Church of England: he had no sympathy for conscientious objectors. When it was my turn to be interviewed I was told to enter his office. He was seated at a table with a warder on either side (for protection, I suppose!) I had to give my full name, age, sentence, and religious denomination. He asked me what my conviction was for, and I told him I was a conscientious objector, that I had refused to register for fire-watching and that I was very proud to be taking my stand with those young men he had just seen. He said "get out," so I "got." After a time the medical officer came, the warder shouted for everybody to stand to attention while the doctor walked to his office. We had to strip again and parade before the doctor and were then led away and locked in cells for the night.

I must confess that when I heard the heavy cell door shut behind me I felt rather "blue." It was about 8 p.m. and it had been a very trying day. The cell was bricked and had an arched roof; it was about 12 ft. by 7 ft. and about 9 ft. at highest point of arch. High in the wall was a small window, 12 in. by 8 in., with 3 heavy bars across and 3 down. There was a low-powered electric light over the door, which we used when we were in the cells, as otherwise, even in daylight, the cells were dark. The electric switch was outside each cell. The only furniture was a small white wood table and chair and a triangle shelf on which stood a small enamel washing bowl and jug, and underneath, a small chamber pot. Three planks nailed to three pieces of 2 in. by 2 in. wood, to serve as a bed, with a cokernut fibre mattress, approximately 1½ in. to 2 in. thick. Besides the sheets issued to me there were also three blankets and a coloured bed spread in the cell. An enamelled plate, a pint pot (with no handle) for drinking purposes, and a small mirror completed the furnishing. The floor was tiled and the cell was without heat.

As soon as I found myself locked in, I put my bed on the floor, made it up ready for sleeping and got into bed; the light was turned out at 9.30. Fortunately that first night I slept soundly, but it was the only time I was able to do so. Lights were switched on again at 6 a.m. and a warder came and looked through the peephole in the cell door to see that prisoners were getting up.

After dressing my first job was to remove the bed clothes, stand the plank and mattress up against the wall and hang the bed clothes over them, and woe betide any convict whose bed clothes were not evenly folded and hung up. At 6.45 the cells were unlocked and slops had to be emptied and fresh water drawn.

The main prison at Wandsworth reminded me of a huge spider's web. It has four storeys and a basement. In the centre is a circular hall from which you can see to the top of the building. In this hall are the offices of the officials. From the hall radiate six wings lettered A to F; each wing consists of a corridor from which one could see to the top of the building. On either side of the corridor were four landings with 25 cells on each. The two landings on each floor are connected by a bridge, and to prevent suicide wire netting is fitted across the well of the wing. These six wings accommodated 1,200 prisoners. There were also additional wings not attached to the main prison. I was told by a warder that there were over 2,000 prisoners at Wandsworth at that time. In the middle of each landing on either side there was a w.c. and sink with tap and it was here that slops were emptied and fresh water obtained. Prisoners were required to scrub their furniture and cells (and failure to do this would bring warnings and punishment). This proved to be very necessary as my clothes, after working on dirty mail bags, etc., made the chair very grubby. The scrubbing had to be done with cold water. As soon as slops were emptied and water obtained the cells were locked until 7.30, when breakfast was brought to the cells, consisting of a small portion of "cob" of very coarse wholemeal bread (very dry to eat) and margarine, half a pint of porridge without milk or sugar, and a pint of tea, very overstewed, so much so that the sides of the mug were coated with stain from the tea.

The cells were again locked until 10 minutes to 9, when the convicts filed out to wash their enamel plate, spoon and mug. We then stood in the doorway of the cell until the bell rang and we were lined up and marched to the workshops or exercise yard. On the first morning I went with the other new prisoners before the Governor. He, like the other officials, asked my name, age, sentence, etc. He told me that I ought to be ashamed of myself and should be setting an example. I said I hoped I had done that.

I was then given my number, 14480, and allotted a permanent cell, E4/4, which means E wing, 4th landing and 4th cell. A card, which was later hung outside my cell, was filled in with this information, together with my name, age, religious denomination, offence, sentence, date of release if full time served and earliest date of release if full remission obtained. (On all sentences of more than six weeks a third of the time is remitted provided the convict's conduct is good. I managed to obtain full remission, although I found it difficult at times not to protest at the petty tyranny and bullying by some of the warders). We were also given a library card for recording the books issued to prisoners. Each prisoner is allowed a bible, and for the first month one fiction and one educational book (so-called) are issued each week, and after a month two fiction and one other are issued. Unfortunately one can't choose one's books, and I certainly got some queer ones. Work in the morning consisted in my case, for two or three days, in cleaning lavatories, and after that mending holes in very dirty mail bags. The work time was from 9 to 11.15. Then exercise round and round a prison yard until 11.35 and then back to the cells. Dinner was brought at 11.50, consisting sometimes of a very sloppy stew (popularly known as "floating fat,") sometimes minced vegetable soup with one or two boiled potatoes, and on two or three days a small portion of cabbage was added (the potatoes were cooked in their skins, plus dirt and straw, and were frequently rotten, the other vegetables were also served in a disgusting condition), a thick piece of dry bread, and twice a week we had "duff," which looked and tasted like a "sorbo" rubber sponge. As a change one day a week we had a slice of corned beef with potatoes and some boiled rice, and on another day a small slice of boiled bacon and haricot beans. All food had to be eaten with the desert spoon, knives and forks not being allowed. The food was brought to the cells in tin containers and frequently when the tin was emptied out the dirty state of the tins made one feel ill.

Cells remained locked until 1.50, then they were opened to allow prisoners to empty slops, etc. We were then marched into the workshops at 2 o'clock and worked until 3.20. We then had 25 minutes' "exercise," and at 3.45 returned to our cells. A warder and convict orderlies brought our teas, which consisted of a "cob" of bread and margarine and one pint of cocoa without milk (except on Wednesdays and Sundays when half an ounce of cheese was issued in addition). At tea time also a tin with just over a dessert spoonful of yellow sugar was given to each convict to be used as he wished in porridge, tea or cocoa. The cocoa was most unappetising; it was covered with fat, probably nutritious, but nauseating. I purposely kept a half pint in my mug all night and the next morning the fat on it was so thick that I was able to turn the mug upside down and shake it and it did not let the liquid out.

Tea was the last meal of the day and we remained locked in our cells till 6.45 next morning. After tea, in spite of the very dim light, I either read or worked on the mail bags, sitting with my blankets around me, as the cell was very cold. I was glad to use mail bags as extra cover for my bed at night.

That is how the days from Monday to Friday were passed, the only exceptions being that one day each week all prisoners are taken to the bath house for bathing, when clean socks and underclothing are supposed to be issued, but it was two weeks before I obtained a change of socks and three weeks before I had a change of underclothes. The bath takes about half an hour and I believe everyone looks forward to it. I never really appreciated hot water until I was in prison and could only have it once a week.

On Wednesdays a half-hour service was held in the prison chapel.

On Saturdays there was no morning "exercise," and work was continued in the shop until about 11.30. No work in the afternoon, but 40 minutes' "exercise."

On Sundays the rising and meal times were the same as on week days. No work in the shops. Service in chapel from 9 to 10, 20 minutes "exercise" morning and afternoon. Convicts dreaded Sundays more than any other day of the week.

It will be seen that convicts are solitarily confined to their cells for about 19 hours out of 24 hours each day from Monday to Friday, 21 hours on Saturday and 22 hours on Sunday. That they are out in the air for not more than 50 minutes daily, and even in the summer time I am told these conditions do not vary.

Lack of adequate sanitary arrangements is the cause of much physical and mental misery. Prisoners are expected to use the w.c.'s attached to the workshops or alongside the exercise yard whenever possible. There were two w.c.'s and one urinal attached to my workshop where 70 to 80 men worked from 9 to 11.15 a.m. and 2 to 3.20 in the afternoon for five days a week, and in the exercise yard there were three w.c.'s and one urinal and this same number of men to use them during the 20 minutes' exercise morning and afternoons from Monday to Friday inclusive.

On Saturdays there was only from 9 to 11.30 to use the workshop lavatories, and in the afternoon 500 to 600 men would have to exercise in the yard (with the three w.c.'s and one urinal) for 40 minutes. On Sundays there were 500 to 600 men exercising in the yard for 20 minutes morning and afternoon, and many prisoners spent the exercise time queueing for the w.c. Even if the human body will conveniently function to order, it is obvious that 600 men cannot use three w.c.'s in 40 minutes. During my last two weeks in prison the w.c.'s were all frozen up, but still they had to be used as fast as possible during the time available. If one was unable to use these places during work or exercise time the tiny chamber pot in the cell was all one had to use. In any case, between 4 p.m. and 6.45 a.m. (14¾ hours) this little pot was the only convenience available and there was no opportunity to empty it until the next morning. Bearing in mind the smallness of the cell and the tiny window, of which two small panes only could be slid aside to let in the air, it will not be difficult to imagine the condition of the atmosphere in which the prisoners spend their hours of solitude and eat their meals. I used to dread the ten minutes when prisoners lined up to empty their slops, the stench was unbelievable. Carrying the pots with their obnoxious contents was quite a precarious business because they were invariably full to the point of overflowing. I was glad on these occasions that it was cold weather and not summer time.

After the first few days of prison life and food it is common for a man to suffer from a severe attack of diarrhoea, lasting three or four days, yet he cannot get out of the cell except during the times I have stated. Incidentally I might add that when I was first taken to my permanent cell an unpleasant odour greeted me. I discovered that the cause was an unemptied chamber pot left by a former prisoner. I had to empty it out and clean it, but it was days before the cell was free from the horrible smell. I asked for disinfectant, but it was not forthcoming, neither was hot water or soda.

CHARLES A. EARL.

Our comrade, Charles A. Earl, was born at Dorking, Surrey, on February 17, 1888. He is married and has two daughters, one a school teacher and the other a hospital sister, and three sons. Two of the sons have been given unconditional exemption and the third, who is not yet 18, has registered as a C.O. The family is entirely pacifist. That fact made his own stand much easier.

Up to 1940, Comrade Earl was an active member of the Labour Party and Trades Union. After that time things began to get very difficult.

As he could not possibly compromise on the war issue with them, he reluctantly resigned his membership. He is a member of the Godalming Borough Council and the only pacifist on that body.

In September, 1941, Comrade Earl wrote to the Town Clerk of Godalming informing him of his refusal to register for firewatching. In the December following he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment or £25 fine. He refused to pay the fine and forbade anyone else to do so for him, and duly served his sentence.

In September, 1942, Earl again wrote to the Town Clerk, telling him that he did not intend to register as required by the 1942 Act. As a consequence, he has been summoned to appear at Godalming Police Court again on Tuesday, June 3.

Defining his position, Comrade Earl writes :—

It has been a source of great disappointment to me that many pacifists have been willing to accept conscription in some form or other. I appreciate that each must decide for himself or herself, where they draw the line, but I feel sure that if only 50 per cent. of pacifists had refused to be conscripted it would have had a marvellous effect, but as it is, with only about 5 per cent. standing out against it, and probably this figure is too high, the warring Governments can rest easy, knowing that at some point or other they will be able to recruit most pacifists to assist in the dreadful work by cajoling them on some pretext or other that sounds humane. Herbert Morrison and Ellen Wilkinson have made it very plain that the Government regarded firewatching as an important part of the war organisation, and they made no secret of the fact that the older men and women were required to do this work, in order that the younger men and women could be withdrawn for munitions and the forces. It has been described as "team work," and I think the description is correct. The firewatchers release the men and women to make the bombs, and also release men to become airmen to drop the bombs on our German, Italian, French and other brothers and sisters. The sum total of all this is that firewatchers, bomb makers and bomb droppers are all working as one unit to kill others. That is how I see it, but most pacifists seem to prefer the Government's theory that firewatching is humanitarian, and that allows them to do the work. When spies are shot it is, I believe, the practice to have one rifle loaded with blank cartridge, so that all the firing squad can "kid" themselves that they did not fire the fatal shot; also the officer in charge of the firing party has a revolver in case it is necessary for "humanitarian" reasons to put the victim out of his agony. I rather think it is that kind of delusion that has got hold of so many pacifists. They say quite sincerely "Thou shalt not kill," at the same time they make it more convenient for others to do the killing. Why talk of a negotiated peace so long as you are willing to help in the prosecution of the war.

Furthermore, I personally have done my utmost for years to persuade young men and women to remain steadfast in their opposition to war and to accept prison rather than conditions which are part of the war organisation. Shall I then, now that my turn has come, act like a coward and say, "Don't do as I do, but do as I tell you"?

In conclusion I would like to pay tribute to the Duke of Bedford. I have some personal experience of speaking as a Pacifist in public places during war, and his courage and forthrightness are an inspiration to all of us.

TUNISIA

The spectacular victory of the allied armies in Tunisia, concluding the long drawn out African struggle, offers the most favourable condition for a negotiated peace. Even the fantastic declarations of the Italian Government and the apologies of the Nazis contribute to this result. The future of mankind turns upon the development of the thoughtful as opposed to the herd mind.

Man is born to die; but not to die, generation after generation, by murder. Nor should the organisation of murder be his occupation . Man is born for peace and happiness and fulness of living. If the 1918 armistice had been followed by a negotiated peace, and not a dictated one, there would have been no European collapse of the movement towards Socialism and commonwealth, no Fascism and no Nazism. Reparations, with their perpetuated injustice, defeated and destroyed the rational humans in Germany, and gave us the less than average hystericals, headed by Hitler—a man far inferior to the men he destroyed.

Socialists and Pacifists, all good men and women must unite, to save the world another 1918 and after.

Byna Lee

Died 17th May, 1943

We extend our deepest sympathy to our comrade, the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., Minister of the Unitarian New Meeting Church, in Coventry. Comrade Lee was formerly Minister of Ross Street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, and a Labour member of the Glasgow City Council. Mrs. Lee was associated with her husband in his work in the Socialist and Pacifist movements.

HEWART, L. C. J.: A MUSING.

Lord Hewart died on Wednesday, May 5, at Totteridge, Hertfordshire. He was Lord Chief Justice of England for 18 years—1922-1940.

Born at Bury, Lancashire, on January 7, 1870, Gordon Hewart was for some time a reporter in the Press Gallery of the House of Commons. Called to the Bar in 1902, he began practising in the Manchester County Courts.

Gordon Hewart was elected as Liberal Member of Leicester in 1913 when the office of Solicitor General became vacant in 1916, Lloyd George appointed him to the post. He was raised to Attorney-General in 1919. Two years later he was admitted to the Cabinet, and in 1922 became Lord Chief Justice.

Lord Hewart was one of the signatories to the Irish settlement which involves the partition of Ireland.

In 1929, Lord Hewart published a remarkable book in defence of civil liberty, entitled "The New Despotism." This book will prove to future students of our times that Government Decree and Orders in Council did not arise out of the Second Great War conditions but defined the bureaucratic tendency of the State Department over a perid of years. He viewed with growing concern this lazy willingness of the Legislatrs to give to Departments of State the right to administer and to interpret the law.

This work is a really great book, clearly and simply written—a powerful legal protest and indictment. It was never answered, for its stern challenge was and is unanswerable. Every thinking citizen, with the least respect for liberty, should secure and study this analysis of legislation. The writing is fascinating in its lucidity.

When Lord Hewart published "The New Despotism", he could not have foreseen how really great his book would become. The claims that Bureaucracy was rivetting so steadily on the British people at that time have attained to fantastic inter-linkings and lengths under pressure of war necessity. Government by Order in Council, Statutory Rule and Defence Regulation has reached a stage at which no citizen can follow its ramifications. Since the outbreak of war, these edicts, which Parliament seldom attempts to discuss in advance, have poured out of the Stationery Office at the rate of well over 2,000 a year. The grand total up to the end of 1942 was nearly 9,000. And it has increased since January of this year.

A few, like the clumsy attempt to ban the rail transport of flowers, are from time to time suspended or withdrawn. Others concern matters which set a fixed term to the Order's operation.

The democracy feeling that the war is one of life and death against Fascism — whether history should endorse this view or not—agrees that there must be some orders. Common folk take a homeopathic view of the struggle against European Fascism. The people admit that there arise emergencies when the Government cannot afford time for the normal process of action by Statute. The general enabling power of the Defence Regulations had to be granted. The consent once given, it is exploited intolerably by Ministers and their officials with a mania for regimentation and form-filling. Why we should trust in war-time the men we cannot trust in peace-time no one has explained.

There is no thought behind many of these Orders now. Just power. The flower business is an example. After striving to enforce a total ban, which automatically created a host of petty offences, the authorities reverted to a semi-sensible arrangement. This might well be applied to trouser turn-ups or any other Orders which require the goodwill and co-operation of traders and public. Substitute commonsense for rigidity. Cease from conjuring up more and more artificial offences, which but incite people to commit them. The desired results will come from the people themselves. As it is Regulations are made only to be broken, either through temptation because of their looseness, or ignorance due to their profusion. This is the negation and not the enforcement of law.

Complaint was made against Lord Hewart's great work that there was no precedent for a sitting Lord Chief Justice to issue an indictment on so controversial a subject.

Lord Hewart replied that, as Peer, he was summoned to the House of Lords not merely to vote, but also to advise.

In 1934 Lord Hewart was the central figure in a dramatic scene in the Lords.

During the second reading of the Supreme Court of Justice (Amendment) Bill he suggested that one clause had been introduced as an attack on Lord Justice Slesser because of his political opinions (which were alleged to be Labour), and complained that he had not been consulted in regard to the Bill. He threatened to adjourn his Court early every day and fight the Bill word by word during the committee stage.

Later at a full-dress debate, Viscount Sankey, then Lord Chancellor answered this general strike threat of the Lord Chief Justice by disclaiming any intention to leave Lord Hewart out of consultation.

Lord Sankey explained that no reflection was intended on Lord Justice Slesser, and promised to insert a clause which would safeguard the seniority rights of all appointed Lord Justices.

Notwithhstanding his powerful defence of Slesser's right to hold Socialist opinions, and objection to political victimisation, and notwithstanding his indictment of decree legislation, which is merely a form of Fascism and was rightly condemned, Lord Hewart failed to uphold the liberty of the citizen on the one occasion when the opportunity to do so was given to him.

On May 2, 1939, we argued the Hyde Park Free Speech Case before the King's Bench Divisional Court, consisting of Hewart, L.C.J., and Humphreys and Lewis, JJ. This case was reported in the "Glasgow Herald", "Daily Record", Glasgow; "News Chronicle", London, and Scottish "Daily Express", Glasgow. There may have been other reports but we did not see them. We have not dealt with this case in the account of our trials snce 1909, that have been appearing in these columns. The police court proceedings, at Marlborough Street Police Court, were detailed and commented upon in "The Word" for June 1939.

Lord Hewart, Sir Travers Humphreys, and Sir Wilfred Lewis ,as judges, grossly misconducted themselves and showed no respect for the principles of law as such, and no courtesy as judges. We are not without pleading experience and we have pleaded in the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh and also in the Court of King's Bench in London. We have sampled justice as the accused at the Central Criminal Court, London, and at the High Court, Glasgow. The result may not be greatly different in most cases, but it is a fact that, in the Scot Courts, complete democracy is maintained during the trial. The layman who conducts his own case in the High Court of Justiciary has no complaint to make of his treatment and receives all the courtesy that is accorded to the Advocates. In the English Court this is not so. The Court of King's Bench offends badly in this matter. Counsel have a superior pleading position and the layman pleader is placed in a position that almost amounts to being in the dock. We will enlarge on this treatment at a later date. The Scots Court preserves an atmosphere of sound legal pleading not to be found in the London Court of King's Bench.

On the occasion of our 1939 pleading, Lord Hewart endeavoured to stop us speaking before we had uttered three words. We had begun "My Lords, I—" and we were paused before reviewing the position. Throughout the proceedings, Lord Hewart and his fellow judges did everything possible to interrupt our argument. They betrayed irritation at every period. Irrelevancy has never found a place in our legal reasoning. At that time, we had thirty years' experience of pleading. Further, which is probably a mistake, in all our conflicts with authority, we have never relied upon excitement and support. Our custom since our first trial in 1909 has been to attend court alone and to speak in almost empty court, except for assembled counsel and solicitors, and maybe two or three pressmen. We require no audience for we believe in the principles of jurisprudence. We believe in the laws of evidence, primary and secondary. We are opposed to clamour and violence of every description. We give courtesy in pleading and we expect to receive it. Our contention is always one of reason and commonsense. Every vestige of courtesy and judicial calm was absent from the Bench on this occasion. The principle for which we were contending was a great public right, an inalienable right of democracy. His Majesty's Judges, headed by the Lord Chief Justice of England, had no time for such foolishness. The proceedings were a disgrace.

It is said we must think and write and speak no ill of the dead. We believe in speaking truth of all, dead or alive. Men advance to leadership by betraying the rights of mankind. They die, honoured members of the community. The social wrong they have perpetuated remains, to torture the living, and maybe, to thwart the happiness and well-being of mankind for generations to come. Under such circumstances, it is incumbent on the man of principle to write and speak truly. He should write and speak without bitterness. Equally he should write with accuracy and without apology.

Nearly two years before the Hyde Park Appeal, Lord Hewart presided over an interesting trial, which made great headlines at the time.

We reproduce the headings that were published right across the full page, in "The Evening Times", Glasgow, for Thursday, July 22, 1937:—

£500 DAMAGES FOR T.U.C. LEADER.
"DISGRACEFUL LIBELS" IN NEWSPAPERS.
STORY OF "SPYING" WITHIN THE MOVEMENT.
JUDGE'S STERN WARNING TO DEFENDANTS.

Beneath these splash display headings appeared a report of the case.

London, Thursday.—"These were disgraceful libels, and I will only add for the benefit of the defendants and other possible persons who write and publish libels that those who write and publish libels are apt to forget that in this country a libel may be a crime, and people who perpetrate them may cool their heels sometimes in gaol."

This warning was uttered by the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart) in the King's Bench Division to-day in assenting to the settlement of a libel action brought by Sir Walter Citrine against Mr. Edward Richard Pountney, the proprietor, printer, and publisher of the "Daily Worker" and the Workers' Press.

It was stated that Sir Walter had agreed to accept £500 as damages, and the payment of his costs as between solicitor and client.

The plaintiff was also granted a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing any similar libels.

"USING HIS POSITION."

Mr. Gilbert Paull (for Sir Walter Citrine) said that Sir Walter was the Secretary of the General Council of the Trade Union Congress, and that among his other appointments was President of the International Federation of Trade Unions.

The action was brought in respect of publications in the "Daily Worker" of May 8 and 10.

Those publications made the grave allegations against Sir Walter that he was using his official position in the trade union movement to betray the interests of those who had trusted him to forward their interests, and that he was in league and close co-operation with an organisation for spying upon the trade union movement and hounding out of work active trade union members. . . .

On Saturday, May 8, the libel started with an article spread across the front page with the heading —"Spy Machine Against Trade Union Revealed by Secret Letters. Economic League Claims Citrine as Ally."

"ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS."

This article went on to state:—

"The 'Daily Worker' is able to-day to make a disclosure of the gravest significance to every member of the working-class movement.

"Documents for the authenticity of which we vouch, are quoted below showing the existence of an elaborate organisation for spying on trade union activities and for hounding militant workers out of employment.

"This organisation, well known under the title of the Economic League, maintains, according to the statements of its chief official, connections with highly placed trade union leaders for the purpose stated above."

Then appeared in large letters — "Astounding Revelations."

JUDGE'S COMMENT.

There followed these passages:—

"'Daily Worker' readers are already familiar with the role of the Economic League as an enemy of the workers' demands for better condietions, and as a bitter opponent of Socialism.

"From the information in our possession they now seem to be able . . . to supply information to armament and engineering firms about the movements of 'extremists' . . . and to state that they are in close co-operation with Sir Walter Citrine and with certain trade unions."

Lord Hewart—I gather that this case is settled. Are you not now giving more publicity to this rubbish than it could ever otherwise have got?

Mr. Paul—Unfortunately, it has obtained the very widest publicity. This paper has circulated all over England containing these words, and not content with that the proprietor has issued a series of leaflets, circulating through all the factories in which he thought interest could be taken, telling the workers to read this issue and see what the position was between Sir Walter and the Economic League. There is, in fact, no foundation whatsoever for the allegations made.

LETTER READ.

Mr. Paul added—"The gist of the article was this. It set out the name of Mr. J. Baker White as the national secretary of the Economic League, and also the name of the district secretary. Then it purported to set out a letter written by Mr. Baker White to the district secretary.

"That letter stated—'It may interest you to know that the co-operation between Sir Walter Citrine and myself on this question is far closer than most people imagine.'

"That goes on for two pages, and ends up with the words—'A bigger issue, however, which vitally concerns the working-class is raised by the grave statements made about Sir Walter Citrine and others connected with the working-class movement.'

"On Monday, May 10, there were again large headlines in the paper—'More spy-machine exposures.'

"It set out in terms—'By far the gravest aspect of this exposure is the fact that the published documents, for the complete authenticity of which the 'Daily Worker' vouches, implicate Sir Walter Citrine.'"

NOT A WORD OF TRUTH.

"There is not a word of truth in any of these suggestions", Mr. Paul declared. "Beyond the fact that Sir Walter knows that there is an Economic League, he knows nothing about it at all.

"He does not know and never has known Mr. Baker White, and is utterly unable to account for any such letter ever having been written by Mr. Baker White."

"A letter has been received from Mr. Baker White stating that his letter exhibited in the 'Daily Worker' was not a true letter.

"It has been twisted by leaving out certain words and so altering the whole sense. What Mr. Baker White had stated was that in his opinion the views of Sir Walter and the League might be found to be not far apart."

This case makes interesting reading to-day. The "Daily Worker" continues in its sensational, irresponsible way, to forward the power ends of the hireling leaders of the Communist Party. It is not necessary to agree with the policy or tactics of Sir Walter Citrine—who was boosted into trade union importance by Communist Party applause at one time — to realise that this 1937 attack was calculated and deliberate falsehood from beginning to end. Yet observe the arrogance with which the charges are asserted, and the cowardice with which they are deserted! The same 'Daily Worker", and the same Communist Party owners, with the same sensational imitations of the irresponsibilities of the late Horatio Bottomley — who at least lied and terrorised originally at his own dictates—are with us to-day. The "Communists" are taking full advantage of the war situation to stampede the Labour movement to destruction and so prepare the way for the horrors of a third world war.

We recall this trial from the case-records of Lord Hewart as a warning to workers to beware of political libellers, power-seekers, and would-be dictators. Such persons are the criminal enemies of mankind.

FROM A HOSPITAL WARD.

For nine long months, they tell me, he's been here,
Stretched flat upon his back—a miracle
He is alive. The roof gave way and fell,
And crushed him in the mine. All that was dear,
Youth, strength, life, laughter, love, hope, and the clear
Proud voice of song ta'en from him in a flash,
The very blue, eternal skies to crash
And plunge him, groping, in a night-black sphere.

And yet he smiles, tho' smiling gives him pain,
And hopes some day to sit within a chair—
He knows he'll walk no more—and smell the air
From clover fields, and see his mates again,
Try out their skill upon the quoiting green,
And dream of the bold youth he might have been.

SANDY COMMUNISM

Last month we drew attention to the demand made by the Sandy Urban District Council for the internment of the Duke of Bedford. Claiming to be one of the most progressive local councils in Dedfordshire, this Council has become the centre of "Communist" hypocrisy and reaction. The Sandy Council ought to withdraw from the British Commonwealth of Nations and apply for incorporation in the Soviet Union. For Moscow is its spiritual home and the source of its political inspiration.

The greater part of the Council meeting has been devoted, for some time past, to the discussion of affairs extending far beyond the confines of the parish and many resolutions have been passed on matters of national and even international moment. In recent years the Council has had a strong Socialist—and in more recent years still—a "Communist" element. This fact has been responsible for many of the political subjects coming under discussion.

Until he moved to Bedford a short time ago Mr. George Matthews, a former prospective Labour candidate for the Division and now a prominent member of the Communist Party, was the youngest member of the Council. He was instrumental in getting the Council to pass a resolution sending a message of greetings to the Soviet Union on the anniversary of the Soviet entry into the war.

At the annual meeting of the Mid. Beds Labour Party recently when the Communist Party's application was rejected, Mr. J. Minhall was the only delegate present who voted for affiliation.

It was Minhall who moved the Communist Party resolution demanding the internment of the Duke of Bedford.

The last Council election was in 1939 and all the members of the Council with the exception of Messrs. J. Minhall and A. J. Smith (both members of the Labour Party) were elected then. These two latter were co-opted to fill vacancies.

These co-opted members moved and seconded respectively the resolution against the Duke of Bedford. In Bedfordshire, this kind of voting is called democracy or the voice of the people!

The members of the Sandy Council are as follows:—

Braybrooks, W. G. (Chairman since 1939). A prominent church worker. Member of Beds. County Council, Biggleswade Hospital and Water Boards and the Guardians Committee. Chairman Sandy Services Gift Fund and Savings Committee. Topped the poll at 1936 and 1939 elections. Does not take a prominent part in politics. Conservative.

McKelvey, W. G. (Vice-chairman). Engaged in Civil Defence work. Represents Sandy on East Beds. C.D. Committee. Vice-Chairman

Biggleswade Guardians Committee. Former Sandy Baptist Church deacon and worker. Former Liberal, now possibly Conservative.

The next two members opposed the resolution, as our report last month recorded. Both defended the Duke of Bedford's courage.

WESTERN, G. E. Old member of Council. Tailor and former chairman. Prominent Methodist and ardent Liberal. Always attacking incompetence and blundering irrespective of party or person.

COPE, A. Farmer and market gardener. Alderman of Beds. County Council. Prominent public figure in Beds. J.P. Biggleswade Bench. Member Beds. Agricultural Committee. Chairman Small Holdings Committee. Member Education Committee. Prominent Liberal. Trustee Beeston Methodist Church.

The other members of the Council are :—

SPRING, E. G. Chairman Sandy Workers' Educational Association. Socialist. Churchwarden. Former member Biggleswade Hospital and Water Boards. Market gardener.

MINHALL, J. Crossing-keeper, Girtford Station. Member of Labour Party with strong "Communist" tendencies. Was keen supporter of G. L. Matthews (former Communist member). Introduces political subjects from "Communist" angle at every Council meeting.

SMITH, A. J. Railway porter. Member Labour Party. Co-opted to fill vacancy caused by resignation of G. L. Matthews. St. John Ambulance lecturer. Influenced by "Communist" Party.

MATTHEWS, G. W. Dairyman. Civil Defence worker. Member Conservative Club. Chairman Highways Committee.

ALLISON, J. A. Grocer. Chairman Finance Committee. Member Conservative Club. Member Sandy Observer Corps. Opposed to political discussions.

BLACKNER, W. J. Market gardener. Conservative. Prominent member Beeston Methodist Church where he is choirmaster. Special Sergeant Beds. Constabulary. Deprecates political discussions.

GASKIN, F. Old member of Council. Conservative. Churchwarden and Secretary Parochial Church Council. Retired Civil Servant. One of the "old school." Often supports Communist and Labour Party resolutions.

CRAWLEY, C. Market gardener. Ex-chairman of the Council. Prominent Civil Defence worker. Prominent Conservative but occasionally supports Labour Party resolutions.

Former Councillor G. L. Matthews joined the Communist Party in April, 1940. At this time, the Communist Party were busy conducting propaganda in defence of the Stalin-Hitler Peace Pact, organising the People's Convention, and denouncing the war as an Imperialist war. This activity of the Communist Party shows that the present campaign against the Duke of Bedford does not arise from honest patriotism but from sheer subservience to the interests of the Soviet Union. The Minhall resolution is a political scandal when viewed in the light of the war-record and political activities of the people who sponsored it.

George Matthews joined the Communist Party of Great Britain at the time that the Hitler Pact dictated Communist Party policy. He upheld that pact. He was, at that time, prospective Labour Candidate for Mid-Beds. He was adopted as candidate in January, 1939.

After he had joined the party, George Matthews wrote an article for the Daily Worker, for Monday December 9, 1940, entitled Students Are Facing Facts. By this he meant that they were opposing the war. Matthews was described as "Vice-President, National Union of Students; and also Vice-President of the University Labour Federation." Obviously somewhat of a careerist. Here are some passages from the article written by G. L. Matthews :—

Every month that has passed since September, 1939, has made more clear the contradiction between imperialist war and the maintenance and extension of education for the people. . . .

The Socialist and Communist students, united in the University Labour Federation, arrived at a correct estimation of the war over a year ago.

This year thousands more students, though often confused about many of the aspects of the war, are taking part in the struggle for a People's Government and a People's Peace.

There will be many delegates from the Universities to the People's Convention in January.

The Daily Worker printed the third of the above paragraphs in bold type.

These extracts show where Mr. George Matthews stood before Moscow told him he must turn pro-war. Then he turned. This type of political gangster is regarded as the voice of Britain!

When George Matthews joined the Communist Party, his admission was announced over the Moscow radio. From then on, until Russia was attack by Germany, he made scurrilous attacks on the British conduct of the war,, on Winston Churchill, and the British Government generally. He broke with the Labour Party because of their opposition to the Soviet Union at the time of the Russo-Finnish war.

The Daily Worker for Saturday, November 16, 1940, gave a two-column heading to an account of Molotov's visit to Berlin. We reproduce heading and first two paragraphs of letter-press :

MOSCOW COMMENT ON MOLOTOV VISIT

From our own Correspondent.

Moscow, Friday.

"Molotov's visit to Berlin is the most significant event in recent days," says Krasnaya Zvezda, newspaper of the Red Army, in a review of international events.

"There is no doubt," adds the paper, "that the resumption of personal contact with the leaders of German policy will facilitate the further strengthening and development of Soviet-German relations in the interests of both countries."

The Daily Worker for Saturday, December 7, 1940, published an editorial in which it was stated :—

If the people put their trust in appeals to either Hitler or Churchill, the slaughter and starvation will go on. And whatever side claims the final victory, the people of both countries will lose.

The real issue (carefully avoided by the I.L.P. as well as the Government) is action by the people themselves to end the war in their own way and over the heads of their Hitlers and Churchills.

This is the way of the People's Convention which is organising the fight for a People's Government.

In the same issue of our contemporary, R. Palme Dutt published an article, entitled What Do We Look For From The People's Convention.

Defining the need for the convention, how workers were being elected to it from all over the country, Dutt asked :—

What can we look for from this Convention? What must we demand of the Convention?.

He proceeded to indict the British Government :—

When the Churchill Government came to power seven months ago, the Communist Party gave warning that the consequences of its policy would prove catastrophic for the people of this country. To-day experience is beginning to prove the truth of this.

While the war is ever more clearly revealed as a war of Empires for world domination, waged with conscript peoples and enslaved nations in the far corners of the earth, the lot of the people at home is hunger, cold and disease. Class inequalities are extreme. Record dividends of the profiteers; the offensive against democracy in India and the Empire; the preparation of fascism at home; the mortgaging of the country to the American millionaires—such is the programme of the Churchill Government with which the Labour Party leaders have united their fortunes.

This was not written by the Duke of Bedford. It was not published by "the notorious Strickland Press." It was published by the Communist Party. It was applauded by G. L. Matthews. It was endorsed by Councillor J. Minhall of Sandy. It was seconded by Councillor A. J. Smith, and it was "defeatism" ! Oh no! How could it be? It represented the interests of the Soviet Government and Germany had not invaded the Soviet Union as yet.

Last month we reproduced the heading of article published by William Gallacher, M.P., in the Evening Times for Saturday, February 27, 1943, denouncing work disputes, and declaring in bold headlines Strikes Help Hitler.

This same William Gallacher, M.P., published an article in the Daily Worker for Monday, December 9, 1940, denouncing Patrick Dollan for urging the same point. Only the Germans had not invaded Russia at that time.

This article was headed :—

GALLACHER ANSWERS DOLLAN

The letter-press opened as follows :—

William Gallacher, M.P., has sent to the "Daily Worker" the following letter in reply to Lord Provost Dollan, who, when speaking at a luncheon given by Glasgow business men to Mr. Ernest Brown, called for the suppression of the Clydeside militant workers.

Then followed Gallacher's letter. Gallacher wrote :—

History gives us many examples of so-called "radicals" or "socialists" who go over to the bourgeoise, and descend to the lowest depths of reaction.

Such are the Lavals, Briands, Kerenskys, and a host of others, of whom the latest is De Man of Belgium.

But none of these have descended quite as low as the conscientious objectors in the last war, who now, when they are over military age, have completely reverseed their policy towards the militarists.

In the forefront of these is Lord Provost P. J. Dollan. His latest outburst, addressed to the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce, organisation of the Clyde capitalists, is about the "mischief makers" on the Clyde.

Gallacher describes a discussion he had with Dollan in 1917, when he visited Dollan, then a conscientious objector, in Wakefield Prison Camp. He describes how Dollan "ranted" in favour of strikes. Gallacher concludes :—

Now this creature Dollan has tied up with the millionaire owners of the press, and with the financiers of the City of London, for an attack on the workers and the workers' press.

He has got right down to the bottom. In fact, as the Americans say, he has got down so far that he would have to reach up to touch the bottom.

And now Gallacher, G. L. Matthews and Councillor Minhall have joined Dollan at the bottom, according to the C.P. own description.

The previous month—to be precise, on Saturday, November 16, 1940—the Daily Worker published big headings to this effect :—

William Gallacher, M.P., says

TAKE THIS PAMPHLET WHEREVER YOU GO

The pamphlet referred to us was We Fight For Life, by R. Palme Dutt, published by the Communist Party, at 2d.

Gallacher opened his article in the following terms :—

Everywhere in Britain there is discussion about the war, in the factories, in the shelters, in the trade union branches and the co-operative guilds, this is going on.

More and more the people are demanding to see that reality behind the demagogic propaganda of the Tory Party and its Labour allies in the Government. But it is necessary to sharpen this growing realisation of the true character of the war and to give the rising feeling of the people a clear direction.

For such a purpose Palme Dutt's new pamphlet We Fight For Life is an invaluable weapon. With all the skill of which he is a master, Dutt analyses and exposes the imperialist character of this war.

Having made an extract from the pamphlet, Gallacher concludes his review :—

Take this pamphlet with you wherever you go. It is one of the best Palme Dutt has ever written.

Councillor Minhall took the pamphlet to the Sandy Urban District Council with him. Now this creature wants to intern the Duke of Bedford with the aid of four stupid ignorant fellow councillors. He does not see that his demand means that he and his cronies ought to have been interned since 1940, since he took this pamphlet with him to the Council!

Gallacher quotes this extract from Palme Dutt's pamphlet, denouncing the war as follows :

It is a war of rising capitalist great powers, like the last war, a war for world domination; for the largest share in the exploitation of the world; for possession, profits, markets and spheres of influence; for the new division of the world.

Here are two more excepts from Dutt's pamphlet :—

So long as Churchill rules in Britain; so long as a British Ruling Class maintains and fights for the domination of subject nations; so long as they threaten Europe with a new Versailles and with the imposition of puppet counter-revolutionary Governments, for so long the revolutionary struggle in Europe is held back . . .

The British ruling-class are not fighting to liberate the people of Europe from Fascism and reaction. They have always been, for a century and a half, the main stranglers of every popular revolution in every country.

The war-aims of Churchill for which the British workers are asked to die, are the war-aims of British Imperialism, to protect and maintain the domination of the British Empire over a quarter of the world; to smash the rival German Imperialism, and inflict a new super-Versailles, to maintain the reactionary interests of capitalist-class rule against the world Socialist revolution.

And these super-hypocrites have taken possession of the keys of the Tower, and are urging the workers to give unswerving loyalty to the very leaders whom they have denounced as counter-revolutionaries, Imperialist, and "Super-Fascists"! Our comrade, Tom Taylor, has made this point very clear in the excellent I.L.P. pamphlet, Defend Socialism—from the Communists.

And here is a description of the "British War Aims," published as an editorial, in the Daily Worker, for Saturday, January 18, 1941 :—

LIGHT ON WAR AIMS.

General Sikorski, a gentleman garnered up from the Paris cafes after the fight of Smigly-Ridz, has been at it again. On Wednesday he stated that "Poland in future could not limit herself to the boundaries of 1939."

We are not suggesting that the vapouring of this cafe general should be taken too seriously, but it should be remembered that his puppet government (Sikorski is Prime Minister as well as Commander-in-Chief) only exists by grace of 10 Downing Street.

The Polish Government has stated that it is at war with the Soviet Union, but not at war with Italy. Its newspapers have published articles yearning for a Poland stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea. Sikorski has now officially endorsed these views.

But we must be thankful. We do at least know what we are fighting for. So that a hundred million Poles, Germans, Russians, Ukrainians, Rumanians, Czechs, Slavs, etc., shall come under the dictatorship of a bunch of aristocratic landlords and capitalists of the Poland that was.

To-day, the Sandy Urban District Council, at the behest of a "Communist," demands the internment of the Duke of Bedford! And J. Hill, Junior, Secretary of the Bedford Branch, Communist Party, writes a long letter to the Bedfordshire Times, for April 16, 1943, eulogising the mighty British war machine that is "determined to wipe out every vestige of Nazism and Fascism," and complaining that "while this terrific struggle rages, the autocratic Duke of Bedford has written a poisonous pamphlet, which is entitled 'Propaganda for Proper Geese.'" He adds: "The Sandy Urban Council knew what to do with him."

Does the Sandy Council, whose vote we exposed last month, know what to do with itself?

WORD BOUND VOLUME, For 3 years May 1939 to July 1942. inclusive. Green Cloth, 12s 6d. Post Free 13s 6d.

(Concluded from Column 3.)

He proceeds to make an excerpt from Russia Before the Dawn, by F. A. MacKenzie (published by Fisher Unwin for its anti-Bolshevik author), p. 246. The opening sentence of this excerpt reads :—

The Russian Church was, even up to 1917, an instrument of the Government.

The Russian Orthodox Church is still an instrument of the Government and of the Government at war as in pre-Soviet days. It does not pray for the Czar. It prays for Marshal Stalin. Is there any difference?

The Daily Mail professors of morality have forgotten about the mail bags. But their morality is unchanged and their profession is the same. What a study, a vile study, in cant this entire business of political morality, war mongering, lust for power, climbing to office, is! What a sad waste of man's all-too-short mortal existence! What need there is to expose the cruel, bestial, bloody hypocrisy! Let us become human beings across all frontiers and liquidate this foul game of power-politics in a healthy human commonweal—a commonsense world in which commonsense humanity may live in love, happiness, and mutual freedom.

MAIL-BAGS

A Study in Cant and Propaganda

Thomas Johnston's Indictments

Our press cuttings include the front page of Forward, Glasgow, for Saturday, July 5, 1926, a heading spread across the five columns reads :

Russian Gold—A Study in Cant

The article is by Thomas Johnston, M.P., at that time editor of our contemporary. To-day this article makes most interesting reading.

Thomas Johnston opens this article with the following interesting three paragraphs :—

The Capitalist Press and Capitalist politicians are making a desperate effort to raise a smoke screen of prejudice and ill-will against Red Russia, under cover of which they hope to prevent any further importation of money from Moscow for British Miners' Relief Funds.

The spectacle of subscriptions being openly received from abroad to assist the miners has aroused the colliery owners and their press to sheer foaming frenzy.

The Home Secretary has issued a Blue Book of Communist Documents [Cmd. 2682, 3/6 net], seized during recent raids, as his little contribution to the smoke screen. In these precious documents there is nothing of which we were not generally cognisant before, and private correspondence which in no way breaks the law has been included in this collation of rubbish if only some silly ass has written that George Lansbury is a "hypocrite" (the same Lansbury, by the way, is addressed in another document from the same Communist source as "Dear Comrade" with "fraternal greetings"); and a letter from Mr. Saklatvala, M.P., to the Political Bureau of the Communist Party is actually full-page photographed because in it he has stated that "we must adopt merciless measures to fight the Labour Party." In the instructions from Moscow at the last General Election the brotherhood in Britain were advised that "active agitation should be conducted against the I.L.P."—presumably in the promotion of that supreme jest, the "United Front."

And outside this miserable stuff nothing—nothing beyond proof, as if any proof were required, that the Third International at Moscow has been supplying money to its Communist Party representatives in London for propaganda, press, and electoral purposes, and getting precious little return for its money.

We hope that the admirers of "Communist" propaganda will note the significance of Johnston's indictment concerning the funds of the Communist Party and their source. Thomas Johnston is Secretary of State for Scotland in the present National Government.

Johnston refers to Walton Newbold's admissions that his letters from Moscow came in 1924 "uncensored in the mail bags of the Russian Trade Delegation."

Quite rightly, he claimed that this indictment was irrelevant to the question of miners' relief coming openly from the workers in the Soviet Union. Johnston then proceeded to indict the Conservatives with whom he is allied to-day, as a counter-blast to his indictment, already quoted, of the "Communist" war mongers who want to be allied with him for the duration, or until such time, as, under cover of war, they can establish their dictatorship in Britain.

Johnston wrote :—

INTERFERENCE, INDEED!

And what a crescendo of hypocritical humbug it all is anyhow!

Interference in our internal affairs, forsooth!

Did not Churchill and Lloyd George spend £100,000,000 in levying war, without declaration of war, on Russia? Did they not finance and munition every free-booter and brigand who would accept their money for burning, destroying, murdering, in an attempt to upset the Soviet Government of Russia, without even taking the formal approval of their servile Coalition Parliament?

Did they not finance the Thug, General Mannerheim, who shot 15,000 Finn prisoners without the semblance of a trial, and even turned his machine guns on huddled women and shrieking children? Did not this same "protege" of theirs, Mannerheim, incarcerate 10,000 men and women in prison and deny them water, so that they perished in agony?

And didn't they give their man, Deniken, the Order of the Bath—the scoundrel who buried twenty victims alive and shot 23,000 workers at Rostoff? Didn't they back Yudenitch and Koltchak and Wrangel, who burned the peasants' harvests and destroyed the villages?

Interference in our internal affairs! Good sooth! what are we doing in Egypt and in China now?

And didn't the Tories run 40,000 German rifles into the Larne and Donaghadee to foment active bloody rebellion in Ireland after Sir Edward Carson had dined with the Kaiser at Homburg?

And haven't we always been sending money (ay, and sometimes arms) to assist Greeks and Armenians struggling with a Turkish Tyranny?

Certainly it is true that two wrongs—or ten wrongs for that matter of it—do not make one right, but the spectacles of these canting humbugs protesting against the sending of Russian money to aid the colliers of Britain in a struggle against starvation is enough to make an observer sick.

We agree with every word of this indictment. We endorse all that Thomas Johnston says about Churchill, Lloyd George, Mannerheim, Deniken, Yudenitch, Koltchak, and Wrangel. But why are we to believe that Churchill is everything right to-day and would not now dream of thinking or acting as Johnston avows he acted during the first stages of the Russian Revolution? Has the leopard changed its spots to suit the political convenience and change of coat of Thomas Johnston?

Johnston then offsets the story of Newbold's letters coming uncensored in the Trade Delegation's mail bags by another story.

Johnston writes :—

In the "Times" (11/3/24) appeared a letter signed by seven members of the Committee for the "Appeal for the Russian Clergy" asking for money in aid of the persecuted Russian clergy. Remittances could be sent to the Bishop of Birmingham or to Major W. Tudor Pole, of 61 St. James Street, S.W.1, and we were told that—

"Details of the work undertaken can be obtained in confidence from the address below."

Why the "in confidence" will appear in a moment.

A lady, Miss Harrison, wrote for particulars before she sent any money. On 12th March, 1924, she was sent a reply enclosing some explanatory leaflets.

To this she replied on 18th March.

Johnston here reproduced Miss Harrison's letter :—

"53 Belsize Road,
South Hampstead, N.W.6,
18th March, 1924.

Dear Sir,—With reference to my letter of a few days ago and your reply . . . I notice that in the course of the publication you enclosed it is stated 'The money was sent out in English notes; a friend changed it into chervontsi, the new Russian money; it was then divided up and sent to trusted agents in various centres.'

Would you please inform me as to whether you know who those 'trusted agents' are, and whether you are quite satisfied that the money has not been used for ulterior purposes?

It seems to me a very risky business sending money in this way, because should any of it be devoted to political and anti-Russian Government purposes it would fully justify the Russian Government in taking legal or other proceedings against the recipients.

Before considering whether I ought to help financially or not, I should like to be fully satisfied on these points.—Yours faithfully, (Signed) F. Harrison.

W. Tudor Pole, Esq."

"And then," he adds, "on 19th March came this amazing reply" :—

"61 St. James's Street,
London, S.W.1.
19th March, 1924.

Private and Confidential.

F. Harrison, Esq.,
53 Belsize Road,
South Hampstead, N.W.6.

Dear Sir,—Replying to your letter of the 18th inst., I have pleasure in advising you that all cash and parcels we send to Russia are consigned to the British Charge d'Affaires (Mr. Hodgson), Moscow, or to Mr. Thomas Preston, the British representative in Petrograd.

In printed documents it would certainly be impossible for us to state that the relief work we are carrying on was made possible by the co-operation of British representatives in Russia, but it is a fact.

You can rest assured, therefore, that there is no wastage, and that none of our funds find their way into Bolshevik hands or into the hands of the renegade clergy of the so-called 'Red' Church.

I shall be grateful if you will kindly treat this information in strict confidence.—Yours faithfully,

W. Tudor Pole."

Johnston asked the "Daily Mail professors of the higher morality" to explain this precious document.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Aldred,—A copy of the "Word" for June 1942 came to hand last week, and I feel that I must write and thank you for the effective reply you made to the editor of the "Inquirer."

Your description of the "Inquirer's" editorial comment as "peevish" is exactly right. The Editor did not attempt to reply to the points that I raised with respect to the misuse of a religious journal, nor do I see how his atitude can be justified in any way. However, you have dealt so well with him that I believe it would be a good thing if every Unitarian minister in England could read the "Word."

I am enclosing a copy of a reply sent a few weeks ago to the editor of the "Inquirer," dealing also with Sir W. P. Colfox. It appears that I did not give Colfox's full title, but then I did not know he was knighted; his fame is not such as to be well known here! All the same, as a matter of courtesy, had I known that he was a Knight of the Realm I would have done more than simply give his initials.

I was interested to see one of our Church members with a copy of the "Word" on Sunday. She has subscribed for it, though it may be coming through a friend of hers. Also, I note you have a letter from William E. Costar, who is a member of my Church. He was very interested to know that we had made contact with each other.

I have been very interested in the articles about F. W. Jowett, and the articles from his pen. I knew him in the old I.L.P. days and always held him in great admiration and respect.

I hope that the circulation of the "Word" increases monthly. It is doing a wonderful work and I read every page of it with the greatest interest.

All good wishes, as ever,
Sincerely yours,
WILL BOTTOMLEY.

Melbourne Unitarian Church,
18th Aug., 1942.

(Enclosure: Letter to the Editor, "The Inquirer.")
MR. BOTTOMLEY'S PROTEST.

Sir,—I now have copies of the "Inquirer" for the issues of May 2 and 9. The editorial note appended to my letter published on May 2 assumes that my letter was conditioned by the fact that the Japs were "knocking at the doors of Australia." This is entirely wrong. For months previously I had read with feelings approaching dismay the "Week by Week" editorial notes, for it seemed to me—and I still see no reason to alter my opinion—that they were a misuse of our denominational journal.

Apart from the fact that the air of omniscience adopted in these notes appears ridiculous in the light of later events, a journal dedicated to religion being used to bolster up a war morale is, to my mind, not only a contradiction of its purpose, but a descent into those nether regions, the approach to which is undoubtedly paved with good intentions.

The spirit of the editorial "Week by Week" notes on the war reeks with a national self-righteousness which is abhorrent to the sensitive mind. I look in vain for any suggestion of repentance for our national sins, or for any indication of that depth of sorrow which might be expected of those who realise the unutterable tragedy of the war.

If I unfortunately made it appear that I was ashamed of the whole contents of the "Inquirer," then I wish very earnestly to correct that impression. My criticism was directed solely against the editorial policy.

Regarding the publication of my letter in another paper, this was not intentional on my part. It is true I sent a copy of the letter, without thought of it being published. Had I anticipated such a possibility, I would certainly have marked it "for information only." Your editorial comment "that Mr. Bottomley can take pleasure" in seeing the letter published elsewhere is unjustly sarcastic, because incorrect in its assumption.

Coming now to the letter by W. P. Colfox in your issue of May 9, perhaps it would be pertinent to remind him that not only do Unitarians "stand for civil and religious liberty the world over," but they stand (do they not?) for the universal Fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man. This seems to me to be fundamental. Let us stand resolutely for the latter, then we may not despair of the former. I cannot be expected to take up the now strictly limited space of the "Inquirer" by demonstrating how much we have erred in the way of brotherhood.

One final comment. The concluding paragraph of W. P. Colfox's letter is both insulting in its nature and unwarrantable in its assumption of knowledge of the minds "of the vast majority of Unitarians." I can only conclude that the editor's feelings in this case overruled his judgment in allowing that paragraph to appear.

WM. BOTTOMLEY.

Melbourne, July 6, 1942.

Dear Aldred,—It might interest you to know that my brother-in-law, Alfred Golding, was your next door neighbour when you lived in Shepherd's Bush, London. I can remember his many references to you and Rose Witcop, and the literature he used to bring home from your meetings. It was due to his influence that my own ideas on religion and politics were formed in adolescence, and they have remained in that form—i.e., Atheist and Socialist—ever since—30 years.

My brother-in-law was a member of the Socialist Party of Great Britain for many years, up to the time he left Britain with his wife and son; he is now in Sydney, Australia. They went early in 1939. I have been a member of the S.P.G.B. since 1930—nearly 14 years.

I have been reading "The Word" quite 12 months—I get my copy through the local branch of the P.P.U. I was a C.O. in 1915-18—not yet affected by the present war.

There is a lot of material in "The Word," and in your pamphlets on Parliament, etc, that I find highly provocative and I would very much like to join issue with you.

I see you are hesitating about increasing the price of "The Word" to 3d. If I were in your position I would not hesitate; on the ground that IF people are interested another penny a month is not going to frighen them away.

Sincerely,
S. HARRIS.

Luton, Beds., March 22.

Dear Guy Aldred,—The letter received by W. S. Kay from an anonymous writer is unfortunately typical of a large majority of our fellow countrymen. In the first place "Englishman" has not the guts to give his name or address for publication.

Secondly "Englishman" states that W. S. Kay has been exempted from National Service on grounds of conscience. Presumably he is referring to service with the Armed Forces. It would be interesting to know what "Englishman" is doing for his country. Possibly dodging the Armed Forces in a reserved occupation and getting a nice fat salary each week like a great many more "patriotic" Englishmen.

As regards the race of brutes to which reference is made our "Englishman" is apparently one of those people who has not had the pleasure of meeting German families in their own homes and consequently can only imagine them as a bloodthirsty horde.

If "Englishman" will do a little thinking on his own account instead of reading blindly everything that is published it would possibly do him a lot of good.

Hitler introduced conscription to get men into his armed forces. Why?

England did the same thing. Why?

I would point out to "Englishman" that nearly everyone whether German or English is a Pacifist by nature and outlook and if they had the courage of their convictions they would all be Pacifists instead of following blindly the dictates of their capitalist leaders. That is why all countries introduce conscription.

When will the people of this world think and act for themselves instead of allowing themselves to be driven like cattle to the slaughter and when will they realise that we are all brothers whether we speak a different language or are a different colour?

I would recommend "Englishman" to study the words of the Poem by James C. Welsh, published in your February issue, entitled "The Image of God."

Yours sincerely,
A. H. ELLIMAN.

East Barnet, Herts.

Dear Comrade,—Re your remarks about the C.P. and D.W. Here is an incident about one of their members at the concentration camp where I spend the best part of my working hours.

One of our S.P.G.B. members gave a lad there the pamphlet "Socialism," published by us. This lover of Democracy confiscated the pamphlet, calling us by the way, "Social Fascists." He was taken up by another employee who is not a sympathiser but a Tory, saying that he had never heard us advocating things the fascists advocate. Also when this bright spark of a C.P.-er was asked what was Fascism, he could not reply.

The C.P. boasts of a membership of 60,000 and this is a specimen of them. They also complain of the lack of knowledge of the majority of the membership. What else can they expect from their methods.

Well, comrade, although we don't agree on many points, there is one thing we do agree on; that is—May the day soon come that sees the end of this rotten system known as Capitalism, and a saner method of distributing the products of the earth.

Yours fraternally,
A. BOWLEY

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Since I was introduced to "The Word" your writings have been duly digested on practically all political subjects, and religious thought. The thoughts were lying latent in my mind, likening it to "a seed lying in the ground waiting for the right temperature to waken it up."

I seem to have experienced the same disturbances as in your evolution of thought, portrayed in "Dogmas Discarded," for which I was more than pleased since I felt that I stood alone and was just a crank. You have given me fresh hope to speak for truth.

You remember Jesus, and the rich young ruler who had observed all commandments, etc., and asked Jesus what he should do to inherit the kingdom of heaven? Jesus replied "sell all that thou has and give away and follow me." My opinion is that true "Anarchism" was arrived at by Jesus. Anarchism which means that desires and our wants should be discarded, and instead the needs satisfied. Perhaps I am wrong in my deductions, but you give me the impression of spiritual perfectness.

I admire you for the way you treat money. My own life is based around "needs" and not "wants" regarding habits useless to health and progress, smoking, drinking, gambling, and sensual musings.

"The Word" will be well advertised round these parts, where there are plenty of "red hot Communists," who don't stop to think. By the way Harry Pollitt spoke at Leigh, Lancashire, recently, and your exposition of his hypocrisy was made manifest in my mind.

What a laugh the Capitalists have, and what fools the miners are! They gave £70 of their hard-earned money for Pollitt's cant and hypocrisy.

Thanking you for your courage and toleration.

Yours sincerely,
H. ASHTON.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I think you have made it clear in your very full report of Rhys Davies' excellent speech, that this was delivered under the Armistice Convention convened by the Birmingham Council of the P.P.U. I am pleased to say that an Armistice Committee has been formed in Manchester. An encouraging feature of the Manchester organisation is that the Co-op. Women's Guild is represented. You would see in the "Peace News" that an Armistice resolution is to be moved at the annual meeting of the London Co-operative Society.

With all wishes, sincerely,
G. F. BLIGH.

OLIGARCHY OF ENGLAND

By C. H. Norman.

In 1938 there was published in Germany a remarkable analysis of English political society entitled, King, Lords and Gentlemen, with as sub-title: Influence and Power of the English Upper Classes. The name of the author, who had been resident in England for a period of ten years, is Karl H. Abshagen. The book was translated into English and published by Messrs. Heinemann in 1939. It is an astonishing example of German literary efficiency and completely refutes the statement that the only political books allowed in Germany are Nazi propaganda. There is no book by any English writer which has given such a clear and plain picture of the reality of English government. The Trevelyans, the Tawneys, the Laskis, the Bagehots and the rest of English writers are left nowhere by this acute German Conservative, who has avoided all the errors which are so common when a foreigner writes of a country in which he has been temporarily, or even permanently, resident. The chapter headings (and the contents of the chapters fully bear out their promise) will show the breadth of the subject matter covered. There are chapters on The King and his Court, Great Families and Great Houses, Society in Everyday Politics, Schools for Rulers, A Church for Gentlemen, Secretaries in Control, Society in Uniform, Limits of Plutocracy, and one on the Scots. It is the kind of book that one might have expected from the pen of some Left-wing historian of the N.C.L.C. but these gentlemen have always felt some diffidence about giving the game away in the full sense: they tread delicately in such matters. In some English books one can find what is stated in this book hinted at, but never is the matter put in any detail. Indeed, on most subjects dealt with by this German writer, English historians and essayists deliberately throw dust in the eyes of their readers, misleading them on the fundamental question of where the real centre of government lies in England under its sham of democratic machinery.

Miss Jane Soames, in her book The English Press, has pointed out, on basic issues, how little self-criticism there is in English political circles. She says on page 93: "The millions of readers of the English Press are fed daily year in, year out, on this diet of boasting—there is no other available for them—it marches with their strong national insularity and patriotism, and they find it, in general, normal and palatable enough. But its effect is like too much alcohol or opium, one becomes accustomed to it, so that eventually one cannot carry on without it. We are the best, the greatest, the richest—and we are always right. The newspapers tell us so every day, and patriotism bids us believe it." This passage was written in 1936, and four years of war have demonstrated how vainglorious the English are, especially with the aid of Messrs. Churchill, Simon, Morrison & Co. on the wireless! The Countess Markievicz, an Irish observer, who disdained to take her seat in the English House of Commons, as the first woman elected to that respectable body, in referring to the English railway strike of 1919, writing from Cork Gaol, used these prophetic words: "The British Government are counting on establishing an 'aristocracy' of Labour, well-paid and satisfied, who will go to Parliament, compromise, sell every cause, act with the police, and trample on the underdog." How true that prophecy has proved of many Labour and Trade Union leaders in the period 1919-1943!

Returning to King, Lords and Gentlemen, the book contains a penetrating analysis of the characters of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, Mr. Lloyd George, Lord Baldwin and Mr. Neville Chamberlain, which are interesting and certainly unnerving, especially in the case of the latter.

Specially drawn for "The Word" by E. E. Briscoe.

VICTORY!

"And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, of the one with his right hand, and of the other with his left. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and upon all the people that were therein."

Judges 17 : 29.

It is worth while recalling (from his "War Memoirs") the opinion of Mr. Lloyd George, who regarded Mr. Neville Chamberlain as a complete failure in his post of Director of National Service in 1917: "Mr. Neville Chamberlain is a man of rigid competency. Such men have their uses in conventional times or in conventional positions and are indispensable for filling subordinate posts at all times. But they are lost in an emergency or in creative tasks at any time."

One important feature of this German book lies in explaining how in England men in prominent political families, or holding advanced posts in the State, can proceed from one Department to another leaving a record of incompetence everywhere, but without any risk of exposure or dismissal. Examples that occur to the mind are those of Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Lord Baldwin, Mr. Winston Churchill, Sir John Simon, Lord Runciman and the late Arthur Henderson, who all proceeded through many Departments, leaving a record of failure in every one of them (except Lord Simon as Lord Chancellor), and yet maintaining a high public reputation! It is a curious combination of log rolling, family and social connections, representation of powerful interests (in the case of Arthur Henderson), plus the knowledge that these men can be relied upon not to interfere seriously with any element of "the system" of exploitation, which is the basis of the government of England. When one compares the state of British towns before the war with the state of German or Swedish towns, one can only express amazement at the self-satisfaction of English statesmen. One might fairly remind them of the remark of Apollonius of Tyana to the Roman Quaestors; "You exercise a high command. If you know how to rule, how happens it that the cities under your government are in so wretched a condition?"

Herr Abshagen is quite free from anti-Semitism, though he does indulge in some ironical remarks on certain oddities of Jewish influence in England, like the appearances of Mr. Julius Salter Elias (one-time, on John Bull, colleague of Horatio Bottomley) now Lord Southwood, as the unseen controller of the official organ of the Labour Party, The Daily Herald. But he does good service by drawing attention to the powerful influence exercised in the Foreign Office by Roman Catholics, with Lord Halifax as Ambassador-Secretary of State and many of the permanent officials belonging to the Romish Church, which is certainly a strange circumstance in a country alleged to be under democratic Protestant control. His account of the astonishing careers of Lord Vansittart—(this book may explain the noble Lord's violent anti-Germanism)—and Mr. Geoffrey Dawson, alias Robinson, then editor of The Times, is a demonstration of the oligarchic nature of the English community in the section which matters: while the cryptic figure of Lord Hankey is given a careful study, though on this man the author is not so well informed on the mysterious character of his activities when piloting himself through the social strata of political success. It would be difficult to find a more subtile enemy of everything that the ordinary Englishman believes his country to stand for than this man.

It is only fair to English political writers to add that Mr. Haxey in Tory M.P. with its admirable diagrams, wrote a book on the English oligarchy in Parliament which is an excellent supplement to King, Lords and Gentlemen. It is really the only notable book of fact and propaganda that the much-trumpeted and advertised Left Book Club produced. Within its limitations its workmanship is first-class. The advent of war has rather overshadowed its importance: but, as this war is a fairly certain prelude to a desperate social conflict in England and Europe, the readers of The Word would be well advised to study these two books together.

There is only one place in which the German author has indulged in any kind of prophecy. That is in the closing passage of the book written before the war had begun, but written at a time when every German of intelligence had become convinced that the British ruling class, as in 1914, once again intended to bring Germany to military account by some act of aggressive intervention on the Continent. "It is probable that these ruling Conservative forces will transform into an English version the great intellectual and political changes which are in progress on the Continent in various forms—for all their present repugnance to these movements. Unless, it should be added, a new European war makes an end of their predominance. For a repetition of the events of 1914-1918 seems to be the only serious danger to the existence of this society for many years to come. The social structure of England withstood one world war, not without the timbers creaking. A second within a generation would inevitably, whatever its military issue, bring down even this proud edifice."

With that quotation, one must leave this fascinating contribution to the political literature of England, recognising that the true English social democrat has much to thank this German writer for, in having laid bare the various and devious methods by which a system of oligarchical exploitation is kept going under the facade of democratic make-believe. It is not without interest to remark that the reviews in the British Press were, with few exceptions, so contrived and written that the ordinary reader would never guess at the importance of this book to the English citizen. The nine newspaper proprietors who control the whole Press of Britain adopt two policies with any book which may be classed as critically "dangerous" to the existing order. It is either completely boycotted, or handled in such a way by reviewers that only an acute mind, or reader with special information, can judge of its worth.

The Brotherhood of The Way.

We have received the following letter from our old-time comrade, the Rev. Thomas Pickering, to whose struggle in defence of Free Speech we hope to pay tribute at an early date:

Dear Guy Aldred,—It is good reading to know that you are an ordained minister, within the realm of humanism. To me it would, of course, be better reading still to know that you had gone forward with humanism to Christianity, in fulness and liberty, whilst stedfastly holding on to Pacifism.

Our experience together for Free Speech in Glasgow (between the two wars) both of which were, according to Britishers, righteous ones, and according to Germans, on their part righteous also, will keep up fellowship in that realm as in the realm of Pacifism, even when our fellowship is not so strong in other realms.

May God and Truth speed you onwards, in all truthful endeavours.

Yours in Brotherhood, and speed things up by preparing for war and accepting the challenge when it came.

But Mr. Hyde and Hitler are not the only people who have surrendered to the temptation to do evil that good may come. Every supporter of the mass murder and organised sin of war has fallen in the same way. Most of the Churches have fallen and they will never deserve, or be able to regain, the true spiritual leadership of the country until they have repented and learned anew the lesson that their Master tried to teach them.

DOING EVIL THAT GOOD MAY COME.

A Reply to "The Daily Worker"

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

The New Testament story of Christ's temptation in the desert is the record of the consideration and rejection, by the world's greatest Leader, of wrong, short-cut methods of achieving a desirable end. On the threshold of His ministry he set aside bribery, wonder-producing magic, force, fraud and fear. He chose the only sure way of obtaining lasting and satisfactory results, even though human selfishness and weakness made it also a slow way—a very slow way—involving Him and many of His most faithful followers in a martyr's death.

Mr. Hyde of the Daily Worker has been delivering another violent attack on the advocates of a negotiated peace. That he should demand our internment is, up to a point, logical if one accepts his premises, but he goes further than demanding internment, seeking to create the false impression that we defend the severities and injustices of the Nazi régime. Now Mr. Hyde, having met me, is perfectly well aware that I no more support the evil features of the Nazi régime than he does; in fact I support them much less, for he believes in the use of the prison and the concentration camp to suppress political opinions, but I do not, either in peace or war. Mr. Hyde, I still think, is fundamentally a sincere and honest man. He really does believe that Russia, which he has not visited, is the Workers' Paradise and that Stalin is a wonderful general notwithstanding the fact that he has had more reverses than victories though possessing a great initial advantage in man-power and war material. He also believes that only by a complete military defeat can the evils of Fascism be removed.

Mr. Hyde stifling (I hope!) the promptings of his better nature, deliberately misrepresents the position of the advocates of peace by negotiation because he feels that danger to the war must be removed at all costs. If he were to describe our views fully and quote us fairly, he knows that it would be much more difficult to arouse the degree of hatred and contempt he considers necessary to "protect" the war. If he were to say that we do not share the popular attitude towards the war because we are doubtful of the accuracy of many of the atrocity stories; because, when wrong acts are done, we believe that full account should be taken of the provocation and handicaps suffered by those who do them; and because our study of history and human nature teaches us that a new régime set up in a country which has been through a period of crisis is usually tyrannical: if he were to say that we believe that intelligent use of the bitter lessons of war-suffering, combined with a fair sharing of the world's economic resources and an honest and open foreign policy could even now secure and maintain a just peace, his readers might not agree with us, but some might be disposed to say "Well, anyhow that is a point of view." Much stronger measures are necessary if the insidious "poison" of the advocacy of peace is to be removed to Mr. Hyde's satisfaction, so, casting truth and fair play to the winds, he is driven to misrepresent us as the defenders of Hitler's cruel and tyrannical acts and the supporters of what amounts to unconditional surrender.

In other words Mr. Hyde has ranged himself on the side of those who believe in doing evil that good may come. Even if he is not "pro-" Hitler he is an imitator of Hitler, who, feeling, (perhaps rightly) that the statesmen and financiers of the democracies would never in his lifetime grant Germany full justice if he adopted only non-violent methods of seeking it, decided to try

"Communists" and Economic League in Alliance.

Portrait of the Duke of Bedford, taken near Newton Stewart, in February of this year.

Last month we exposed the Communist Party campaign against the Duke of Bedford. We exhibited its contradictions and ramifications. Also we drew attention to the Daily Worker libel on Sir Walter Citrine in May, 1937, when it falsely accused him of having entered into a conspiracy with the Economic League to spy on trade union activities and hound militant workers out of employment. When brought to Court, the Daily Worker apologised, stated that there was no foundation for the libel, paid Sir Walter Citrine's costs, and paid him also £500 damages. Lord Chief Justice declared the statement to be "disgraceful libels." In advancing these libels, the Daily Worker denounced the Economic League as an Anti-Socialist organisation. That was in 1937. To-day, the Daily Worker and its Communist Party sponsors, are carrying on precisely the same reactionary propaganda under cover of patriotism—the pretence of which has been the immemorial excuse of every political scoundrel down the ages.

When Harry Pollitt addressed a Communist Party meeting in Yorkshire at the end of April, the Yorkshire Divisional Council of the I.L.P. distributed leaflets to the miners, which put the case against the Communist Party with a punch. The leaflet challenged the "Communists" to answer a pertinent question:

Because the Russians are fighting heroically in defence of their country, Pollitt now claims the war has changed. Have Britain and the U.S.A. become less imperialist?

The leaflet concluded:

The way to help Russia is to build up a Socialist Movement—not to become the handrage of British and American Imperialism and the scabs and blacklegs of the "boss" class.

Lenin said: "War is not only a terrible thing, but it is a terribly profitable thing for the capitalist class." The "little Lenins" of to-day are fighting the workers and helping the war-mongers to amass profits.

As a result of this effective reply, a letter appeared in a number of papers attacking the I.L.P. as a "defeatist organisation" engaged in fostering and prolonging strikes in war-time. The letter was published over a variety of names, but in fact it was distributed by the Economic League, the organisation denounced by the Communist Party in 1937, as being backed by reactionary employers and consistently hostile to the Labour Movement and Socialism. This, of course, is a true description of the Economic League, which has never pretended to be other than an Anti-Socialist organisation. To-day, being a reactionary body, the League feels it must identify itself with the Communist Party in its attacks on Socialists and Pacifists. The I.L.P. answered Pollitt so effectively that the Economic League had to rush to the "Communist" Party's defence with the usual libel of "defeatism."

Similarly with the Duke of Bedford.

Forgetting that Professor Haldane, defending the Daily Worker, said in the St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, on Sunday, February 23, 1941, that 18B internments were wrong, and that he was "absolutely opposed even to the imprisonment of men like Mosley and Ramsay without trial," the "Communists" and the Daily Worker gang are engaged in a campaign to-day for the internment, without trial, of the Duke of Bedford. Their slanderous activity is endorsed by the Economic League. The Communist Party and the Economic League are running in double harness.

The Daily Worker for June 1, 1943, published the following addition to the "internment demand" paragraphs with which it has whetted the appetite of its stupid readers for proscriptions and humiliations of those who think about and oppose the horrors of war:

"INTERN DUKE" DEMAND BEDFORDSHIRE PEOPLE.

Internment of the Duke of Bedford was the unanimous demand made by 500 people who attended a meeting in a Biggleswade, Beds, cinema at the week-end.

Speakers were Councillors L. Chambers, J. Minhall (Lab.) and Geo. Matthews. Full support for the coming battles in Europe was pledged.

Minhall and Matthews were exposed in these columns last month. These sorry political specimens upheld the Soviet Agreements with Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy and opposed the war until Hitler invaded Russia. Then they changed from denouncing the war as an "Imperialist War" into demanding that every effort be made to overthrow Nazism. They forgot that the much applauded pact signed in Moscow between Germany and Russia on August 23rd, 1939 precipitated the 2nd World War and was a crime against mankind.

Matthews, one of the creatures who upheld this pact, and denounced the war in scurrilous terms when the British Governnment was on the defensive in almost complete isolation, writes to the Bedfordshire Times, for May 28, 1943, on "The Views of the Duke of Bedford" as follows:

Sir,—The Duke of Bedford knows perfectly well what is meant by the phrase "undermining the war effort." He admitted in an interview with a special correspondent of "The Daily Worker" in April that his propaganda was calculated to undermine the war effort, and that it is successful only in so far as it weakens our fighting power.

Why did not "comrade" Matthews think of this before dawn, Sunday, June 22, 1941, during the period when Palme Dutt, Harry Pollitt, and Willie Gallacher were urging a people's peace, and denouncing the war as an "Imperialist War"? Were not his efforts and those of his leaders "calculated to undermine the war effort"?But for the people Matthews then denounced there would be no war effort to-day and the champions of the Soviet Union would not be able to demand a Second Front. If the Duke of Bedford is wrong, to-day, in asking for a negotiated peace, "comrade" Matthews and his gang must have been wrong down to June 22, 1941, in urging "unconditional surrender"—to Hitler? What has this miserable apology for a Communist to say in defence of his conduct?

Matthews continued his Bedfordshire Times epistle in the hypocritical copy of the arguments he denounced as late as June, 1941:

The whole purpose of the innumerable pamphlets and articles which he is allowed to publish, and for which the Government allows him paper produced at the cost of our Merchant Seamen's lives, is to oppose this war, to advocate a negotiated peace with Hitler.

His latest effort is a "Personal Statement" in which he makes the following statements . . .

It does not matter what the Duke of Bedford says in his "Personal Statement," which is not his latest effort. How did Matthews come to think that it was the Duke's latest effort? The information was obtained from our reckless contemporary, the Daily Worker.

On May 5, 1943, the Daily Worker published an article headed:

DUKE 'JUSTIFIES' HITLERITE BESTIALITIES
From Douglas Hyde.

The Duke of Bedford has just published a document which he calls a "personal statement." It is one of the most sensationally shameless apologies for Fascism and all its bestial works published since the war began.

His technique is interesting. First he excuses the Fascists and their worst excesses; then he hastens to state that he does not, of course, agree with such things but . . .

Our contemporary proceeds to give some "typical examples" of the Duke's apologies, and adds comments, interspersed with further examples. We quote only the comments:

The Duke's reactions to Hitler and Hitlerism are not, apparently those of the people who are working, fighting and dying that Fascism may be ended. . . .

His defeatest line is made clear when he says: . . .

Finally, this aristocrat, who protests so loudly that he is not pro-Fascist, leaps in with a two-page defence of Mosley and the British Union of Fascists. . . .

But whilst the Duke sheds tears for the interned Fascists, decent people everywhere will be more convinced than ever, on the basis of the Duke's "personal statement," that there are very strong reasons why he also should be imprisoned.

The Duke's argument against the internment without trial of avowed or alleged Fascists is merely an argument in defence of civil liberty. It is the argument advanced by Professor Haldane on behalf of the Editorial Board of the Daily Worker at St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, on February 23, 1941, and defended at that time by "comrade" Matthews!

Since time plays such an important part in the political and war somersaultism of the Communist Party let us enquire when the Duke of Bedford issued this "personal statement"? Although only just discovered by the Daily Worker, the Duke of Bedford's "personal statement" was issued in October, 1940. It was a private statement, of which only a small quantity was produced, and it was issued for private circulation to be sent to people who demanded to know his views and the grounds for same. It was issued only for such circulation and has not been reprinted or offered for public sale or circulation. At the time that the Duke of Bedford issued this statement, and for twenty months afterwards, the Communist Party was proclaiming the same views in the press and on the platform. What have the admirers of the Communist charlatans to say in reply to this fact?

Here is what the Daily Worker was saying, and here is what G. L. Matthews was supporting in October 1940—at the time that the Duke of Bedford issued, rightly or wrongly, his "personal statement," which was a private apology for his attitude, and not a public propaganda of his views.

Daily Worker, Monday, October 21, 1940, carried two headings:

PEOPLES' CONVENTION
BIG PROGRESS REPORTED

The article opened:

Big progress in the campaign for the National Convention on January 12 was reported yesterday, in London, at the first national organising conference for the People's Convention.

It reported Mr. Pritt:

Mr. D. N. Pritt, addressing the conference, said the present Government and the ruling class are afraid to tell the people the truth about war aims. They cannot end the war because they are themselves the cause of the war. Only a Government of the People could do this.

This issue of the Daily Worker gave enthusiastic headings to strike news and much space to reporting. "2,000 miners on strike" was heading to its account of the strike at Upton Colliery, near Doncaster. "Six Hundred Shipyard Men Stay Outside" was its heading of a great north-east shipyard dispute account.

Walter Holmes in "A Worker's Notebook," which appeared in the same issue of the Daily Worker attacked both Bevin and Winston Churchill. He quoted the editorial written by Mr. Winston Churchill in the British Gazette, for May 8, 1926, denouncing Bevin.

Walter Holmes wrote:

The British Gazette was the organ of the Government against the workers in the General Strike. Its editor was Mr. Winston Churchill. Here is the passage:

The excerpt he made from Churchill's editorial included this passage which Holmes displayed in bold type:

The chief apostle of this "G.H.Q." idea was Mr. Ernest Bevin, secretary of the Transport and General Workers' Union—the man who is the real Commander-in-Chief of the present General Strike.

Holmes proceeded to requote from the speech made by Mr. Bevin at the Convention of the Council of Workers' and Soldiers' Delegates at Herts. in 1917. Holmes had quoted it already in the "Daily Worker" for July 15, 1940. He was proud of the quotation. The Bevin 1917 speech quotation concluded with the words:

I believe that even in our own country there will have to be the shedding of blood to attain the freedom we require.

Holmes commented:

Now the question is, just what is the freedom Mr. Bevin requires to-day, and whose blood is he prepared to shed for it?

Daily Worker, in its issue for October 30, 1940, published a heading:

ALL SAY "TRY OR FREE MASON"

This demand was made by the Huddersfield Trades Council. Quoting this, the Daily Worker puts in bold type the following item:

Commenting upon the case, Councillor Perry, the President of the Council, said "When such a thing as this happens it is approaching Nazism."

The Daily Worker, in its issue for Monday, December 30, 1940, carried this slogan:

For a People's Government that will defend the people and lead forward to peace and a free Socialist Britain.

That was the defined purpose of the paper at the top of its editorial page. Immediately beneath this slogan was the chief leader, headed "The Net," and this is what the leader said:

Defending Defence Regulation 18B and the abominable treatment of refugees in Britain, Mr. Herbert Morrison, Home Secretary, declared in an interview yesterday: "We are often not concerned with proving what a man HAS done. We are concerned with what in certain circumstances he MIGHT do." . . .

It is clear that in practice the tribunal is just given a free hand to keep people locked up solely because its reactionary chief does not like their political opinions.

The people who demanded the internment of the Duke of Bedford at the meeting at the Biggleswade Cinema at the end of May, 1943, circulated this attack on Regulation 18B in December, 1940. They continued to attack Regulation 18B down to June, 1941.

On Tuesday, December 31, 1940, the Daily Worker boosted its pamphlet "on the life of John Mason, Mexborough shop steward detained without trial under the Defence Regulations" and championed Sir Hugh Roberton, whose broadcasts were banned because he was a pacifist. It headed the article on Sir Hugh Roberton "Conductor on Freedom." The same issue of the Daily Worker described Lord Kemsley's Manchester Daily Dispatch and Glasgow Daily Record as "these ugly sisters of journalism" and referred, in quotes, to Kemsley's "Scottish 'Organ of Opinion'" and complained that it "screeches for suppression of the National Convention."

And now!

Last month we quoted the "Intern The Duke of Bedford" demands from the Daily Worker for April 20, 26, 27, and 30. This campaign has been going on for some time, however.

In its issue for March 6, our contemporary published an article by Douglas Hyde, headed:

"INTERN DUKE" CALL FROM ENGINEERS.

Then followed the letter-press:

A call for the internment of the Duke of Bedford, advocate of a negotiated peace with Hitler, has gone to the Home Secretary from the Duke's "own" county of Bedford.

"This branch deplores the activity of the Duke of Bedford," says a resolution passed by the Luton Round Green branch of the Amalgamated Engineering Union, "and calls on the Home Secretary to intern him under Regulation 18B."

The same writer, Douglas Hyde, in The Daily Worker, for March 9, has another paragraph, headed:

STEWARDS WANT BEDFORD INTERNED

This precious piece of scurrilous writing opens:

A thorough drive against Hitler's friends in Britain, their organisations, their publications and their leaders—this is the demand being made to the Home Secretary by working-class organisations all over the country.

A De Haviland's shop stewards' committee, for example, calls upon Mr. Morrison to intern the Duke of Bedford . . .

This paragraph is issued by the people who were staging Press Freedom Demonstrations and asking the Strickland Press to exhibit their posters as late as September, 1942!

The Daily Worker proceeds to attack the Duke of Bedford's pamphlet, "Is This Justice?" It accuses him of defending Mosley and "the infamous Captain Ramsay, M.P. (interned under 18B)." It admits that the Duke of Bedford condemns the anti-Semitism of both Mosley and Ramsay.

Concerning "Is This Justice?" pamphlet, the Daily Worker says:

Publishers of the pamphlet are the notorious Strickland Press.

"The notorious Strickland Press"! Notorious! Why? Because it publishes Freethought literature, the writing of Richard Carlile, the "life" of John Maclean, of Bakunin, the prison thoughts of Carlile, pamphlets in defence of Anarchism. Anti-Parliamentarism, eh? The Strickland Press is the direct successor of the Bakunin Press and, is indeed, that press renamed, without any break in its work.

But what about this Luton Round Green Branch of the A.E.U.? What about this De Haviland's shop stewards' committee? Did not these groups oppose 18B? Did they not support the People's Convention? Did they not demand negotiated peace with Hitler between August 23, 1939, and June 22, 1941? Let us see.

Under the heading "Socialist Unity," the Daily Worker, in its issue for March 25, 1943, says:

The current issue of the Glasgow crank publication, "The Word," features, under the headline, "Towards Socialist Unity," the following letter to the editor, Mr. Guy Aldred:

Then follows most of John McGovern's letter, written from the House of Commons on February 4, 1943, and published in these columns for March.

The Daily Worker comments on John McGovern's description of The Word as "your very fine publication":

The present issue of this "very fine publication" gives the usual prominence to advertising the views of the Duke of Bedford, advocate of peace with Hitler, features the defeatist pacifism of Mr. Rhys Davies, prints an attack on the Beveridge Report and even gives a little display to the latest publications of Jehovah's Witnesses.

Interesting that three M.P.s give their cash to support such a "very fine publication," and are hailed as forwarding SOCIALIST unity!

One would think that there was no case for a Socialist attack on the Beveridge Report. And why should not even Jehovah Witnesses be defended when they are resisting violence and war? Certainly, McGovern, Maxton and Stephen were forwarding Socialist unity. One cannot say the same for the Daily Worker.

As against the I.L.P., so against the Duke of Bedford, the Communist Party is allied with the Economic League.

The Yorkshirre Observer, Bradford, in its issue for May 25, 1943, publishes the following letter:

"ADMIRATION OF NAZI REGIME"

From the Duke of Bedford.

Sir—Will Mr. Calder (secretary of the Economic League) indicate what objectionable features in the Nazi regime I admire and say upon what evidence he makes the assertion that I admire them.

BEDFORD.

Cairnsmore,
Newton Stewart,
Wigtownshire, 215/43.

Communist Party! Economic League! What a fraternity. We suppose Mr. Calder's authority is the Daily Worker.

SOUTH PLACE NOTES.

The Monthly Record of The South Place Ethical Society published some interesting notes in its issue for June, 1943.

Concerning our comrade, the Rev. Amphlett Micklewright, M.A., it says that he was formerly a minister of the Church of England, and adds:

The development of his thought impelled his resignation and he joined the Unitarians for whom he has been Minister at Southampton. He has recently been appointed to Cross Street Unitarian Chapel, Manchester, where he will shortly take up his duties. It is interesting to note that this famous Chapel, now much damaged by enemy action dates from 1693. It has a long tradition for liberality and for the support of advancing religious and political ideas. Its members are to be congratulated on having secured as their Minister a man who will uphold their great reputation. Mr. Micklewright is a member of the Committee of the Secular Education League for which he was until a month or two ago the Corresponding Secretary.

Readers of The Word will recall that our comrade, Micklewright contributed to these columns whilst still a priest of the Church of England. We have some most interesting articles in hand from his pen. These will be published at an early date.

The Monthly Record draws attention to our association with the Humanist Society of Friends in the following note:

Our friend and fellow member, Mr. Guy A. Aldred, Editor of "The Word" . . . has been ordained a Minister by the Humanist Society of Friends. This organisation which appears to have associations both with the Quakers and the Unitarians has received full official and legal status as a religious body from the State of California and the Government of the United States.

Our contemporary notes our "great efforts to secure the greatest possible publicity" for the centenary of Richard Carlile. It also expresses "sincere appreciation of the interest" in South Place Ethical Society "which has been shown so practically by Mr. Aldred."

The publication of the important and interesting work on "Carlile and The Surgeons" by Dr. Charles Brook completes our centenary activity. We hope that every rationalist, ethicist, humanist, secularist, will secure this great and interesting study of Richard Carlile and his times.

Concerning the South Place anniversary, we shall publish in our next issue an illustrated account of the useful cultural work of this society and its history and traditions.

YOUNG FARMER MATTHEWS

"COMMUNIST" AGITATION SCANDAL

As was made clear in these colums last month, Mr. George L. Matthews, the Communist Party fire-eater since June 22, 1941, up to which date he opposed the war, is a young man of military age. Yet, as pointed out in another article in this issue, he has attacked the Duke of Bedford for his pacifism, and on June 1 spoke at the Biggleswade Cinema, demanding the Duke of Bedford's internment, and pledging his, Mr. George L. Matthew's support of the coming battles in Europe. This support means sentencing so many young men from the cities and villages of the world to a terrible death the while Mr. George L. Matthews stays at home, play-acting at word-politics, in the safety of rural Bedfordshire. What damnable hypocrisy!

Mr. Matthews is taken to task in The Bedfordshire Times for June 4, 1943, in some excellent letters to the Editor.

Under the heading "A Service Man on The Second Front," sub-title, "With a Further Word on Free Speech," Gunner A. G. Carruthers writes attacking the resolution of the Bedford branch of the Communist Party demanding that the Duke of Bedford be interned, etc.

Gunner Carruthers wrote:

I notice that those who are most vociferous in calling for a second front now are young men in reserved occupations who, apparently, have no scruples about demanding that other people embark upon risks from which they are exempted. To my mind there is something rather indecent about this agitation, especially when one considers the fact that it is being conducted by people who are in every respect so much better off than the men in the Services.

Mr. Carruthers proceeds to "deprecate the tirade of abuse which is poured by the Communist Party on the Duke of Bedford for expressing publicly the views which he holds towards the war." He describes the hearing given in the House of Lords to the Duke's speech in defence of conscientious objectors, and concludes:

This is free speech, which should be the most cherished of British possessions. Let us guard it well.

Another writer, "Viewpoint," who writes from Ampthill, and unfortunately withholds his name and full address, gives some extracts from the Duke of Bedford's "Personal Statement," to show the falsehood of the attack on the Duke made by Mr. G. L. Matthews and Mr. Hill of the Communist Party.

Here are the extracts "Viewpoint" culls from the "Personal Statement":

"The objectionable features of Fascism may be summarized as espionage and acts of brutality by police agents . . . absence of a free Parliament . . . and a propensity to militarism. To all these evils of Fascism I am completely opposed."

"I am opposed to the war not because I approve of Fascism, but because as a pacifist I consider war to be a hopeless method of getting rid of the evils of Fascism."

"Sir Oswald Mosley is a militarist and an imperialist who puts the interest of the British Empire first and the rest of the word second. I am a pacifist, and I put the world first and the British Empire second."

"Viewpoint" concludes his excellent letter on a note of challenge:

Are we to be bludgeoned into a collection of robots? Are we to be so puerile that we rub names off memorials? Is the nobility of individuality to be obliterated at all costs? If this is so, then we are endangering the tendrils which join man to God.

The Duke of Bedford is a man of high principle, courage and Christian feeling. When those qualities are no longer honoured in the County of Bedford, then Bedfordshire will be no longer an asset to the country.

Mr. Frank H. Summerford, of Mill Farm, Salford, Bletchley, deals so effectively with Mr. Matthews that his letter must be produced in full:

Sir,—One does not know whether to take Mr. George Matthews seriously as he has changed his colours so many times the last few years that one wonders where his next jump will be.

True to the type of the political tub-thumper, he wants a scapegoat and he finds one in the Duke of Bedford. As for his cheap sneer about the Duke being a Fascist, he knows this to be utter nonsense. What the Duke wants, apparently, is fair play all round—for Fascist and Communist alike. He, like a few more of us, was for fair play for the Russian Communist long ago, when Mr. Matthews was hob-nobbing about with other political parties. We realized that Bolshevism was the product of a tyrannical aristocracy just as Hitlerism was the product of tyrannical Allied policy around the peace table at Versailles, and the cure is not so much mud-slinging at the product as penitence on the part of the producer. Mr. Matthews, while feigning court-ship of the one, slings his mud at the other.

As for Fascism, a pacifist can hold no brief for this way of life, entirely opposed as it is to his own, but I think it is an everlasting shame that its leader in this country, an ex-Service man wounded in the last war, should have already spent over two years in an English prison without even ever having had a trial, and this after all the prating of politicians about the Atlantic Charter with its plethora of freedoms.

Mr. Matthews is in a privileged position, for after spending the day on his farm in East Bedfordshire he can retire to the quiet of Kimbolton Road and there snipe away to his heart's content at all and sundry, with innumerable locks and keys in hand for all those who do not agree with him. But if anyone tells me that this well-to-do young Bedfordshire farmer will finish his political career a Communist, then I'll eat my Sunday hat.

decision. No one in that room appreciated more than he did the courage and self-sacrifice of the men and women of the Forces and of the Civil Defence services. The stand he took was in no way critical of those people, but it was an emphatic protest against a system which bred war—a system which permitted, in fact demanded, that millions of young lives should be cut short by the beastliness of war, instead of being lived to the full as God surely intended they should do, in peaceful constructive work.

"Instead, we have Russians and Germans counting their casualties in millions. We, too, I imagine, if and when the invasion of Europe is undertaken, shall have to count our losses in those enormous figures."

The Chairman, intervening, said that matter had nothing to do with the Court, who had to administer the law.

Defendant replied he appreciated that, but the point he wanted to make was that to-day they had the appalling fact that millions of people—in fact, almost all the peoples of the earth—were using all their energies and resources in efforts to destroy one another, and to him that was absolutely against all Christian principles. He was a Unitarian, and the basis of their faith was the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and war for any reason whatever seemed to him to be a complete negation of such faith. Therefore, he must say, without any defiance, but very definitely, that he must refuse to become even the smallest cog in this destructive war machine.

The Chairman, announcing the Bench would convict, said as a matter of fact there was no alternative.

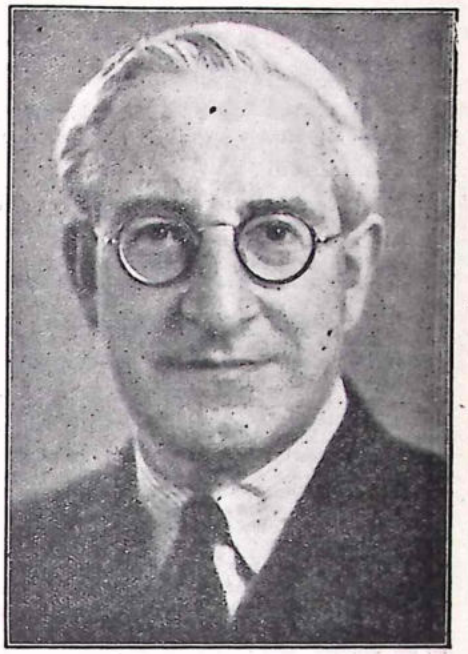
Supt. Webb said on December 4, 1941, defendant was fined £25 or two months for failing to register for fire watching. The superintendent suggested that hypocrisy moved the accused.

"Well, Mr. Earl," said the Chairman, "you probably realise that the members of the Bench are very sorry to see you here again. We have our duty to perform, and have to administer the law. We have decided to impose a fine of £25, or in default two months' imprisonment."

Defendant replied the Bench knew the course he must take—the imprisonment. Despite what the superintendent said, it was a matter of principle with him, and he could not allow anyone to pay the fine for him.

Several friends in Court shook hands with comrade Earl as he left for prison.

CHARLES A. EARL



[Last month we published the first instalment of comrade Earl's account of his first imprisonment in Wandsworth Prison. His story finishes this month. It is a digraceful thing that such a system should continue in England and Scotland alike under Labour Secretaries of State. Earl has published this account in pamphlet form, and this can be obtained direct from his wife, Mrs. N. H. Earl, 3 Molyneux Road, Farncombe, Surrey, post-free for 3d. Every Labour group should obtain a copy and circulate same. The prison and detention conditions questions should be raised in both Houses of Parliament by our so-called Labour members of the Legislature.—Ed.]

For the second time, our comrade, Councillor Charles Albert Earl, of 3, Molyneux Road, Farncombe, a member of Godalming Town Council, chose, on Thursday, June 3, 1943, to go to prison for two months rather than pay a fine imposed at Godalming Police Court for refusing to register for fire watching.

He is 55, and was summoned for failing between September 30 and October 10, 1942, to make application to be registered under the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Enrolment) Order, 1942, he being a person required to make such application in pursuance of notice. He pleaded guilty.

Magistrates present were Mr. R. M. Palmer (in the chair), Mrs. Fletcher, Mrs. Ritchie and Mr. F. Harrison.

Ernest W. Verstage, committee clerk to the Godalming Corporation, gave evidence of the publication of the prescribed notices under the Order, and produced a letter stating that the Regional Commissioner concurred in the prosecution.

Supt. Webb: Was that at the request of your committee?—Yes.

Henry L. Hunt, borough fire guard staff officer, said to his knowledge defendant had never applied to be enrolled under the order of 1942, and there was no record of his ever having applied.

Defendant told the Bench he did notify the town clerk of his intention to refuse to register. He did not want it to be thought he shirked his responsibilities in any way.

P.S. Forehead said on May 4th he interviewed defendant at his residence, cautioned him, and told him that proceedings were being taken against him for failing to register for fire watching. He replied:

"In September, 1942, I notified the town clerk I must again refuse to register under the 1942 Act. I do not intend to register, and if I go to prison a dozen times I shall not alter my decision."

Defendant said in 1934 he, with about 250,000 other people, answered a call by a well-known and well-loved clergyman, Dick Sheppard, who asked well-wishers to undertake a pledge to renounce war and to refuse to sanction or support another. He was afraid a good many of those 250,000 had fallen by the way, but he wanted, if he could, to hold to his pledge.

"It does seem to me, sir, having already paid the penalty once, it is not particularly British in the way of justice to punish a man twice for the same offence."

The Chairman told defendant he must stick to his case, and Mr. Earl replied it was his case. Answering the chairman he said he still refused to register.

Continuing, defendant said he must give his reasons, because it might make a difference to the Bench's

SOCIALIST VETERANS' REUNION.

The jubilee conference of the I.L.P. in Bradford reunited famous veterans of the movement.

The Jubilee Conference of the I.L.P. in Bradford has reunited famous veterans of the movement.

Our contemporary, the Yorkshire Observer, in its issue for Saturday, April 24 last, described Maxton and Jowett greeting each other:

JIMMY AND FRED: HAPPY REUNION
By A Staff Reporter
Hello, Jimmy.
Hello, Fred.

Jimmy and Fred shook hands and gazed at each other in silence for a moment after this exchange of simple greeting.

Then they smiled and released the handclasp. Mr. James Maxton, M.P., leader of the Independent Labour Party, and Mr. Fred W. Jowett, treasurer of the party, had met once again.

The meeting took place yesterday morning at the Alexandra Hotel, Bradford, headquarters of the delegates to the jubilee conference of the party. These two stalwarts first came together over 30 years ago at an I.L.P. conference at Barrow House, Keswick, which was then a holiday home run by the Fabian Society. They have, of course, met many times since as officials of the party.

Maxton's characteristic long hair is greying now; Jowett's is white. But their enthusiasm for the work with which they have been associated so long has not lessened with the years.

"Fred Jowett has been wonderful in his wisdom on our council," said Jimmy to me, generously and fervently. And Fred, no doubt, feels the same about Jimmy.

In the brief chat with the reporter, Maxton attacked the Labour-Tory Coalition. Maxton said:

I think the Labour Party are making a profound mistake in remaining inside the Coalition. There may have been a case for them at one emergency period, but I feel that it was a panic decision.

From a long term point of view, it is wrong that the Government of this country should be in the hands of a mixed Government who have no real identity of interest. Labour Members and Tories are poles apart.

The reporter proceeded to describe the veterans present at the conference:

Among other interesting personalities at the conference is Mrs. Annie Swan, now aged 83, who is a special delegate.

"I was a pioneer with Mrs. Pankhurst in the women's suffrage movement, and one of the founders in Glasgow of the militant suffragette organisation," she told me.

Mrs. Swan was sent to prison twice for her activities in that movement—once for two months, with hard labour, and once for one month.

"I served the first sentence fully," she said, "but was released after only a week of the second. Evidently, the authorities had not enough evidence to keep me there. On both occasions I went on hunger strike, and on the second I was on thirst strike as well."

Her bright little eyes sparkled at the memory of those hectic times. "My word," she said, with a mischievous chuckle, "I could tell you some exciting stories. . . .

Another veteran of the movement among the delegates is Mr. William ("Wullie") Stewart, who is aged 86. "Aye, Ah'll be 87 in July," he told me in a fascinating Scottish accent.

"Wullie" has been in the movement since he was 21. He joined the Fabians at Dunfermline (his native town) 65 years ago, and later became a member of the I.L.P.

He was last in Bradford in 1914, when the party held its coming-of-age celebrations in the city. For 25 years he was organiser of the I.L.P. in Scotland. "Jimmy Maxton is one of my boys," he said.

Readers of the old "Clarion" will remember "Wullie" for his articles, under the nom-de-plume of "Gavroche," a character in Hugo's "Les Miserables," whom he greatly admired. He is also the author of Keir Hardie's biography, which is regarded as the best of all the life stories of that giant of the movement.

"Aye," he said, "Keir Hardie, Bob Smillie and I were great friends. All three of us were born in 1856. So was George Bernard Shaw. Some famous men were born in that year, ah'll tell ye."

And he smiled and winked a roguish old eye as he left me to join the other delegates for their private conference.

WHEN JOWETT BECAME M.P

[The recent Jubilee Celebrations of the I.L.P. at Bradford call attention to the career of F. W. Jowett, who was M.P. for West Bradford, 1906-1918, and for East Bradford, 1922-24, and 1929-31. Jowett's story, and our Anti-Parliamentary reaction to his splendid Anti-War and Anti-Militarist stand down the years, are related in an appendix to "Socialism and Parliament," Pt. I., 1942 edition. When Jowett stood for West Bradford, at the General Election, 1906, his meetings were addressed by Dr. Stanton Coit, the famous ethicist, Mr. D. J. Shackleton, who managed to become Sir David and a Government official subsequently, and Miss Margaret MacMillan, Michael Davitt, and Keir Hardie. Below we revise from the Labour election sheet, "The West Bradford Bulletin," for Saturday, December 30, 1905, the record of comrade Jowett, when he stood for Bradford at the 1906 General Election.—Ed.]

F. W. Jowett was born in Bradford in 1864, and commenced work as a half-timer in a Bradford factory at eight years of age. At the age of thirteen his studies at the half-time college of St. Michael's, City Road, came to an untimely end, and he endeavoured to make up the loss by attendance at the Mechanics' Institute's classes in the evenings after he had finished his day's work in the factory. Later on he became a student at the Technical School, and continued his studies for some years under the direction of Mr. T. R. Ashenhurst.

Jowett's experience of the staple trade of Bradford was of an extremely varied and useful character. In the weaving branch of the industry he familiarised himself with almost every occupation by earning his livelihood for years together by most of them in turn. From the age of 18 to 28 he was a weaving overlooker, and at the latter age he became a manufacturer's assistant, a post which he occupied until he was prevailed upon by his friends to relinquish it, so as to be more free to devote time during the day to public duties.

Jowett first came into public notice in 1887 as a frequent contributor to the newspaper columns. Previously from time to time he had written letters to the Press, but the first letter which appeared over his own signature was one in the early part of 1887 on the subject of Labour Representation. This letter contained the first local statement of the case in favour of a separate Group in Parliament to act independently of either party. To this belief he adhered, and successfully withstood in turn periods of torrid flattery and freezing abuse, the like of which had not been seen in the annals of Yorkshire politics since Oastler's days.

In the next few following years Jowett endeavoured, along with others, to secure an Independent Labour movement by assisting in the formation of what was then known as the Labour Electoral Association, but this attempt failed for the time. When, however, the Manningham strike took place and the Liberal majority on the Town Council took the part of the employers and used police and soldiers to defeat the rights of public meetings, things took a turn. Innoffensive citizens who had seen or suffered a cracked head from a police bludgeon, directed by a Liberal Watch Committee, failed to see why Mr. Gladstone should call upon them to "remember Mitchelstown" as he was then doing. Bradford rose en masse, in evidence of which it mustered 30,000 to 40,000 strong in Peckover the Sunday after the so-called riots had taken place.

At one of the three platforms in the midst of that dense crowd F. W. Jowett was one of the chief speakers, and when, as the result of these occurrences, the Bradford Labour Union was formed, he was one of the first to be enrolled in its membership. Shortly after, Jowett, in company with Edwin Halford, and along with others, singly and in pairs, canvassed from house to house in the Eastern Division for signatures in favour of contesting the Eastern Division with Robert Blatchford ("Nunquam") as candidate.

When Blatchford found it impossible to proceed on account of his duties as editor of the Clarion, the centre of political gravity, so far as Labour politics was concerned, shifted its position to West Bradford, where Ben Tillett took up the fiery cross and F. W. Jowett became one of his chief lieutenants. The Non-conformist ministers ranged themselves on the other side in the struggle that ensued, and called a meeting of Non-conformists in the Mechanics' Institute to assist them. Jowett was then an active member of the Congregationalist section, and he and others attended the meeting in response to the invitation, and in spite of all attempts on the part of the chairman, Briggs Priestley, then M.P. for the Pudsey Division, to prevent him doing so, he succeeded in moving an amendment to the resolution before the meeting. This he supported by a speech in which, amid the wild enthusiasm of the Labour section present, and the answering howls of Illingworth's supporters, he proceeded to formulate an indictment against the anti-Labour Liberals for their opposition to Labour legislation. Briggs Priestley, in particular—in the chair as he was—served appropriately to point the moral on account of his opposition to the Particulars Clause in the new Factory Acts which had just been passed in the teeth of the Liberal millocracy by the Tory Government.

In 1892 Jowett was returned as a councillor for the Manningham Ward, and he immediately commenced active work in health, housing, land, and municipal ownership questions, for which he became famous. As a rule, each subject that he took up met with the same fate. First, unbridled opposition and few votes, outside those of the members of his own party; then toleration, with an increased number of supporters; and finally success, accompanied by the earnest protestations of both parties that the subject is having their favourable attention.

On one occasion in the early part of 1895, when the unemployed had undergone terrible months of starvation, Jowett made a speech in the Jollity Theatre, in which he condemned the Council for deliberately refusing, in an official report to the Local Government Board, to acknowledge that there was any distress arising through trade depression. The report with such reference struck out he branded as untrue, and at the following Council meeting he was bitterly attacked by both parties, refused a hearing in his own defence, and a vote of censure passed on him. Jowett is the only member, or one-time member, of the City Council against whom a vote of censure is recorded in the books, and he is proud of the entry. Shortly after he was re-elected for Manningham, and within twelve months after it had censured him the same Council elected him an Alderman.

Amongst the many reforms for which Jowett fought in the City Council we must not forget the battle for free scholarships. Year after year, in those days when the Corporation used to make big contributions out of the public funds to different outside education institutions, he used to oppose the grants, except so far as the institutions concerned would consent to give scholarships to the number and value of the grant proposed to be given. The large number of scholarships that later became available to scholars of Bradford was chiefly the result of his activity in this direction.

Jowett was elected in 1898 as chairman of the Health Committee of the Corporation, then known as the Sanitary Committee, and his ability and fairness in the chair secured him his unopposed re-election on eight separate occasions subsequently, though his own party was never in a majority on the committee.

At the expiration of his term of office as Alderman in 1901, Jowett did not submit himself for re-election, but contested Heaton Ward, for which he was returned by a handsome majority. In the meantime (October, 1900) Jowett fought a keen Parliamentary contest in West Bradford, and narrowly missed winning—forty-two more votes would have secured his return.

With the advent of a Liberal candidate in the constituency and the ascendency of the anti-Labour section in the Liberal party, there came another period of freezing abuse for Jowett such as he had undergone ten years before. No stone was left unturned in the attempt to injure his standing and influence with the workers. The Trade Unionists, whose cause he had fought for 15 years, were beseeched and baited to desert him. The Liberal evening paper for nearly two years running vilified and misrepresented him.

Jowett's experience of nearly every separate branch of public work, and especially those branches which concern the working portion of the community, with whose cause he has been specially identified, afforded him a training for Parliamentary work which could not be surpassed.

This is based on the supposition that reform under capitalism is possible and that parliamentarism helps the working class. To this idea we do not subscribe. The working class movements subscribe to this notion however.

Below we give a list of the chief public and semi-public offices filled by Jowett at different times during the 20 years prior to the 1906 election:

1. Member of the Bradford City Council 13 years.
2. Chairman of the Corporation Health Committee 8 years.
3. Member of the Education Committee 2 years.
4. Member of the Board of Guardians 3 years.
5. Ex-officio Member of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce 6 years.
6. Secretary of the Bradford Trades and Labour Council 3 years.
7. Member of the first Bradford Board of Conciliation between Employers and Workmen.
8. Director of the Bradford Provident Industrial Society.
9. Director of the Airedale Co-operative Manufacturing Society.
10. Member of the Committee of the Power Loom Overlookers' Society.

Jowett also acted as secretary to a committee which made an exhaustive enquiry into the wages and working conditions of the operatives in woolcombing establishments. His Saturday afternoons throughout a whole summer were spent in hearing—along with other members of the Trades Council—witnesses who gave evidence of the hours, wages, temperature and customs prevailing at every important woolcombing shed in Bradford. As a member of a joint committee of employers and employed he assisted to draw up a standard wage list for weavers which, had there been a strong union to enforce it, would have compelled the low wage firms in Bradford to increase their wage and meet their competitors on fair terms. He also took an active part in drawing up rules for the protection of woolsorters and others from anthrax, again representing the workers on committees composed of both employers and employed.

As bearing on the manner in which Jowett fulfilled his public duties we may mention that on one occasion, after he had been under examination and cross-examination for nearly two and a half hours at a Local Government Board Enquiry, the Government Inspector publicly tendered his thanks to him for the valuable information he had given at the enquiry.

Even Liberals—when there was no Liberal candidate in the field—testified to their admiration of Jowett's fidelity and ability in the public service. When Jowett was first adopted as Parliamentary Candidate for West Bradford in July, 1897, the Observer in a leading article, commented as follows:

"Whatever may have been the origin of Mr. Jowett's public life he has ceased to be the exclusive ornament of a section. He has done sterling work, both on the City Council and the Chamber of Commerce, and has earned the approbation of many of his fellow citizens who formerly did not believe that any good could come out of his coterie."

THE BIRTH OF THE I.L.P.

Speech made in the name of the Foundation Members of the Party at Bradford, Easter Conference, 1943,

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works 1924 Labour Government)

[Since September, 1941, articles by and on our veteran comrade, F. W. Jowett, have been a feature of these columns. From all parts of the English speaking world we have received letters of tribute to our comrade and appreciation of his vigorous and vital essays. In October, 1941, we reproduced the Edith Cavell statue, showing her last words of fearless challenge to a militarist world mad with war, placed thereon by instruction of our comrade when he was Minister of Works. Below we reproduce the speech made by our comrade, for the Foundation Members of the Party, at the Easter Conference, at Bradford, 1943.—Ed.]

It was an industrial upheaval brought the I.L.P. to birth 50 years ago. The dockers' strike for "the full round orb of the dockers' tanner" (as John Burns put it at the time) had only just before been fought and won, when Lister & Co. Ltd., then an over-capitalised concern, announced a reduction in their already miserably low wage rates. The workers, practically unorganised and without funds, resisted.

Then the struggle began. From December, 1890, to May, 1891, the fight continued. Led by W. H. Drew—probably the most unjustly abused man living in Bradford at that time—the workers (such of them as did not emigrate to the United States—to the great advantage of the American textile industry) held together for six months on voluntary subscriptions. They borrowed waggons to make street collections of bones for soup, and for any food they could get.

In the end, the employers, being in no danger of starvation, won. But it was a Pyrrhic victory for the employers, for fresh from the dockers' successful fight came Ben Tillett to give hope and encouragement to the workers in spite of their defeat. He addressed a great Sunday night meeting in St. George's Hall. There was need of an overflow meeting for which people assembled in Town Hall Square, that night and the two following nights. On the Tuesday night, mounted police rode into the crowd and provoked resistance. The Riot Act was read. Military force was called from Bradford Moor Barracks. The crowd was blundgeoned indiscriminately by the police. Whereever the police saw a head they struck it. The following Sunday 40,000 people assembled in Peckover Walks to demonstrate in protest against the Watch Committee.

The Bradford Labour Union, local precursor of the National I.L.P., was the outcome of this huge mass demonstration.

Robert Blatchford ("Nunquam" of the Sunday Chronicle) was adopted candidate for East Bradford. This was too much for the proprietors of the Sunday Chronicle to swallow. Blatchford had to quit the Sunday Chronicle. But with him from the Sunday Chronicle went E. F. Fay (the inimitable "Bounder"), A. M. Thomson ("Dangle") and Montague Blatchford (Mont Blanc). Together they founded the Clarion. Blatchford's East Bradford candidature had, consequently, to be abandoned. Undaunted, the Bradford I.L.P. approached Tillett and he became candidate for West Bradford.

And what a fight it was! Katherine St. John Conway (Mrs. Bruce Glasier), Pete Curran, and Bernard Shaw took part in it. Huge crowds massed at indoor and outdoor meetings and kindled a flame of enthusiasm which seemed irresistable.

Ben Tillett lashed the employers of half-time and sweated labour with scalding invective. Nonconformist Liberal supporters of Alfred Illingworth, the sitting Member, attempted to mobilise Bradford influence to protect Liberalism. Nonconformists were called to a meeting in support of Illingworth in the Mechanics Institute.

Who is there now living who was present at that meeting will ever forget it? I never shall.

Passing the Mechanics Institute that memorable evening on my way to a Directors' Meeting of the local Co-operative Society, I was stopped by W. H. Drew and Fred Pickles—Fred Pickles who afterwards became Keir Hardie's private secretary. "You are just the man we want," said Drew. There is a non-conformist meeting here at the Institute to-night in opposition to Tillett. . . . You are a non-conformist. We want you to move an amendment to the platform's resolution: They intend to move one supporting Illingworth."

I agreed. The hall was crowded. On the platform was a solid phalanx of non-conformist parsons. But in the chair was Mr. Briggs Priestley, M.P., the man of all others it was unfortunate for the promoters of the meeting to have there, for he, quite recently, had moved a sabotage amendment to defeat a vital clause in a new Factors Acts Amendment Bill.

Weavers' wages, for example, had to my knowledge, been surreptitiously reduced by lengthening their piece lengths, yards at a time, without notice, from 56 yards to 70 yards. So when the time came I rose to move my amendment. But the Chairman said I would be given an opportunity later, before the motion to support Illingworth was put. Accordingly I waited. When the time came, the chairman put the motion, although I was on my feet addressing him. Then pandemonium ensued. Led by the late Tom Keighley, an engineer with a big voice, who was at that time the I.L.P.'s Number One bellman, a large section of the audience demanded that I should be heard. The Chairman persisted in his refusal, whereup I was literally hoisted on the platform by I.L.P. supporters.

The Chairman's own sabotage action against the particular clause of the Factory Acts Amendment Bill gave me the text of my speech. I told the full story in proof of the need for I.L.P. representation. "Thou art the man," in effect, I said, addressing the Chairman, and turning to the assembled clergy on the platform I warned them that the workers would not forget their opposition to Labour: that Labour would have its own Church. So it followed that the Labour Church was actually established and for some years did good service.

Tillett at the subsequent election polled 2749 votes, which was only 550 less than that of Alfred Illingworth, the sitting Member.

Never shall I forget the scene after the poll was declared. The Dyers' Hall in Barry Street was crowded. Women, previously expectant of victory which had come so near, were weeping. Tillett, bless his memory for it, notwithstanding our differences later, sized up the situation. He started "Cockles and Mussels." Singing the chorus acted as a safety-valve to our overwrought emotions.

The following January, 1893, the National I.L.P. was established—fifty years ago. It was established when Bradford's working class population lived in back-to-back houses, with privy middens in the backyards, emptied by a contractor's night-soil men, who stood in the filthy mess and shovelled it into the yard. When men woolcombers, working exclusively at nights, were, in effect, casual labourers, lucky if they made a full week at 18 shillings or a pound; when their children went hungry to school and there were no school meals. When unemployment was only considered as a fitting subject for charity. When there were slums and cellar-dwellings, but no municipal houses. When the Bradford I.L.P.s world-famous Margaret MacMillan's Nursery School and school clinics were not in existence.

But then, in that dark hour, came Keir Hardie, Member for the Unemployed. Then came the I.L.P. with its enthusiasm for Socialism, National and International, and its crusade for peace.

The party has stood steadfast for peace through two wars. It is now going through its third trial. We were jeered at and mobbed during the Boer War. Hartley and myself were shouted down on Peckover Walks by an immense crowd. A dead cat was found and thrown, again and again at us. At the following general election only Keir Hardie was elected. But in 1906 twenty-nine Labour members were elected, seven of them directly representing and financed by the I.L.P.

Again, during the first world war, the I.L.P. made its stand against Imperialism and war. At the next succeeding election we lost all our seats. But the I.L.P. rose again. For in 1922 and 1923 all the previously despised and rejected I.L.P. leaders were elected and in 1924 the first Labour Government came. The once powerful Irish Nationalist Party which had supported the war, were almost completely wiped out by the Sinn Fein movement. The Liberal Party, which had supported the war, was reduced to a mere shadow of its former self.

And so, although at present the I.L.P. is, so to speak, swimming against the stream, we know the tide will burn, and, as fifty years ago a great after-war upheaval gave birth to the I.L.P. and a great Labour and Socialist movement, so it is to be expected it will be again at the next after-war upheaval.

From this war-scarred tormented world in travail a new world will be born, and the I.L.P. and its foundation members will have no small share of the honour of having brought it to birth.

A DREAM.

To have a cottage all my own,
A garden, and some trees around,
But not so sheltered that the storms
Would never sound;
To have a wife both kind and sweet,
And children who would laugh, and cry;
That was my dream of life complete.

But War has taken both my eyes;
My limbs are mangled, and my brain
Is uncontrollable at times—
The greatest pain;
So I can only sigh and dream
Of joys I might have known, if Christ
Had not, for all the evil things,
Been sacrificed.

NEGRO RIGHTS DEFENDED.

In these days of war and hatred, and racial oppression and discrimination, it is a pleasure to record examples of protest and courage in defence of racial minorities. Negro discrimination, or Jim Crowism in the United States of America is a sorry blot on the principles of democracy as proclaimed by the fathers of the Republic, great and expansive thinkers like the immortal Jefferson. We congratulate an American Jewish judge on the stand he has taken in opposition to white discrimination against negroes.

Our contemporary, The Jewish Standard, the national Jewish weekly, published in London, in its issue for Friday, June 4, publishes the following important news-item from the United States:

AGAINST DISCRIMINATION.

Protest by Jewish Judge.

Judge Jonah J. Goldstein, American Jewish leader, has resigned from the American Bar Association because of its failure to admit Mr. Francis E. Rivers, Assistant District Attorney and a leader of the negro community in New York.

Mr. Rivers, a graduate of Columbia Law School and a lieutenant in the last war, was proposed for membership by Judge Goldstein last November. He is a member of the New York Bar Association, which accepted him after the late Louis Marshall threatened to resign if the Association discriminated against negroes.

Judge Goldstein's resignation promptly drew a statement from Mr. William B. Herlands, Commissioner of Investigation, that he, too, will withdraw if the Association fails to admit Mr. Rivers. Mr. Arthur Garfield Hays, National Director of the American Civil Liberties Union, announced that he, also, has resigned from the Association in support of Judge Goldstein's protest, and called upon other members to resign.

In his letter of resignation Judge Goldstein said:

"I have been a member of the American Bar Association for 29 years, and desire to continue my membership if I can do so without stultifying myself. To be a member of a professional organisation which bars negroes from its membership would in essence be contributing to the perpetuation of bigotry. This I refuse to do. Unless I receive concrete evidence that the Association is not pursuing this discriminatory and un-American practice, you may regard this letter as my resignation from the membership of the American Bar Association."

Judge Jonah J. Goldstein is entitled to universal respect for his stand which must hasten the collapse of racial persecution and speed the dawn of true democracy. The necessity in the twentieth century of the Christian era, for sincere lovers of true citizenship to have to make protests against race discrimination is both criminal and absurd.

ANOTHER SPRING IN ANOTHER WAR.

When in the sweet Spring
I hear the birds sing,
Full-throated with love,
And the spirit of joy,
I think me of Man,
Since the world began
And I wonder if he
Would be better to die.

To him comes the Spring,
But he never can sing,
For his mind is too numb,
And too far from the truth,
To know that his blood,
And the sap in the wood,
Are one and the same,
And that Springtime is youth.

I see the sleek coat,
And I hear the clear note
Of the creature whose brain
Cannot think much at all,
And I see the dull eyes,
In the skull of the "wise"
And the greed, and the hate,
And the ugly black soul.

I hear the guns roar,
On the red fields of war,
And I hear the fools' hopes,
And the glib statesmen's lies,
And in this bloody slime,
Through the eons of Time,
Is the proof that he never
Had sense to be wise.

And if millions of years
Haven't banished his fears,
And shown him the joy
And the beauty of Spring,
Then surely 'tis time
That he left this fair clime
In the innocent keeping
Of things that can sing?

WANDSWORTH PRISON IMPRESSIONS

By Councillor CHARLES A. EARL

An Account of Six Weeks' Imprisonment in H. M. Prison, Wandsworth.

Safety razors are issued every fourth day, the blades had to be used over and over again and I used to amuse myself by stropping the blade on my hand; it was quite effective, but using cold water as we had to was not so good. The razors were brought round at dinner time and collected again after dinner. Most convicts were very glad when shaving day came round. We all looked rather "tough" with four days' beard.

"Exercise" means walking round and round a small yard (no extra coat is provided). First offenders were permitted to walk three abreast and talk quietly; other convicts walked in single file and were supposed to be silent. Several warders are stationed round the marching convicts and they continually shout, "walk faster," or "not so fast," "close the gap," "open up there." It seemed impossible to please some of them.

Conversation at other times was supposed to be forbidden, but some of the warders permitted it, provided the convicts were reasonable, which they mostly were.

According to the regulations prisoners could at any time make application to see the Chaplain, Doctor, Governor, or Visiting Committee. They could also make complaints, but I think it would be a very reckless individual who had the temerity to complain.

All prisoners were allowed to write and receive one letter at the beginning of their sentence, and in the case of first offenders one letter a fortnight could be written and received. All letters both in and out are read by officials in the prison. First offenders were also allowed a visit of 30 minutes once a month. One two, or three people at a time may visit a prisoner. At Christmas time an extra letter is allowed to be written or received. Christmas cards may also be received.

The food was no better on Christmas Day, indeed it was not so good, because, being a Thursday, no cheese was issued for tea, but two cigarettes were given to each man. Our solitary confinement on this happy day was 22½ hours, and the Governor after reading the lesson in chapel that morning about the Prince of Peace wished the convicts a happy Christmas.

The services in the chapel seemed a mockery; 600 or 700 men would sing the hymns in great style, thoroughly enjoying the singing, but during the prayers the most dreadful language could be heard and frequently during the lesson the men would laugh and jeer at what was read. One Sunday the lesson included the words "Judge not that ye be not judged," and on another Sunday, "Where thieves do not break in and steal," and on each occasion the laughter was loud and derisive. On either side of the altar are two wooden enclosures in which prisoners condemned to death attend the service unseen by the other convicts. First offenders attended chapel in the mornings and the other convicts, or "ordinaries" as they were called, attended in the afternoon. Jews and Roman Catholics attended their own services, and on Wednesdays Nonconformists and Quakers held their own services.

Attendance at these services was compulsory, unless permission for absence was obtained from the Governor. I made application to attend the Quakers or Nonconformist services but was not permitted to do so. I had registered as a Unitarian and there was no service for them, so I was obliged to attend the Church of England services. The chaplain never once visited me in my cell.

I have tried to give a fair account of the routine of prison life, and the following is some general information and personal impressions.

There was no attempt made at Wandsworth to reform or educate the prisoners, no trades were taught, no lectures or concerts given, nothing but bullying and degradation. One old man of 74 was serving a sentence of 18 months for criminally assaulting a small girl. He had served two sentences previously for the same thing. Sex crimes are numerous, yet the authorities apparently refuse to recognise that long hours of solitary confinement over months and years are no cure for sex perversion. Sex was the chief subject of conversation with many of these unfortunates.

Two young men, one 23 and the other 24 years old, had both spent eight years in Borstal or prison and they both told me that their first trouble was at the age of 13. They were sent to Borstal for interfering with girls, and since then had committed various crimes, such as burglary, petty thieving, and drunk and disorderly conduct. One of them told me that three years ago he determined to pull himself together. He got a job as a builder's labourer and had kept working steadily for two months, then the police informed his employers that he was a convict out on licence and they dismissed him. He was in prison again in less than a fortnight.

There were large numbers of deserters from the Forces, and many of these men told me they were "fed up," that their wives and families were not being properly looked after, and they didn't see why they should do all the dirty work while a favoured few made big money, and so on, and so on.

There were also a large number of soldiers who had not deserted but were so tired of army conditions that they committed civil offences in order to get into a civil prison and away from army conditions for a few months. Some of them had been in prison several times since the war began. Many others were "in" for "receiving" and petty thieving. I felt that very few of these men were inherently criminal but that prison life as spent at Wandsworth was the most certain way of turning them into permanent enemies of society.

When working in the shop one day we were all startled by an old convict suddenly stopping his work and shrieking aloud, finishing up with a horrible laugh. He was taken to the medical officer, and I afterwards heard he had been sent to Broadmoor, which is a prison asylum.

The first Sunday I was in prison, at about 6.30 p.m., the air raid alarm sounded. All lights were immediately turned out; in a moment or two hysterical shouting and banging from many of the prisoners broke out. Many of them had been in prison during previous raids, and the prison had been bombed and some of the convicts killed. They knew that no matter how fierce the raid they would have to stay in the cells in the dark, even if seriously injured, until the "all clear" was sounded. On this particular evening the alarm lasted only a few minutes.

Executions in the prison have a curious effect on most of the convicts, a tense atmosphere seems to pervade the place until after the execution. There were three executions during my imprisonment, and as these take place at 9 a.m. when in the ordinary way convicts are leaving their cells for the workshops, the time for work is put forward to 8.30 so that the prison is clear.

A prisoner will sometimes get very hysterical and violent. The second night I spent in prison I was startled by a violent banging on a cell door close to my own, and a frightened screaming of "let me out!" "unlock me!" "let me out!" This went on for several minutes, until eventually a warder came and removed the man to hospital. This occurred after "lights out." A similar thing happened a few days before I left the prison. One of the "ordinary" prisoners told me that the officials take a serious view of these outbursts because they are often the beginning of mental trouble. Bells are fitted in each cell, but very few, if any, were in working order, and they were only to be used in the event of serious illness.

I was surprised to discover that the only difference in the treatment of the man sentenced to "hard labour" and other prisoners is that the former has no cokernut fibre mattress on his board bed for the first two weeks of his sentence.

Prison discipline is maintained by inflicting severe punishment upon defaulters. A printed notice is hung in each cell giving a list of these punishments. They include:—

Loss of part of or all of remission of sentence.
Deprivation of privilege to send and receive letters for a given time.
Deprivation of privilege to receive visits for a given time.
Bread and water.
Deprivation of mattress.
Solitary confinement.
Flogging.

The "bread and water" punishment is usually inflicted for a period of seven days. This is acknowledged to be a severe physical strain and men undergoing this penalty are watched every day by the medical officer.

Solitary confinement is undergone in basement cells, practically without light, sleeping on boards, and no one sees the prisoner except the warder who brings his food. This sentence varies from three to fourteen days.

I personally met no one who had been flogged, but it is still given for such offences as assaulting warders or inciting to mutiny.

Most of the prisoners are perpetually hungry and would gladly eat more of the disgusting food provided. They quickly learn when the occupant of a neighbouring cell is new or ill and therefore likely to leave his ration uneaten, and when the time comes for collecting tins and washing plates, will quickly make for the new or sick man's cell, grab with their hands the food in the tin and stuff it into their mouths or pockets. This has to be done very speedily while the warders' back is turned. I say quite deliberately that the food is purposely kept below a reasonable level in order that the convicts' constitution should not be too virile: it is part of the punishment, and a very torturing part too.

I have written this statement in the hope of showing my friends that in our prisons no attempt is made to reform the prisoners. The long hours of solitary confinement, the insufficient, dirty and badly cooked food, the physical and mental pain caused by the inadequate sanitary conveniences, and the lack of air and sufficient exercise, must inevitably have injurious effects—spiritual as well as physical.

In a democratic country we cannot lay upon the State sole responsibility for our prison system. It is your responsibility and mine to demand that such punishment should give place to reform, and offenders helped to become self-respecting citizens. I appeal, especially, to Christians seriously to ask themselves if the conditions I have described can in any way be reconciled to the teaching of Jesus Christ concerning the saving of sinners.

THOUGHTS FROM A PRISON CELL

A Sermon preached in Hope Street (Unitarian) Church, Liverpool, by its Minister, The Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A.

When I came out of Walton Gaol a few days ago, I was overjoyed to be free once more. Yet I can truthfully say that I am profoundly thankful for the experience of imprisonment. I am glad to have had the opportunity of bearing witness in this way to the cause of freedom of conscience; and I am thankful also for the extension of knowledge and understanding and human contacts which prison has brought. I want to tell you something of my impressions and thoughts during the past month.

I have been in prison. During my first few days at Walton I experienced from time to time a shock of surprise and dismay at realising where I was. For many years I have been interested in the prison system; more than once I have spoken on the subject. But it is one thing to view the system from the outside: it is quite another thing to experience it from within. What is it like to be confined within the walls of a gaol?

My most marked feeling was the sense of exile. You are banished from your home and friends and from the life of the community to which you belong—cut off from those contacts which form the texture of your normal existence. You are not allowed to read papers, to write letters (save one) in the first month, to receive visits. You hear the news at Walton only twice a week from the Chaplain—immediately before the Sunday afternoon and Thursday morning service—and what you hear is only a meagre selection (though we had the football results in full).

Then, again, you enjoy a strictly limited freedom of intercourse with your fellow-prisoners. At the present time at Walton you are locked up in your cell for about 18 hours in the 24. (I was fortunate in having half-a-dozen of my own books sent in, and they were a great solace.) There is to-day, happily, no absolute rule of silence, as there was years ago. Conversation is now permitted while you are on exercise, walking two abreast (for two half-hours most days). During the hours of "associated labour," conditions vary considerably. Three of my four weeks I spent in the "Part-worn Stores," where I had a very comfortable job sewing buttons on coats and trousers; and there was ample opportunity of conversation with my four companions. But in the "Mail-bag Shop," where I spent my first week, and where far more men are working, talking is not officially allowed.

All the time you are in prison, you are, of course, under orders, following a fixed routine decided for you in every detail. In your cell you have a "task" which is supposed to occupy the greater part of your time—apart from the 9½ hours of darkness. For most prisoners this consists in sewing mail-bags. Your job is decided for you; you go on exercise or to chapel at the stated hours. As far as compulsory chapel is concerned, you are either "R.C." or "C. of E." For those who register as Quakers there is a meeting on Sunday afternoon. Having naturally registered as a Unitarian, I was not allowed to attend. The prison system is a warning to those who emphasise "security" as the main social objective. In prison you have complete "security"—food, shelter, employment—but no effective freedom of expression.

In prison there is a superabundant supply of a commodity not unknown outside—"red tape." Everything is done according to fixed regulations. Personally, I have an inveterate habit of marking my books when I read them, so I made a special application to the Governor for the use of a pencil. But as the use of pencils is only permitted to "stage" prisoners—serving a longer period—my application was refused. A small instance, but significant of much. The system is essentially mechanical and undiscriminating. People are all lumped together in a common category as law-breakers who have to be punished. No matter what offence you have committed or for what reason, you must be treated in the same way. The attitude which all prisoners are supposed to adopt is admirably expressed in the words of the collect used on one of my Sundays: "We who are justly punished for our offences . . ."

My own experience was sufficient to show how widely people in prison differ among themselves, and how impossible it is to generalise about them. There is one type of offender who is always in and out of prison—who, through some twist in his character (whatever its cause) seems incapable of keeping straight for any length of time. There is the unscrupulous egoist who is guilty of swindling and gets found out. There are men of normally good character who are guilty of some temporary lapse. And there are the victims of social circumstance or of legal harshness and injustice. The men I was with in the "Part-worn Stores" were all serving several months' imprisonment, but they were all men I am happy to have known. One of them—a married man with six children—was doing several months for stealing crockery worth 6/-. They all displayed an extraordinary kindness and solicitude on my behalf.

"Prison," as we know it, is a very rough and crude and altogether insufficient means of dealing with offences. In some instances it may have a deterrent effect. I heard more than one man say, "This is no place to be in, an I certainly shan't come back again." But the atmosphere is definitely bad, and is bound to exercise a corrupting influence on the young and susceptible. In some respects the attitude of prisoners is better from the Christian standpoint than that of many more respectable members of society. There is no Pharisaism; there is none of that self-righteousness which was, in the eyes of Jesus, so great a sin. I can understand more fully in the light of my own experience how it was that he felt that the publicans and sinners were nearer to the Kingdom of God than the Pharisees. In prison you are looked on primarily as a fellow-sufferer. "How long have you got?" you are asked, and "what are you going to do when you go out?" There is plenty of sympathy and friendliness; but at the same time there is a very general moral laxity. And the system is doing nothing whatsoever to overcome it. Through prison we are dealing with evil in a wholly mechanical and external way—by punishment. We are not getting at its roots. When you go in, one of the first questions you are asked is, "What is your religion?" But the system has no religion in it.

During the time I spent at Walton I had ample opportunity for reflection. One day a prison-officer asked me whether I had reconsidered my position in the matter of registration for Civil Defence. I replied that I had certainly thought about it over and over again, but that my reflection had served only to confirm and strengthen my attitude.

People suggest sometimes that the issue is a trivial one. They say, in particular, that those who, like myself, are at the present time prepared to do fire-watching, yet refuse to register, are guilty of "hair-splitting." Actually the position as I see it is perfectly clear and straightforward. I am unable to commit myself unconditionally (as by registration I should naturally be doing) to the acceptance of any duties which the authorities may choose to impose upon me in the way of Civil Defence. I am unable, in other words, to accept compulsory enrolment for a defence-system which is in practice necessitated by a form of warfare actively engaged in by the British Government. Two of my fellow-prisoners refuse to do fire-watching at all. I don't share their attitude, but I respect it. The essential thing is that the persecution of conscience (in any form) shall cease. As a friend of my own—who is not a Pacifist—put it recently in a letter to the Home Secretary, "The whole point of the recognition of conscientious objection is to recognise it when you don't agree with it, but when you meet it."

This issue of conscience is one that goes down to the very roots of civilisation, and one that affects the whole future of mankind. What kind of a world are we going to have after the war? Is it to be a world like the Prison—in which everything is determined mechanically, in which individual personality is completely submerged? Or is it to be a world based fundamentally on respect for human dignity and human freedom? Are material or spiritual forces to be supreme?

One thing is clear: that issue can never be decided on the battlefield. If spiritual and not material forces are to prevail, there must be a new uprising of life out of the very depths of the spirit. For myself I feel that the time I spent in my prison-cell was not lost, because it was a time of renewed consecration, of renewed devotion to the love of God. I was cut off from the world, but I was not cut off from the presence of God; I was not cut off from the fellowship of Christ. And there was born within me with fresh assurance the conviction that it is only through the deep inner contact of the soul within us with the divine and universal Love that we can find the renewal of life, not only for ourselves, but for mankind. There and there alone is the ground of hope and rebirth. I pray to-day (as I prayed in my prison-cell) that even now, amid the tragedy and darkness of a world at war, the Fire of the divine Love may be kindled in our souls—that the spirit of the living Christ may dwell in us, and may work through us to bring healing and redemption to the world.

WINSTANLEY AND THE UNIVERSALISTS

Church's Three Hundredth Anniversary

By a remarkable coincidence the year 1943 in which has been celebrated the 150th Anniversary of the founding of the congregation of Universalists which developed into South Place Ethical Society, is the 300th Anniversary of the Universalist Church. Within the building at 57 Cavendish Road, Clapham Common, London, known as the South London Universalist Church, is preserved the shrine of Jerrald or Gerrard Winstanley, the leader of the Commonwealth days who held fast to Universalist teachings. It bears the date 1643.

Winstanley is known to history as Winstanley the Digger, the great Socialist leader, or leveller of the Commonwealth days. He held fast to Universalist teachings but gave to Christianity not merely an anti-theological interpretation but also a great economic significance. With him, Christianity meant commonwealth and individual integrity. Quaint now the language of his many pamphlets and songs must seem, but the message is clear and the vision splendid. Winstanley was a humanist pioneer and a thinker who did not believe that the Kingdom of God was a dream for a world beyond that which we know. He believed that the duty of the Christian was to labour to bring the Kingdom of God on earth. He hated authority, was loud in his protests to priests and politicians, and won from them much hatred and persecution. His ultimate fate is one of the mysteries of history.

In the preface to Sir Walter Strickland's powerful anti-militarist studies, "The March of Homicide" (1942), we draw attention to Strickland's reference to the Colonel Aldred who turned Communist and left the Cromwellian Army to uphold the struggle of Winstanley.

Travelling in the train from Dieppe to Paris in 1912, and in long walks through Paris, Strickland entertained us with eulogies of Winstanley, and comments on the Digger's clear views, great teachings, and mysterious arrest and disappearance. Strickland thrilled with personal pride as he spoke of the Digger. He recalled the republican tendencies of his direct ancestors, their associations with the Aldreds, and endeavoured to cast me for the part of a disciple of Winstanley because of the name association. He saw me as the modern disciple of the great pioneer of Universalism. As we pay tribute to the Universalist Church to-day and its minister, the Rev. W. Arthur Peacock, we cannot help recalling Strickland's enthusiastic description of its founder. Much of what he told us during his picturesque talks in France will find its way into the present narrative. Only we write dully, even when recording the story of the martyrs.

Winstanley wrote much that will be dismissed to-day as being so theological and mystical as to seem unintelligible. Yet his ideas were clear and simple and his attitude towards religion was so practical and realistic, so vital, that it must be described as tending towards rationalism and humanism. That his gospel was a social gospel is evidenced by the famous "Diggers' Song," published in 1649, which is preserved in the Clarke papers. This song is only chanting doggerel but it indicts the cavaliers, the gentry, the lawyers, the clergy, and the tithes. It bids the Diggers: "Stand up now, Stand up now." What a pity, that down the ages, so many Christians, so many men of thought and vision, so many folk destined to be prophets have failed to "Stand up now"! What a pity that, down the ages, men and women have failed to realise the great message of Jesus maintained by the pioneers of Universalism.

"I receive not glory from men!" "I receive not honour from men!" The honour and glory of the man of Truth in untrue society is imprisonment, persecution, torture, agony, and violent death, the mob and the classes applauding. The Universalists suffered for their heresies of doctrine, which more and more clear the Christian gospel of the weeds of tradition and theology inspired by power politics, and their fearless gospel of social justice.

The lusty clarity of their call to social justice is seen in their "Diggers' Song." We omit only the three concluding verses which repeat and sum up the previous ten verses here reproduced:

You noble Diggers all, stand up now, stand up now,
You noble Diggers all, stand up now,
The waste land to maintain, seeing Cavaliers by name
Your digging do disdain and persons all defame,
Stand up now, stand up now.

Your houses they pull down, stand up now, stand up now,
Your houses they pull down, stand up now;
Your houses they pull down to fright poor men in town,
But the gentry must come down, and the poor shall wear the crown.
Stand up now, Diggers all!

With spades and hoes and plows, stand up now, stand up now,
With spades and plows and hoes, stand up now,
Your freedom to uphold, seeing Cavaliers are bold
To kill you if they could, and rights from you withhold.
Stand up now, Diggers all!

Their self-will is their law, stand up now, stand up now,
Their self-will is their law, stand up now;
Since tyranny came in they count it now no sin
To make a gaol of gin, to starve poor men therein.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The gentry are all round, stand up now, stand up now,
The gentry are all round, stand up now;
The gentry are all round, on each side they are found,
Their wisdom's so profound to cheat us of our ground.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The lawyers they conjoin, stand up now, stand up now,
The lawyers they conjoin, stand up now;
To arrest you they advise, such fury they devise,
The devil in them lies and hath blinded both their eyes.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The Clergy they come in, stand up now, stand up now,
The Clergy they come in, stand up now;
The Clergy they come in, and say it is a sin
That we should now begin our freedom for to win.
Stand up now, Diggers all!

The Tithes they yet will have, stand up now, stand up now,
The Tithes they yet will have, stand up now;
The Tithes they yet will have, and lawyers their fees crave,
And this they say is brave, to make the poor their slave.
Stand up now, Diggers all!

'Gainst Lawyers and 'gainst Priests, stand up now, stand up now,
'Gainst Lawyers and 'gainst Priests, stand up now;
For tyrants they are both, flat against their oath,
To grant us, they are loath, free meat and drink and cloth.
Stand up now, Diggers all!

The club is all their law, stand up now, stand up now,
The club is all their law, stand up now;
The club is all their law to keep poor men in awe;
But they never vision saw to maintain such a law.
Stand up now, Diggers all!

S. R. Gardiner, in his work on Commonwealth and Protectorate, writes:

In February, 1652, Jerrald Winstanley, the most thoughtful of the "Diggers", who had established community of landed property on St. George's Hill, dedicated to Cromwell a pamphlet, entitled the "LAW OF FREEDOM IN A PLATFORM." . . . The scheme which he recommended was nothing less than Social Revolution. Not only Kings, but Lords of Manors, Lawyers, Landlords, and a Tithe-supported Clergy were to vanish from the face of the country. In the place of the existing life of Competition, was to be established a Collectivist Society, in which all worked under the superintendence of Elected Overseers for the good of all. No Money was to be tolerated in this strange Commonwealth; and the death penalty was reserved for two Crimes, Murder on the one hand and Buying and Selling on the other. Winstanley's Socialist effusion was too far removed from the actual world to move Cromwell either to approval or indignation.

Many years have elepsed since Morrison Davidson rescued from oblivion the memory of Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburne, the Leveller. The Cavileers called him "Free-born John" and respected him as the Man of Action of the Extreme Left in the English Commonwealth. Hume describes him as "the most turbulent, but the most upright and courageous of mankind."

Lilburne was the author of the famous "Agreement of the People," the very foundation-stone of democracy as constitutionally developed later in Europe and America. He concerned himself with the problem of political reconstruction. Jerrald Winstanley concentrated on the economic struggle and the problem of social reconstruction. He considered economic security true Christian Community.

Davidson describes Winstanley as the "great Communist Thinker of the Levellers, the most Left of the Left." He refers to Bulstrode Whitelocke's invaluable contemporary Memorials of English Affairs.

Under date, April 17, 1649, Whitelocke notes:

The General (Fairfax) sent two troops of horse to have account of certain Levellers at St. Margaret's Hill, near Cobham, and St. George's Hill, inasmuch as they digged the ground and sowed it with roots and beans.

Three days later occurs the following instructive entry in the diary:

Evarard and Winstanley, the chief of those that digged at St. George's Hill, in Surrey, came to the General and made a Large Declaration to justify their proceedings.

The "Large Declaration" is reproduced. This opens by declaring that "the People of God," meaning the Diggers and common people, in England, since the coming of William the Conqueror, "had lived under tyranny and oppression worse than that under the Egyptians."

The declaration stated the diggers intended:

. . . . only to meddle with what was common and untilled land to make it fruitful for the use of man, and that the time will be that all men shall willingly come in and give up their lands and estates and submit to the community.

Whitelocke's diary notes:

While they were before the General they stood with their hats on, and being demanded the reason thereof, they said he was but their fellow-creature.

It should be noted that Comber, Dean of Durham, in his Christianity No Enthusiasm, published in 1678, maintains that Winstanley, and his fellow "Diggers," were the real founders of the Society of Friends.

Winstanley followed up the Large Declaration with a vigorous Letter to the Lord Fairfax, and his Council of War, with divers Questions to Lawyers and Ministers: Proving it an undeniable Equity, that the Common People ought to dig, plough, plant, and dwell upon the Commons (lands) without hiring them and paying Rent to any.

In this Letter, Fairfax is advised that the Diggers are Anarchists in these very clear terms:

We told you upon a question you put to us (when you were at our works upon the Hill) that we were not against any that would have magistrates and laws to govern, as the nations of the world are governed; but as for our parts, we should need neither the one nor the other, for our land is common, so our cattle is to be common, and are not to be bought and sold amongst us, but to remain a standing portion of livelihood to us, and our children without the cheating entanglement of Buying and Selling.

What need, then, have we of any outward, selfish, confused laws, made to uphold the power of Covetousness, when we have the Righteous Law written in our hearts, teaching us to walk purely in the creation?

Winstanley then addressed a number of questions to his Lordship and his Worshipful Council's advisers learned in the law. His point was that the Commonwealth was a failure unless it was founded on Communism and that the people were more important than parliament.

He addressed 10 questions to the lawyers;

We desire that your Lawyers may consider these questions which we affirm to be truths.

These questions asserted that William the Conqueror became King of England by conquest; turned the English out of their birthrights; compelled them to be servants; and King Charles I. was successor to William. Since the common people of England had cast out the kingly power, the Lords of the Manor had lost their royalty to the common land. Winstanley concluded that the people ought to have the land of their nativity for their livelihood freed from the entanglement of lords, lords of manors, and landlords, who are our taskmasters.

He concluded that all sorts of people had overthrown the Norman yoke, and so all sorts ought to have their freedom, not compelling one to work for wages for another.

He affirmed that all laws not founded on Equity and Reason, not giving universal freedom to all, but respecting persons, ought to be cut off with the King's head.

He denounced the buying and renting of land, working for hire or wages, and the existence of clergy and gentry.

Addressing himself to "Public Preachers that say they preach the Righteous Law," Winstanley demanded to know whether the earth, with her fruits, was made to be bought and sold from one to another? And whether one part of mankind was made a lord of the land, and another part a servant, by the Law of Creation before the Fall.

He wanted this question answered in the light of itself which was the Law of Righteousness, the Word of God dwelling in man's heart, and not by some text of Scripture or example since the Fall.

Winstanley developed his powerful indictment of the Preachers to great lengths, and asked them to lay aside their multitude of words, their selfish doctrines, because by these means they confounded and deluded the people.

Winstanley delivered his letter, by his own hand, to the General and Chief Officers. They promised to read and to consider it. Actually they cast Winstanley's letter to the one side as being the ravings of a dangerous and disaffected "subject." Discussing the matter with his Ironside Colonels, Oliver Cromwell asked:

What is the purport of the levelling principle but to make the tenant as liberal a fortune as the landlord? I was by birth a gentleman. You must cut these people in pieces or they will cut you in pieces.

Oliver Cromwell believed in the class war as well as Winstanley the Digger. But he was on the other side.

Winstanley denounced Cromwell's attitude in "The Law and Freedom in a Platform," to which he prefixed an incisive and wholly unanalogous "Epistle Dedicatory to Oliver Cromwell."

To Cromwell, Winstanley says:

It ['The Law of Freedom'] was intended for your view about two years ago; but the disorder of the times caused me to lay it aside, with a thought never to bring it to light. I said I would not make it public; but this word was like fire in my bones ever and anon: "Thou shalt not bury thy talents in the earth; therefore I was stirred up to give it a resurrection, and to pick together as many of my scattered papers as I could find, and to compile them into this method, which I do here present to you, and do quiet my own spirit." . . .

When the Norman had conquered our forefathers, he took the free use of our English ground from them, and made them his servants. And God hath made you a successful instrument to cast out that conqueror, and to recover our land and liberties again by your victories, out of the Norman hand.

That which is yet wanting on your part to be done is this: To see that the oppressor's power be cast out with his person, and to see that the free possession of the land and liberties be put into the hand of the oppressed commoners of England.

And, now you have the power in your hands, you must do one of two things: First, either set the land free to the oppressed commoners, who assisted you and paid the army their wages: and then you will fulfil the Scriptures and your own engagements, and so take possession of your deserved honour. Or, secondly, you must only remove the conqueror's power out of the king's hand into other men's, maintaining the old laws still. And then your wisdom and honour are blasted for ever; and you will either lose yourself, or lay the foundation of greater slavery to posterity than you ever knew.

Winstanley argued that the real enemies of the people were not so much the Kings as the Kings' Allies—the Clergy, with their "clowning doctrine" (theology) and the Lawyers with their law. He wrote with rare insight and almost in modern terms:

The main work of reformation lies in this: To reform the Clergy, the Lawyers and the Law; for all complaints of the land are wrapped up within these three.

He complained that large tithes are paid to the Clergy for preaching "imaginary and ungrounded doctrines" which fill "the minds of many with madness, contention, and unsatisfied doubtings."

Winstanley declares: "This is oppression."

He turns to the lawyer:

If we go to the Lawyer we find him to sit in the conqueror's chair, though the kings be removed, maintaining the king's power to the height. If we look upon the custom of the law itself, it is the same as it was in the king's days, only the NAME is altered; and if the commoners of England had . . . shed their blood, not to reform, but to baptise the law into a new name, from KINGLY LAW TO STATE LAW; and so, as the sword pulls down kingly power with one hand, the king's old law builds up Monarchy again with the other.

Shall men of other nations say that, notwithstanding all those rare wits in the Parliament and Army of England, yet they could not reform the clergy, lawyer, and law, and must needs establish all as the kings left them?

Will not this blast our honour, and make all monarchical members laugh in their sleeves to see the government of our Commonwealth still built upon the kingly laws and principles?

I have asked divers soldiers what they fought for: they answered they could not tell; and it is very true indeed they cannot tell, if the monarchical law is established without reformation.

Winstanley explains why the soldiers could not tell him for what they fought. It was because the Commonwealth was not a true Socialist Republic. It was based on property and oppression, on the principle of monarchy. It denied the unalienable "Creation Rights" of each individual human being and Winstanley enlarged on what was wrong and what had to be done:

"For you must either establish Commonwealth freedom in power, making provision for every one's peace, which is righteousness, or else you must set up Monarchy again. Monarchy is twofold, either for a king to reign, or for many to rule by kingly principles; for the king's power lies in his laws, not in his name. And if either one king rules, or many rule by king's principles, much murmuring, grudges, troubles, and quarrels may and will arise among the oppressed people on every gained opportunity."

Winstanley described economic oppression and rent as slavery:

"And is not this a slavery, say the people, that though there be land enough in England to maintain ten times as many people as are in it, yet some must beg of their brethren, or work in hard drudgery for day wages for them, or starve, or steal, and so be hanged out of the way, as men not fit to live on the earth? Before they are suffered to plant the waste land for a livelihood, they must pay rent to their brethren for it. Well this is a burthen the Creation groans under; and the subjects (so called) have not their birthright freedom granted them from their brethren, who hold it from them by club law, but not by righteousness."

Winstanley was opposed to State Socialism, or to its parody, Fascism or the Corporate State. He was not a Communist Dictator. He believed in voluntary co-operation: "for all Commonwealth's rulers are servants to, not lords and kings over, the People." He defined his position in these terms:

"I do not say nor desire that every one shall be compelled to practise this Commonwealth's Government; for the spirits of some will be enemies at first, though afterwards they will prove the most cordial and true friends thereunto."

Winstanley develops in detail the theory that buying and selling is the law of the conqueror and not the righteous law of creation. He asks:

How can that be righteous which is a cheat? For is not this a common practice, when one hath a bad horse or a cow, or any bad commodity, he will send it to the market to cheat some simple, plain-hearted man or other, and when he comes home will laugh at his neighbour's hurt, and much more.

When mankind began to buy and sell, then did they fall from innocency; for then they began to oppress and cozen one another of their Creation birthright: as, for example, if the land belong to three persons, and two of them buy and sell the earth, and the third give no consent, his right is taken from him, and his posterity is engaged in a war.

When the earth was first bought and sold, many gave no consent. Therefore, this buying and selling did bring in, and still doth bring in, discontents and wars, which have plagued mankind sufficiently for so doing. And the nations of the world will never learn to beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, and leave off warring, until this cheating device of buying and selling be cast out among the rubbish of kingly power.

Winstanley answered the question whether one ought not to be richer than others, thus:

No man can be rich, but he must be rich either by his own labours or by the labours of other men helping him. If a man have no help from his neighbours, he shall never gather an estate of hundreds and thousands a year. If other men help him to work, then are these riches his neighbours' as well as his, for they be the fruit of other men's labours as well as his own.

Winstanley believed in Communism, in wealth, but not in sex:

Shall every man count his neighbour's house as his own, and live together as one family?

No; though the earth and storehouses be common to every family, yet every family shall live apart as they now do; and every man's house, wife, children, and furniture for ornament of his house, or anything which he hath fetched from the storehouses, or provided for the necessary use of his family, is all a propriety of that family for the peace thereof.

He deals with the question of lawyers:

Shall we have no Lawyers? There is no need of them, for there is to be no buying and selling; neither any need to expound laws; for the bare letter of the law shall be both judge and lawyer, trying every man's actions. . . .

At first view, you may say this is a strange Government, but I pray judge nothing before trial. Lay this Platform of Commonwealth's Government in one scale, and lay Monarchy or Kingly Government in the other scale, and see which gives true weight to righteous Freedom and Peace. There is no middle path between these two; for a man must be either a free and true Commonwealth's man, or a Monarchical, tyrannical Royalist.

This epistle-dedicatory was dated November 5, 1651. Winstanley signed himself: "A true lover of Commonwealth's Government, Peace, and Freedom, Jerrald Winstanley."

Turning from Cromwell, and addressing himself to the unbiassed reader, Winstanley says powerfully:

Here, take notice: That Common Freedom, which is the Rule I would have practised, and not talked about, was thy pretence; but particular Freedom to thyself was thy intent. Amend, or else thou shall be shamed, when knowledge doth spread to cover the Earth, even as the water covers the seas.

In this writing, Winstanley struck, with unerring aim, at the root of the tree of monarchy and oppression. Cromwell and even Milton are play-actors by contrast. Winstanley is worth all the Utopians from Plato to Bellamy and even William Morris. He outdistances the economists from Adam Smith to Karl Marx. Yet the man has no memoir but his writing, the greatest and simplest memoir of all. Writing of Thomas Paine and rebuking William Cobbett, Richard Carlile said no man of worth required a greater memoir than his writings, if he wrote for liberty. But Winstanley wrote and lived and died for liberty.

"OUR AIRCRAFT REACHED THEIR OBJECTIVES"

WHY WARS ARE SUPPORTED

By C. H. Norman.

The flood of mendacity which the various propaganda machines of the warring states have loosed upon a listening world reminds one of the exact truth of Isaac D'Israel's warning, in his essay on "Political Forgeries and Fictions," when he declared: "When one nation is at war with another, there is no doubt that the governments connive at, and often encourage, the most atrocious libels on each other to madden the people to preserve their independence and contribute cheerfully to the expenses of the war." It is admitted that was done by the Allied propaganda department during 1914-1918, and the same admission will be made in due course in the period at the end of this war when all the dupes will find they have been more effectively tricked or lied to than even in 1914-1918. Patriotism is a more terrible disease in its inflictions on humanity than cancer, for whereas the latter corrupts the body and the blood, the former corrupts the mind without the unhappy victims being aware of the rotting process which has them in its corroding and terrible grip. It is the most poisonous disease which has ever afflicted mankind.

When surprise is sometimes expressed at the great support on which governments can generally rely in embarking upon war policy, it must be remembered that large sections of the community in all states at all periods have a direct interest in supporting a successful war, and every government cherishes the delusion that it will succeed in the war upon which it is about to embark, notwithstanding thousands of historical examples of the defeat of the boastful.

In Britain, the following classes and sections of the community can generally be relied upon to support a war with more or less vehemence. There is the financial class which does so well out of raising the loans necessary for carrying on the war. Then there are the landlords of agricultural land and the farmers, as the prices of agricultural produce always reach in war-time profitable levels never approached in times of peace, so increasing the capital value and revenue-production of agricultural land to a vast extent. The landed aristocracy and the farming class in Britain have always supported wars as redounding to their economic advantage. The Sunday Times of October 8, 1939, reported as follows: "In Canada war prices are expected to add £60,000,000 to the income of Western farmers during the present year." The "value" of land has risen to a colossal extent since 1939 in certain of the warring states. The controllers of large nickel mines at Sudbury, Canada, were instrumental in influencing Canadian intervention in the war.

Then come the commercial interests represented by that section in the City which recorded in their day on the portrait of Pitt in the Guildhall that, under his administration, "commerce was united with and made to flourish by war," an instructive commentary on the "peace loving England" of the political fairy tales.

Next come the professional military and naval classes, whose attachment to the families of the landed aristocracy add an economic influence to their professional interest, as during war rapid promotion and glory are more possible than in peace-time for such classes. They are supported by the small but influential political class for which war provides opportunities for hidden and unchecked graft, such as the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee which operated at enormous cost to the country during the last war. In this war the same kind of thing has shewn its head in the Ministry of Information and its dispersed sections under various aliases.

Then there are the large interests concerned in the production of munitions, which in 1916-1918, represented more than half the total production of the country. In 1943, the munitions industry represents about 65 per cent. of the total production of the warring states.

The Trade Union bureaucracy, which has rendered itself more immune almost than any other section from the direct perils of war, has shewn a militant ferocity only equalled by the parasitic legal and clerical classes of all denominations and shades of belief. Indeed the Trade Union bureaucracy, since the defeat of the General Strike of 1926, has adopted the practice of concentrating the attention of the rank and file of the unions on the iniquities which have victimised the European working class in certain countries,largely to hide the fact of their own failure to maintain the standards of the British working man. They have carried out in this respect the policy of all despots and reactionary governments, which, faced with discontent at home, have sought to withdraw attention from their misgovernment by concentrating public thought on the misdeeds of rulers of foreign states. It is an old device at which the General Council of the T.U.C. has shewn its mastery from 1931 till to-day. They have taken good care to avoid any criticism of the abuses of British Imperialism which one would have thought they had more than a passing responsibility for.

That section of the professional class whose skilled assistance and qualifications are required in the organisation and development of war-industries also has a tendency to see its interests forwarded by war. The rank and file of the working class engaged in mining, shipbuilding, the chemical industry, engineering, wool and cotton, generally speaking, support war, as they believe that war gives them better opportunities for employment and higher wages. This comment is also true of the large number of men and women directly engaged in the production of munitions.

It is well to face the extremely unpleasant fact that, in this world of capitalism and war, very few men and women ask themselves the question whether they should engage in the production of bombs and other deadly instruments for the destruction of their fellow beings. As all such employments have the blessing of the Archbishops, the Popes, and the leaders of Nonconformity, the individual does not question the rightness of these employments, and patriotism enjoins their task as a national duty. But, as Professor Beesly remarked in his famous but uncomfortable essay, "England and the Sea," "Patriotism is now only a specious name for national insolence."

The sections of the community not quite so impressed with war slogans are those engaged in strictly peace-time avocations, such as internal transport, the postal service, the bureaucracy managing the administration of the social services, and the artistic and musical professions.

The teaching and journalistic occupations are so closely allied to the administration of the capitalistic state that they can be counted among the supporters of war, even though often their direct professional interest is injured by the circumstances of war.

There are individuals (only a few unfortunately) throughout all these pro-war classes whose independence of mind may lead them either to stand out against the dominant class feeling, or stay critical of the extremer antics of the patriotic majority in their classes.

This analysis of the elements which are blended into the war propaganda machine is not limited to Britain but is of general application in Europe and elsewhere. It is not surprising, therefore, that a declaration of war should find in all states, an almost unanimous block of opinion behind each particular government. The psychological futility of appealing by leaflet to the German people immediately on the outbreak of war to overthrow their government should have been apparent. Such propaganda, if the above analysis be accurate, could only act with any effect at the conclusion of the war when its tragic course may have disintegrated the block of class feeling in any country by the pressure of individual suffering and misery, eventually reaching such a pitch as to dissipate class interest, as occurred in the Russian Army in 1917, and the German Army in 1918, and, to a lesser extent, in the French Army in 1916-17.

As Englishmen, considering the tactics being pursued by the British Government and the polemics issuing from its propaganda machinery it is wise to reflect upon these two passages written by specially upright men of British race. The first is from Professor Beesly's essay already referred to: "Such is the nature of British maritime supremacy. I have briefly sketched its rise, growth, and maturity. No impartial judge will deny that it has been marked in all its stages by flagrant violation of the simplest principles of morality, by contemptuous disregard for the rights of the weak, and by an assumption of superiority intolerably wounding to the legitimate dignity of our neighbours."

The second quotation is from a speech of Mr. John Bright on the 31st March, 1854, in denunciation of the Crimean War: "It is not my duty to make this country the knight errant of the human race and to take upon herself the protection of the thousands of millions of human beings who have been permitted by the Creator of all things to people this planet. I am told, indeed, that the war is popular, and that it is foolish and eccentric to oppose it. I may ask what was more popular than the American War? Where is now the popularity of that disastrous and disgraceful war and who is the man to defend it? The past events of our history have taught me that the intervention of this country in European wars is not only unnecessary but calamitous. . . . I believe if this country seventy years ago had adopted the principle of non-intervention in every case where her interests were not directly and obviously assailed that she would have been saved from much of her pauperism and brutal crimes by which our government and people have alike been disgraced. This country might have been a garden, every dwelling might have been of marble, and every person who treads its soil might have been sufficiently educated. We should indeed have had less of military glory. We might have had neither Trafalgar nor Waterloo, but we should have set the high example of a Christian nation, free in its institutions, courteous and just in its conduct towards all foreign states, and resting its policy on the unchangeable foundation of Christian morality."

This passage is of particular importance to members of the Labour Party now that Transport House has told the world that their purpose in the war is the abolition of dictatorship, which means the abolition of the actual method of government in Germany, Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Russia, China, Japan, France, Spain, Afghanistan, Portugal, Iran, Greece and a few other places, including Great Britain.

Finally, on the 20th January, 1864, Mr. John Bright made a declaration which is of equal truth to-day: "I will say, further, that if there be a government possible in our day that will plunge this country into war under the pretence of maintaining the balance of power in Europe and sustaining any kingdom there, be it little or great, I say that government not only is not worthy of the confidence of the people of England, but deserves our execration and abhorrence."

THE WORLD IS OURS.

O, woeful world, where shall we find
The power to heal thy frenzied mind:
The thought, the courage, and the deed
By which thy spirit could be freed?

The carpenter of Nazareth
Taught healing, truths: and suffered death.
Then priests with pagan rites confused
His teaching: and men's minds abused.

Dogma and creed soon dimmed the glow
Of that clear thought, which we all know
Might have imbued humanity
With wisdom and sweet sanity.

Powers now flout the Nazarene:
Blind men to all that might have been,
And all that, even now, could be,
If minds would struggle to be free.

Behold mankind; entrapped, enslaved:
For war made murdrous; depraved:
By tyrannic powers driven,
Till world reason's racked and riven.

A hopeless world? Not while we strive
To keep the flickering flame alive
Of thoughts that dares to flout the powers,
And challenge them—"The world is ours!"

Hewart, L. C. J.: More Musings

Dear Comrade,—Lord Hewart was a reactionary Chief Justice except on the question of the proper administration of the Factory Acts where he was active in compelling justices of the peace and stipendiary magistrates to carry out their duties under these Acts.

But "The New Despotism" was really a fake. Its real purpose was to criticise the setting up of quasi-judicial tribunals presided over by persons with non-legal qualifications which inquired into various questions as against such matters being referred to the Law Courts. From my experience of both methods, the persons affected received better justice at the hands of the Inspectors of various Ministries than they received from the professional judicial body headed by Lord Hewart.

The decision in Thomas v. Salmon was an example of Lord Hewart's reactionary trend of mind, for in that case he decided, contrary to previous decisions, that the police could attend a public meeting as of right without any request from the conveners of the meeting. Lord Hewart gave short shrift to any person of Communist or unusual opinions who came before him, e.g. he presided in the Court which affirmed the shocking miscarriage of justice in the Count de Potocki's case concerning poems. Hewart presided in Court of Criminal Appeal in the Potocki's case in appeal from Old Bailey trial by Ernest Wild, Recorder.

CHARLES BROOK, RICHARD CARLILE, and the SURGEONS

"The South London Press" in its issue for June 22 publishes an interesting review of Dr. Brook's recently issued work on Richard Carlile, under the heading:

Ex-L.C.C. member writes surgeon's biography

The review falls into error by describing Carlile as a "devotee of William Cobbett," which he was not. This blemish we have removed, for it is factually wrong. The reviewer complains that Carlile's writings are devoid of literary graces. We consider this charge to be incorrect also but have retained the statement as an expression of opinion.

The reviewer writes:

Dr. Charles Wortham Brook, formerly L.C.C. member for North Southwark, has written a biography to mark the centenary of Richard Carlile, "Libertarian and warrior against ignorance," who died in Bouverie-st., London, at the age of 52, on February 10, 1843.

A Cambridge M.A. and graduate at "Bart's" Hospital, the doctor is as virile and provocative in character as was the man whom his pen delinates so thoroughly in "Carlile and the Surgeons" (Strickland Press). It is an open secret that his departure from his County Hall seat, some months back, was the outcome of a party wrangle.

As forthrightly as he spoke his politics does he clear away the rubbish of public ignorance and indifference from around the figure of his hero, hoping that as a result of his labours, "There will be fewer who have either never heard of Richard Carlile, or who confuse him with Thomas Carlyle."

A second reason for his interest in Carlile lies in the fact that the latter was a contemporary of distinguished surgeon William Lawrence, who, "although he was born in 1783, was still an active member of the Bart's staff when my great-uncle, Charles Brook, who died as recently as 1930, was house surgeon to Mr. Skey."

In 1819 Lawrence published "Lectures on Physiology, Zoology and the Natural History of Man," almost, apparently, as revolutionary a work as that on the Darwinian theory, for he was prevailed upon to suppress the book. Four years later, Carlile, "without the sanction or consent of the author, indeed, in spite of anything he could do to restrain him, printed and published a volume which was simply a copy of Lawrence's two."

"Why?" wonders Dr. Brook, and proceeds to supply the reader with something like seventy closely printed pages of Carlile's life and writings, which make heavy reading because they are, for the most part, devoid of any literary graces.

But the mere reiteration of this tale of the son of a Devon cabbler, who left his father's last to hammer home truths into politics and the medical profession, carries with it an aura of romance.

It is sad to reflect that in this England a man should have to languish in an early nineteenth century gaol for expressing in print principles of politics and physiology that are platitudes to-day.

By publishing "Age of Reason" and "Principles of Nature," he drew down upon himself a savage sentence of three year's imprisonment and a fine of £1,500, and in addition was ordered to provide substantial securities. The charge? Several indictments of blasphemous libel.

DUKE'S DEMAND

He refused to pay the fines or furnish the securities, and the poets, Keats and Shelley, protested against the sentence. Against them sounded the ponderous tones of the Duke of Wellington, demanding in the House of Lords that Carlile should be outlawed and transported for life. The Czar of Russia forbade any mention of the trial in the newspapers of his country.

The book deals with Carlile's fervour as an out-and-out reformer and tells how, even while enduring the discomfort of Dorchester Gaol, his mind was oppressed with the ufferings of operatives slaving in Manchester cotton mills.

He exposed this and much more that was corrupt in industry and medicine, flaying Wilberforce for weeping over the lot of enslaved coloured folk while his own countrymen were treated as bad and worse.

His wife shared his cell for two years and one of his children was born behind the bars. To the last, in or out of gaol, he wrote and published for the poor at prices which they could afford. Comments his biographer, bitingly: "That was his real crime in the eyes of the ruling class."

This work contains, also, a sketch of Joseph Hume, "the surgeon who became a party leader, and who founded the Lancet."

Dr. Brook's book may be summed up as a deserved tribute to a great man, and one that is teeming with attractive facts.

LONDON and BERLIN

The Bombing of Two Great Cities

A Prophetic Letter

EDITOR'S FORWARD

We all recall the terrible air-raids on London. This has passed into history as "The Battle of Britain." The censored news mentioned districts known to many of us as crowded working-class areas, in which the Socialist and Radical Labour Movement had made history during the past fifty years. In the bombed tenements and mean streets many Socialist M.P.'s had their political beginnings as propagandists. German airmen, the sons of German Socialists and Anarchists, bombed homes where German and Russian Anarchist exiles lived for years, and carried on their libertarian propaganda. At that time, the Soviet Union had not been invaded, and the Communist Party saw no crime in the bombings.

The morale of the people of London was not undermined by the bombing. They reacted, as did the people of Madrid and Barcelona. Militarists cried for reprisals. In due course, the tide of battle turned. And now we have the Battle of Germany. Berlin is being bombed or has been bombed as London never was bombed.

We make no undue complaint about these bombings. If it was right "to soften" Britain, or to attempt to do so, it is equally right "to soften" Germany. But we see the bombing as waste, a waste of culture, of progress, of humanity. We see war as a crime. And we fain would cry "Halt!" Also, we indict as responsible for the circumstances that made for the war, the very newspapers and politicians who rejoice in the war—to end the Fascism they evolved and nourished. Their screeches of "unconditional surrender" merely repeat the criminal cry of 1918, which has given us a quarter-of-century of want, fear, hate, hypocrisy, and a second world war!

When Nazism first threatened Germany, and Communists and Social Democrats, in their Marxist unwisdom, laughed, Neukolln was the centre of resistance to the new Imperialism from the gutter. Neukolln sought to arrest Hitler's advance to supremacy. It was the famous working-class Socialist and Anarchist district of Berlin. It bitterly opposed the creed of the Swastika.

Many working-class folks left Germany, only to find refuge in the East End of London, now bombed. After the Kaiser's fall, they returned to Berlin and lived in Neukolln, now bombed.

Milly Witcop, more often called Milly Rocker or Milly Witcop Rocker, the companion of Rudolf Rocker, has lived in the East End of London, and also in Neukolln. She was active in the Jubilee St. Workers' Friend Group: and she was active in the Berlin Anarchist Groups. To-day, she lives in California.

When the war broke out in 1914, she was interned, as was Rudolf Rocker. When the war ended, both were returned to Germany. She has close friends and comrades in East London and in Neukolln. Because of this simple fact, which has an eloquent appeal of its own, we print the folowing letter that she wrote in 1933.

We have the letter before us as we write: and we were tempted to reproduce it in facsimile, as also the envelope. But that can wait.

The envelope is addressed to: "Mr. Annesley Aldred, 17 Richmond Gardens, London, W. 12, England." The stamps on the envelope seem to be two of Hindenburgh and one of Ebert. The cancellation on the stamp was: "Berlin-Britz, 31-1-33. 18-19."

To-day, this letter makes excellent and useful reading.

We have reproduced a charcoal sketch of the author of the letter, done by her son, Firmin Rocker, when they both lived in the East End of London. He now dwells in New York.

My dearest Annesley,
you have most probably got my short lines by now, in which I have acknowledged the receipt of your dear letter and how delighted we were with it.

Opening sentences of Milly Witcop's 1933 letter sent to London from Berlin.

MILLY WITCOP'S PROPHETIC LETTER.

Berlin, 31/3/33.

My Dear Annesley,

You have most probably got my short lines by now, in which I have acknowledged the receipt of your dear letter, and how delighted we were with it.

We were sorry to hear that you have lost your job. Have you any prospects of getting another one? Work is probably just as scarce in England as here. It is a terrible state of things, the world over. If only we could hope for a favourable change in the near future! Unfortunately, there is no such prospect in view.

Do you know that I have not seen you since you were about six years old? It is a long, long time. Each time when I was in London, since after the war, you were not there; and so the years went on, without us meeting each other. Now you have grown into a big handsome fellow, to be sure, quite a man; and I have turned into an old woman, which is quite natural. Well, dear boy, let us hope that your castles in the air will turn out reality, and that we will see each other at last.

Your view of the political situation in England is not a bit inspiring. But where is inspiration or hope to be found these days? Spain makes the only exception. Also, there, the comrades have had hard times; but, at least, they fight for their rights. They do not take slavery and oppression as a matter of course in the same way as they do in other countries: especially here in Germany. Spain will yet astonish the world and give hope and inspiration to the workers in every country. In Spain, there are really Anarchists and Bakunin has left a tremendous influence on the people.

You might have seen, in yesterday's press, that our Hitler is in the principal place at last. The new Cabinet is the most reactionary imaginable, and what shape things will take in the near future, it is difficult to predict. There is no ground of optimism as to the future of Germany or of the workers here. And this pessimism will spread to Europe. Military reaction will not only establish itself in Germany, but it will spread to France, and overrun Europe, East and West. Europe will be divided between Germany and Russia: and both are dictatorial and reactionary powers.

The tragic thing about Germany has been the splifting within the ranks of the working class, and the absolute absence of any unity at all. There has been no class integrity. If the two Marxian parties, the Social Democrats and the Communists could have remembered that they existed to express the interest and will of the working-class; if they could have discovered agreement in the most vital matters of working-class struggle, on special occasions when specific attacks were made by the reaction, we would never have reached the political pass in which we now find ourselves. The Hitler party would never have developed, nor have become as powerful as it is. Now, the Hitler party will become Germany. Hitler will become Kaiser and Bismarck in one. A second-world-war must come. It is inevitable. A war, in which Germany and Russia will forge an ailiance, most likely, to destroy Britain and France. Has not Clara Zetkin preached German patriotism, with Communist Party approval? Has not the Soviet conspiracy to equip Germany with arms been exposed very fully by the Dutch Anti-Parliamentarian comrades? Germany and Russia will do worse than to unite to destroy Britain and France. They will not only attack capitalist democracy in Britain. They will threaten and destroy the anti-militarist movement of the workers throughout the world. They will make the workers feel that resistance to war is hopeless. They will uproot all Socialist idealism and spread slavery and desolation. I see a coming dictatorship-powers-alliance in Europe. This will indeed justify the Anarchist and Anti-Parliamentarian resistance to Bolshevism, to Leninism, and the New Economic Policy. It will justify our martyrs, now in exile or Soviet dungeons. But it will prove a terrible experience for the world—the death of all Socialist hopes: an anti-climax to our revolutionary struggle of half-a-century.

The Social Democrats, with all their errors, careerism, and reformism, are less to blame for the present state of affairs than the Communists. The Social Democrats have often approached the Communists, and proposed common action, but always in vain. Now, even if the Communists would bethink themselves, it is too late. We expect that the Anarchist organisations will be the first ones to be suppressed by the new government. The Communist Party will follow. The Social Democrats will follow a little later, unless the workers here take very drastic action. And they are incapable of doing this. The Bolshevik Revolution has wasted the world struggle of the working-class and delivered them to reaction in every country in the world, including Russia itself. What a climax to the 1917 days of revolutionary dreams of liberty and happiness!

The Communists, who have declined repeatedly to respond to the approaches of the Social Democrats, will come to their senses too late, much too late. They will want to make common cause with the Social Democrats when neither has any power left to make any cause. The consequences we shall all have to bear. Especially will the most radical organisations suffer.

The best elements in Germany must expect persecution; terrible imprisonment, and death. Just as Stalin has surpassed the Czar, so will Hitler surpass the Kaiser. You know the old saying, put beggars on horse-back. This is what the last war has done to the world. It has not ended in social revolution, but minor political revolution. It has given us a radical change of personnel but no change of character. It has put the beggars, Hitler and Stalin, on horseback. They will ride to the devil: but they will drag mankind after them. Alas, we shall have to fight the matter out as best we can.

Your Uncle Rudolf is well, and works hard. But he knows that there is no hope in Germany now. The social change must come from without. He is looking to Spain but no one can tell what the future has in store. Social Democracy and Communism have broken down completely. Perhaps Anarchism will get its chance of fighting the reaction. Unlike Marx, Prondhon always said that reaction would triumph for a time. After that, he saw the end of authority and of military society, and the commencement of a new social order. Unless Prondhon was right, the world, and all that we struggle for, would seem to be lost. Prondhon was right.

Love from us all, and hoping that we shall all live to make the world a better place in which to live.

I am, Your Affectionate Aunt,

MILLY.

P.S.—I hope that you may be able to read my scribble, and that you will not find my prophecies too gloomy or too shocking. I am sure that the Socialists will be horrified yet, not only by the crimes of the Russian Government, but by its attitude towards Hitler's Government and policy. Russia is the most dangerous counter-revolutionary government or State in the world to-day.

CIVIL DEFENCE VICTIMISATION

For refusing to take part in a parade for "Wings for Victory" week, four C.O.'s in the Hendon Civil Defence Services were each fined £1 at Hendon on May 3. These prosecutions constitutes a grave public scandal and are an outrage on every principle of democracy.

The accused were A. E. Rippingham, A. C. Southon, George Rust and Sydney Pickering, who had been in Civil Defence for two and a half years. They had worked well and there had been no complaints against them. They objected to appearing in a parade on March 6 with members of the Armed Forces and other groups on national service.

Robert S. W. Pollard, joint legal adviser to the Central Board for C.O.'s appeared for all four. The magistrates announced their decision after a short retirement.

"We find that there has been a breach of the law," said the Chairman, announcing the decision.

To our mind, the breach was on the part of the prosecution.

WAR

War I abhor
And yet how sweet
The sound along the marching street
Of drum and fife, and I forget
Broken old mothers, and the whole
Dark butchery without a soul.

Without a soul—save this bright drink
Of heady music, sweet as hell;
And even my peace abiding feet
Go marching with the marching feet
For yonder, yonder, goes the fife,
And what care I for human life!
The tears fill my astonished eyes
And my full heart is like to break;
And yet 'tis all embannered lies—
A dream those drummers make.

Oh, it is wickedness to clothe
Yon hidden grinning thing that stalks
Hidden in music, like a queen
That in a garden of glory walks,
Till good men love the thing they loathe.

Oh, snap the fife and still the drum,
And show the monster as she is!
Art, thou hast many infamies,
But not an infamy like this.

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

"FORGOTTEN WARRIOR"

[Under the heading, "Forgotten Warrior," our contemporary "The Medical Press and Circular," in its issue of June 23 last, reviews Dr. Brook's recently issued work, "Carlile and the Surgeons." We make no apology for reproducing this excellent article.—Ed.]

Not many of us to-day are familiar with the name of Richard Carlile, the centenary of whose death, appropriately enough, fell early this year. And yet we ought to be, for he was a notable man in his day. Notable and, indeed, notorious.

History has seldom known a more irrepressible and a more unflinching democrat. He was an atheist and freethinker (he once set out on a tour as an infidel missionary!), an iconoclast, an anti-militarist, a reformer, and a persistent champion and practitioner of freedom of thought and speech. So fiercely did the fires of conviction burn within him that, though he was persecuted and prosecuted repeatedly by the authorities—he spent an appreciable part of his adult life in prison—he never hauled down the flag but went on to the end. Wellington wanted to have him outlawed and transported, but Keats and Shelley rallied to his defence. He was an indefatigable writer and controversialist—he edited his "Republican" from jail, and edited it very successfully—and he wrote and published for the poor at prices the poor could pay. One of his chief crimes was to publish cheap editions of Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" and Elihu Palmer's "Principles of Nature." For this he was fined £1,500 and sentenced to three year's imprisonment. Clearly, it is inconvenient, if not downright perilous, to get oneself born before one's time.

GALLIPOT LATIN

"Carlile and the Surgeons" is the title of Mr. Brook's monograph, in which he recalls Carlile to our attention. For Carlile, among his multifarious activities, found time to enter into many medical controversies, general and particular.

One of his bitterest particular controversies was waged, perhaps not unexpectedly, with a certain Mr. Christopher Arden, coroner and surgeon to Dorchester Gaol, where Carlile was imprisoned for so long. The causes of this lay deep, but on the surface there appeared and reappeared an endless argument about the administration of mercury, Carlile swearing by crude mercury, the surgeon by calcined. With charming directness Carlile begins an open letter to him: "I told you, and told you correctly, that you were a disgrace to your profession. I now tell you that you are a disgrace to your profession. And," he warns him, "unless directly poisoned or otherwise despatched, you will find me a pretty tough stick. . . . I am in a very fine trim as to health."

One of Arden's prime mistakes—or was it a prudence?—was to refuse to argue with him, but the ground he chose—that Carlile was an "unlearned man"—was unfortunate.

"By learning," retorted Carlile, "I suppose you meant Gallipot Latin? . . . Nothing would do, you were a professional man, a dealer in mystery, and I told you that I was at war with all dealers in mystery, such as you and our worthy chaplain, who was by."

MEDICAL CURRICULUM, 1825

Not that Carlile was against all doctors—"for I may venture to say that the majority of the more intelligent part of them are my sincere friends. But," he adds, "some of you, country doctors in particular, combining in yourselves every branch of the profession, such as physician, surgeon, and apothecary, are as wicked a set of imposters as the priests. You first learn to read in Gallipot Latin, then to mix different drugs, and to act as surgeon-barbers. This is the amount of your country apprenticeship study, if an apprenticeship is served. Next you are off to London, to have a walk through the hospitals, as it is termed, and with many of you it is a mere walk. You enter your names to attend certain courses of lectures, as students, and, whether you attend or not, you find no difficulty in getting your certificate of qualification, to act as surgeon, apothecary, etc.; just as the priest can make sure of a call by the Holy Ghost after his name has been entered as an attendant upon a given number of divinity lectures. Thus inspired, the one hies off into the country, or back to his native neighbourhood, to cure or to kill the bodies of his neighbours, as luck may have it, and the other to cure the soul or the diseases of a religious mind. Both cheats: both imposters: both grossly ignorant."

DEATH'S CHARGE D'AFFAIRES

He certainly knew how to hit hard and to hit where it hurt most. And, indeed ,some of his criticism was shrewd and even farsighted, and only too well justified.

"The basis of all medical practice," he says, "should be a knowledge of the human body, and the basis of all knowledge of the human body is to know that it is but one of the many kinds of animals. . . . Until of late the medical profession had not extended its own knowledge beyond a knowledge of recipes; and, in point of professional skill or respectability, can rank no higher than a cook who has a good set of recipes to make all her preparations pleasant to the palate. Indeed, it is a slur upon the art of cookery to put medical recipes on an equality with it. For each individual can judge of the professional skill of the cook, whilst the meat is in process of mastication; but it is a desperate risk to trust one's body to the doctor, whose knowledge is confined to a knowledge of recipes. It is, at least, ten to one on the side of death. If an atheist may venture to speak figuratively of death, he can only consider a doctor of your stamp to be his 'chargé d'affaires.' In plainer English, I will say that you are one of Death's prime ministers for Dorchester Gaol, in particular, and for Dorchester and its vicinity, in part. It seems anomalous to me," he adds, "that, after you have sent a patient to heaven, you should empanel a jury and preside to report how it was done. But," he warns him again, "if I die in gaol all the opinions . . . will never persuade the present and future publics but that I have been murdered. And," he continues darkly, "you know that the affair of my prosecution and imprisonment will not end with my liberation. I have thieves to punish, villains to whip, and tyrants to pull down."

LAWRENCE AND GALILEO

Carlile championed Lawrence (later the celebrated surgeon) in his battle with Abernethy and the Elders of the College of Surgeons. Lawrence had been accused of atheism for hinting at evolution and questioning the biblical account of creation. Later he recanted. Carlile published his recantation in parallel columns with the abjuration of Galileo!

Wilberforce excited his supreme contempt. In that terrible, almost unbelievable, era of child labour and human slavery in the Manchester cotton mills, Wilberforce "kept up his clamour about slaves in another part of the world" but was blind to what went on under his nose. Of those "dark satanic mills" against which Blake raged, he wrote that by the end of the century they were likely to be the refuge of bats and owls.

A queer fish certainly Carlile, with perhaps more than one bee in his bonnet, but some of his prose has the ring and bite of Swift with much of Swift's terrible logic and much, too, of his "saeva indignatio." It is curious that he should have been so completely forgotten.

Mr. Brook has done very well to bring him once again to our notice, and his monograph contains much of the greatest interest to students of the medical history of a century ago. We commend it cordially to our readers.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD
LANCASTER MEETINGS

A well-mixed audience in which there was more than a sprinkling of members of the Forces listened to the address given by the Duke of Bedford, at the Armistice meeting, which was held in the Friends' Hall, Fenton Street, Lancaster, on Saturday evening, June 19, says the "Lancaster Guardian."

The Chairman, Mr. James Hudson, formerly M.P. for Huddersfield, said that the end which Mr. Churchill intended proved that when the war was over the German would be worse off in peace than he was in war. It was said that we should retain conscription and continue the great expenditure. Their task was not to destroy Nazis in Germany, but to improve things here.

The whole nation was becoming demoralised by this mass murder. Surely they could find some other way to peace. They should insist on knowing from the British Labour leaders just what it was that Churchill and Roosevelt intended, and get them to sign a declaration to that effect, even if they could not reach an agreement. Once hostilities ceased he felt sure there would be a different way of settling peace.

In introducing the Duke of Bedford, the Chairman remarked that many people said he (the Duke) was very unorthodox, and although it was the first time that he had been on the same platform with him he liked people who were outspoken, and in any case the orthodox people had made a mess of things.

The Duke spoke of the qualities of a negotiated peace and the desirability in doing everything possible to promote such a state. They should intimate that they were prepared to consider a conclusion of a just peace and the victorious country should agree to treat the vanquished as they themselves would wish to be treated if their positions were reversed. That was the golden rule, "to do unto others as you would they did unto you." The economic resourses of the world should be shared out according to the needs and numbers of each country, the wealthy nations helping those which were not. Selfishness did not pay and before the war we were definitely the "haves" and Germany and Italy the "have-nots." If they played their cards wisely it didn't matter very much whether they felt they could trust the Axis leaders or not; by putting forward sound proposals of peace they would be successful, but there was not the slightest possibility of peace so long as people threatened them with humiliation such as we would never stand. All this talk of the re-education of the Axis countries by an army of school teachers was mere "bunk." But they could have a system of inspection whereby representatives could watch that the peace terms were carried out. He did not expect that the United States of America wanted to police Europe after the war any more than we should. These rights of inspection followed with a fair share of the world's goods would do much to solve the problem. The moment they got bad reports they could use the machine of propaganda in a practical way and they would find the people themselves would not stand for their leaders' backsliding and placing them in danger of losing their supplies.

He was not by any means suggesting a one-sided disarmament, but they must have common sense and fairmindedness. They could mobilise the important factors of psychology. To get a policy which would work there would have to be sacrifice on both sides. They had also to break the tyranny of big finance. There were varying opinions as to whether peace should be negotiated when we were having setbacks or when we were on the move. Some people said that in the former the Axis would think we were afraid, and when we were winning why should we bother about a negotiated peace. But it was his opinion they should negotiate when their fortunes were on the up-grade.

Continuing, the Duke said some people may feel inspired to return to true religion by being in contact with God, but he felt no new evangelistic effect would cut much ice. The longer war went on the harder would be the peace. They must have fair play toward their opponents and one could not judge a man until one had tested him. God judged people not by what they were but by the use they made of the opportunities afforded them.

The Chairman expressed cordial thanks to the Duke, who, in reply, said he appreciated the welcome he had been given and also the courteous way in which he had been questioned. And he wished to thank especially the members of the Forces who had shown outstanding forbearance.

This above report is abridged from the "Guardian."

"The Peace News" (June 25) account of the meetings reads somewhat differently and merits reproduction, even where repeating some point:

Presiding, Mr. Hudson said it was because he resented the wickedness of war that he was willing, as was the Duke of Bedford, to argue and reason anywhere in favour of some better policy then we were pursuing now. We were conducting the war not to fight Nazism in Germany but to impose it here. We ought to insist on the Labour Party, Churchill, and Roosevelt telling us precisely what it was they expected to get at the end of the war.

The Duke said we should intimate to the Axis countries that we were prepared to negotiate a just peace on the basis of the Golden Rule.

We should suggest peace be concluded on the basis that, for the first time in the world's history, the vast economic resources of the world were to be fully developed without financial hindrance; and shared out, regardless of political considerations, according to the needs of the nations. Wealthier nations would help poorer nations, if need be, by actual gifts of goods.

To people who said, "We can't trust the Nazis" his reply was: "If you play your cards well it doesn't matter two hoots whether you trust them or not; their own people will see that they accept good, equitable peace terms."

The suggestion that we should police Germany after the war and re-educate her children was bunkum (applause).

In our peace terms we must tell the Axis that there would be a fairer sharing of the world's resources, no military domination, and a fairer financial system. Only by a real living communion and co-operation with God could the world's problems be solved.

The Duke, answering questions, gave chapter and verse for each reply. The audience, fairly equally pacifist and war-supporting, were clearly impressed and even enthusiastic about the meeting.

Announcing this meeting, and the Duke of Bedford's Sunday meeting following, the "Peace News," for June 18, published an interesting and almost amusing item under the caption, "Real Brotherhood" from a Morecambe correspondent. The latter wrote:

Lancaster Brotherhood, very largely war-supporting and non-pacifist, have generously and most tolerantly handed over the complete organisation and ordering of their meeting, at Lancaster Centenary Church, at 3 p.m. on Sunday (the day after the public meeting) to the local P.P.U. and the Duke of Bedford will speak to the Brotherhood.

Our President, Arthur Knowles, will preside, and Tom Rhodes (who recently served three months—imposed by the J.P. President of the Brotherhood—for refusing to register for fire-watching) will read the lesson: Luke 6, 27-28.

Quite a study in brotherhood! Almost a democratic cynicism.

DUKE'S C.O. SPEECH
New Zealand Commentary

The Duke of Bedford's speech in the House of Lords on March 2 last was reported and commented on widely in the New Zealand press. Resentment was expressed at the Duke's reference to the harsh conditions prevailing in New Zealand. The news-summary of the views expressed by the Duke of Bedford, Lord Ponsonby, and the Bishop of Birmingham (Dr. Barnes) were fair. Reports appeared in the "Wellington Evening Post," and the "Auckland Star," and other evening journals on March 3 and in "Dominion," Wellington, the "Otago Daily Times," and other New Zealand daily papers the following day.

"Dominion" published an editorial on the Duke's speech, side by side with its news report, in the course of which it argued, somewhat absurdly:

Frequently in references made to men kept in detention in this country because of their refusal to give military service, misleading use is made of the term "conscientious objectors." Such use of this term causes misunderstanding, as may be seen in a cable message, published this morning, which reports the Duke of Bedford as having stated in the House of Lords, during a discussion of the conscientious objection problem in Britain, that "the position is even harsher in New Zealand where about 700 conscientious objectors have been imprisoned or placed under detention for periods of two years." This, of course, is not the case. These men who have been imprisoned for brief terms, and afterwards placed in detention camps, have been dealt with thus because they are military defaulters. Their claims to genuine conscientious objection were examined by tribunals appointed for the purpose, and rejected. They refused to accept the rulings, defaulted in their consequent obligations, and—very rightly—have been deprived of their liberty. Conscientious objectors, accepted by the tribunals as such, are enjoying full freedom of wartime citizenship—a position, incidentally, which many people regard with strong disapproval. There will be still stronger disapproval of the tendency, which is creeping into public utterances, to look upon detained men as martyrs to their conscience. They are defaulters and, as such, are receiving treatment of peculiar leniency.

The idea that a man ceases from being a genuine conscientious objector because a Tribunal has rejected his claim is both legal and moral nonsense. Even the National Service Acts reject this idea. The 1939 Act has special clauses protecting the C.O. who finds himself in this position and the 1941 Act extends the protection. Hence the contention is not even officially or statutorily recognised as sound in law or in fact. Nor was it so recognised in 1916, under the conscription acts of the first world war.

Mr. Lowry (Government, Otaki) referred to the Duke of Bedford's speech, in the House of Representatives, Wellington, when he questioned Mr. Mason, the Minister of Justice. The Minister said:

The position in New Zealand is that an appeal system has been established in which any reservist refusing military service on the grounds of conscientious objection may place his case before a competent tribunal. Many conscientious objectors have succeeded in their appeals and have been released from military obligations or are engaged in non-combatant duties. Approximately 650 persons have failed to convince the appeal boards of the genuineness of their conscientious objections, and others have not taken the trouble to appear before the boards. They have since defaulted in their military obligations and by magisterial direction have been placed in detention for the duration of the war or such time as they continue their refusal to serve."

Mr. Mason, answering a further question, explained that defaulters in the camps were required to engage in general farming pursuits, flax and vegetable cultivation and production, forest thinning and pruning and the breaking in of the land. It was deemed advisable to use the services of defaulters on outside work.

Duke's "Mixed" Impressions of Miner's Houses

"In my opinion it is a disgrace to any civilised country that that sort of thing should be allowed."

The Duke of Bedford made this statement to "The Glasgow Herald" recently, at a press interview in Glasgow, at the close of his two-day investigation into housing and social onditions of miners in Lanarkshire. He was speaking about what he saw of men living under some of the old housing conditions.

"My impressions were very mixed," the Duke said. "The new housing estates that were finished before the war were very good indeed, and I was very favourably impressed."

Asked if he met with any very bad examples of large families living in small houses, he replied—"I went into one house in a miners' row. There were two or three young children and a man and wife living in one small room, and there was, I think, no water laid on, and only one lavatory and one adequate washhouse for several houses.

"There was another one, in a tenement building. The family was of seven or eight, and they had two rooms, wretched dirty places, where they had a sort of water tap in one room—which the other had not. But the place was very dirty, the windows were broken, the walls were all falling to pieces, and it was completely unfit to live in."

Replying to a question about the purpose of his visit, the Duke said that he simply came to get some first-hand knowledge of housing conditions.

"I may possibly raise the matter in the House of Lords some time," he said. "It may be desirable to draw attention to these things, even if the Government can do nothing. Obviously, in war-time you cannot have anything like the ordinary peace-time housing programme. I don't think housing should stop completely. If the Government insists on going on with the war indefinitely, there should be a small attempt at carrying on with housing programmes."

The Duke stated that he had originally made arrangements to live with a miner, to get a closer view of social conditions. The arrangement, however, had to be cancelled. "It was purely by accident that I did not stay with a miner," he said.

The Duke said he was not particularly interested in production committees when he was asked if he supported them. He knew little about them. When their functions were explained, he said that he was against them in that they helped in the prosecution of the war; but he approved of them if they eased a coal shortage among the people.

SOUTH PLACE

A STORY OF HERESY, PROGRESS, AND CULTURE.

In 1893 Moncure D. Conway, M.A., invited public attention to one hundred years of labour and vicissitude of South Place Ethical Society in his famous "Centenary History" of the Society. The author had delivered four discourses on the subject. But as his research caused him to dig out the Society's up to then unpublished story, from its manuscript archives, old magazines and pamphlets, and the memory of aged persons with whom he conversed, he felt that the record might claim the interest of a larger public. The historic sense, he said, could not fail to recognise the picturesque, and to some extent representative, relation of the Society to the tremendous events amid which it was born, and find in its conservative radicalism, unbroken by any incitement of violence or iconoclastic insanity, maintenance, in its modest sphere, of the healthier traditions of English progress. From the victorious American Revolution came the torch that kindled the revolution in Europe; from it also came the lamp which an American, who in youth had seen General Washington besieging Boston, brought to the little chapel in London, where it continued to burn, after the revolutionary torch was quenched seemingly in blood.

It would be a mistake to suppose that in the wayfarer from New England, Elhanan Winchester, or in those who with him founded the Society, there was any consciousness of their relationship to the revolutionary era. Winchester was not a Winstanley and he did not realise the full social economic import of Universalism. He was a Scriptural enthusiast of a new gospel—the ultimate salvation of all mankind in a future world. In France, maddened, by the invading league of despots, hurling at them the head of a king, Elhanan Winchester heard only the apocalyptic trumpet and recognised its prophesied "Woes." Yet in his doctrine of universal redemption there was an essential spirit and force of humanity which, after the pattern of a new heaven, must inevitably shape the vision of a new earth. Even in the world whose millennial consummation seemed at hand, the London "Philadelphians," as Winchester's friends called themselves, wished to clear away African slavery, and inhuman punishments, and penal statutes against religious liberty. Even amid their raptures, in view of a celestial paradise enjoyed by all, began unconsciously their pilgrimage from the world to come to that which now is. They glimpsed a little of Winstanley's vision but developed their message differently.

These generalizations find little place in Conway's "History." The occasion appeared to him one rather for the recovery of interesting details, illustrating the interior life of an unorthodox Society of educated people, animated by a comprehensive principle of religious liberty, at successive stages of struggle and progress; and also casting some fresh light on individual characters, and on their services to each just cause as it arose, and each new truth. This appeared to him the most important contribution that the South Place archives could make to the yet unwritten religious and cultural philosophic history of England.

The South Place Society, in its origin, was made up of waifs and strays of many sects, united only by an enthusiasm for the Universal Love which consumed sectarianism. It has remained unsectarian. It has never possessed any denominational trade-mark to stamp on its own productions. The story, so briefly and so ably told by Conway is that of a religious Society founded at a time of extreme degeneration, when government mainly consisted in "lynching" the Liberals, burning in effigy the author of the "Right of Man," and imprisoning those who circulated such works; when Edmund Burke was insisting on the penal statutes for even moderate religious heresies; when Charles James Fox declared the English Constitution cut up by the roots, and obedience to such "despotism" no longer "a question of moral obligation and duty, but of prudence": of a Society which, animated by a devout enthusiasm of humanity, maintained steadfastly, and by purely moral and intellectual weapons, under four successive English monarchs, against a persistent attack, principles that are now the air we breathe. Its own interests as a Society were subordinated to the rights of those whose views it did not share, mainly indeed its antagonists—Catholics, Jews, Deists, Atheists. During that long period, from the English Reign of Terror to the Restoration of the Constitution, members of the Society, men and women alike sharing equally in its struggles and responsibilities, lived fairly happy lives, in active co-operation with social reformist and practical enterprises of the community, in close relationship with the literary and artistic world around them. In Harriet Martineau's "Five Years of Youth, or Sense and Sentiment," whose characters are Benjamin Flower and his family; in letters and writings of Hazlitt, Carlyle, Mill, Leigh Hunt, and Browning—to mention only some of W. J. Fox's circle—glimpses are given into the intimate life of the South Place Society. Its history, therefore, belongs not to South Place only, but to the general world.

In gathering the history from many sources, not aided much by any book, Moncure Conway spared himself, and indeed his friends, no pains to secure accuracy; and he expressed especial gratitude to Mrs. Eliza Bridell Fox (daughter of the Society's most eminent minister) for her generous and unwearied assistance.

Moncure Conway claimed no literal continuity with the particular doctrines of his predecessors, but believed that their spirit animated the changes he developed. Under its successive names, adopted or given—"Philadelphians," "Universalists," "Society of Religious Dissenters," "South Place Unitarian Society," "The South Place Society," "The Free Religious Society," "The South Place Ethical Society"—is traceable a constant endeavour to study carefully, and keep abreast of, the growing knowledge of the world, at whatever cost to traditional prejudices or opinions; to do this in a spirit of tolerance and liberalism no less than of radicalism and sincerity. As the Society grew from no theological creed, and never adopted any opinion that could fetter its members, the religious or philosophical theories taught in it necessarily varied with the teachers it invited or employed; but beneath these variations there has been developed the spirit of human religion; potential in its first minister's Universalism, and clearly defined and expressed in Moncure Conway's long and useful record of service. During and since Conway's time, the Society possessed and has possessed no machinery of propagandism for any particular tenets. For those who knock, its doors have been and are open.

Elhanan Winchester, founder of the South Place Ethical Society, was a true forerunner of Channing, Emerson, and Theodore Parker in the United States of America, and of William Johnson Fox in England. Born September 30, 1751, near Boston, Massachusetts, eldest son of a mechanic who named his fifteen children out of the Bible (boys out of the Old, girls out of the New Testament), and brought them up as solemn citizens of ancient Judea. Elhanan was given only a fair common school education, and taught himself Hebrew, Greek, Latin and French. He was old at twenty, became a rigid Calvanist preacher; summoning the elect—the already saved—but offering no hope to the rest of mankind. In his travels he casually met a young lady, who answered that all must be saved; she "beheld an infite fulness in Christ for all mankind." He interrupted her with denials and texts, silenced her, passed on his way; but her one sentence carried his destiny with it. He never saw her again, he never knew her name or abode; he carried to the end of life a hurt that he could not tell her that he had discovered his error and her truth. Her soft word, a little seed cast on Puritan rock, took root, crumbled the rock into a robust tree of faith (of course called heresy), whose fruitful slips were planted in various parts of America and England. One of those slips is represented to-day in the hundred and fifty years of the South Place Society; the seed of it was planted by a maiden in the depths of New England, nearly two hundred years ago. She lived and died, dreaming not that the still small voice of her spirit would be heard in distant lands, would animate leaders of men; or that her words, two centuries later, would be reminding countless men and women of the immeasurable influence of the true word spoken in fit season, in obscurity.

Elhanan (signifying "God-given") made good his name. He travelled through the United States and then through England, publishing his new gospel, that all mankind would be saved. The ranters and revivalists raged against a doctrine ruinous to their whole stock—terrorism. Huntington S.S.—Sinner Saved—printed his "Advocates for Devils refuted." It was a common belief, even among Unitarians, that it might be dangerous to mitigate the fears of mankind, and for other reasons they hardly ventured sympathy with Winchester. When he came to England (1787) no Unitarian assembly heard his eloquent voice. Unitarianism was still under penal laws, and, though they were not enforced, Unitarian ministers had to be cautious. These laws had not anticipated Universalism, and Winchester did not assume anti-Trinitarian ground. But in private, he was received well by Priestley, Price, and some others. He also met John Wesley, then in extreme age, and good evidence is given in Winchester's biography that Wesley strongly inclined to the Universalist doctrine. Winchester's biography is by E. M. Stone (1836). The biography (a sort of Universalist tract) is in the British Museum Library, and contains a portrait, showing Winchester to have been a commandkind of man, something like Washington, who once wrote him a friendly letter. He had been the leading Baptist preacher in Philadelphia, but lost his place by adopting Universalism.

Winchester reached London, September 21, 1787, and preached in Blackfields (Southwark); in Moorfields; in a schoolroom in Store Street (Tottenham Court Road); at "Mr. Thwait's chapel, Southwark"; and for a year in Petticoat Lane, where the Baptists met in an ancient church, originally Catholic. Next he had a connection with Glasshouse Yard Chapel (whose foundations were traceable a century later under a paperhanging factory); and in the evenings he preached at a Baptist Chapel in Worship Street, which afterwards became Unitarian.

Winchester was not much interested by Wesley's preaching, but loved the man. John Wesley died March 2, 1791, and on the 10th, the day after his burial, Winchester preached a funeral sermon in his honour. Wesley died in his 88th year, and his critics declared that he had "passed into the lake of fire." Winchester rebuked them for their want of charity, and declared that they had their religion to seek. Outside of Wesley's own connection, Winchester's was the only memorial service in his honour.

On the 12th of October, 1792, the tercentenary of Columbus' landing in the New World, Winchester delivered an oration, apparently by request of his countrymen in London. It was printed along with a biographical sketch of George Washington, and also a descriptive plan of the unbuilt city of Washington. The oration concludes with a glowing prophecy:

I look through and beyond every yet peopled region of the New World, and behold period still brightening upon period. Where one continuous depth of gloomy wilderness now shuts out even the beams of day, I see new states and empires, new seats of wisdom and knowledge, new religious domes, spreading around. In places now untrod by any but savage beasts, or men as savage as they, I hear the voices of happy labour, and behold beautiful cities rising to view. Lo, in this happy picture, I behold the native Indian exulting in the works of peace and civilisation. . . . I hear the praises of my Creator sung upon the banks of those rivers unknown so long. Behold the delightful prospect! See the silver and gold of America employed in the service of the Lord of the whole earth! See slavery, with all its train of attendant evils, abolished! See a communication opened through the whole continent, from North to South, and from East to West, through a most fruitful country!

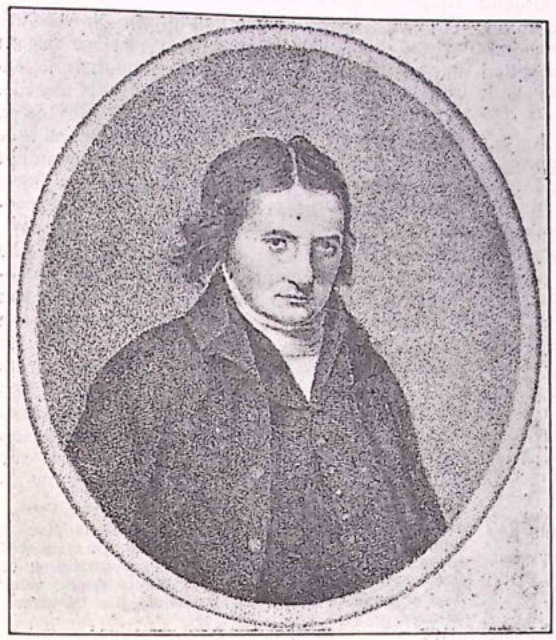
Winchester's congregations outgrew their chapels, they also outgrew some of their Baptist notions. The dissenters of various shades who gathered around the American prophet built or purchased for him the Parliament Court Chapel, Artillery Lane. There the Society was organised, February 14, 1793.

Elhanan's pet aversion was Hell. He did not preach Trinitarianism, but he never assailed it. He was content to preach Universal Salvation. He wrote an earnest but mild and non-abusive reply to Thomas Paine, and would have grieved to think that one day his successor would defend Paine's principles and write Paine's biography.

Winchester was a youth at Boston when Washington raised an English flag against un-English despotism; he had learned the fate of all tyranny, whether on earth or in heaven; he had never forgotten that gentle protest of the maiden's heart against the vindictiveness he once worshipped. The fire kindled in Parliament Court was from a spark of the great human insurrection against deified inhumanity. The new society was named "The Philadelphians," that is, "loving brothers," or "brotherly lovers." In the Book of Revelations the Spirit saith to the Church in Philadelphia, "I have set before thee an open door which none can shut." Winchester wrote to his friend, Dr. Benjamin Rush, in the city of Philadelphia, that in England "many doors are opened (i.e. for the doctrine of universal restoration), especially among the Baptists and Presbyterians."

Winchester preached in many towns and cities. He arraigned the slave trade. He denounced capital punishment. He instituted a true Ethical Society. After nearly seven years of such service in England, he was compelled by domestic troubles to return to America (May 1794). Here he died at Hartford, Connecticut, April 18, 1797.

William Vidler, the second minister of the Society, was Winchester's first ministerial convert. He was a stonemason in Battle, Sussex, and incurred the anger of his father



EDWARD WM. VIDLER
1758—1816

Winchester's successor, who developed Universalism into a broad Humanist Unitarism, and prepared the way for complete Ethical Humanism. Considered all mankind one family equally interested in the love of a common Father. Paved the way for William Johnson Fox and Moncure Conway and to-day's Radical Humanists.

(also a stonemason) by inclining to dissent. Miss Sweetingham, whom he afterwards married, persuaded him to hear a sermon from Rev. George Gilbert in her father's house, and this ended in immersion (1780), and in him becoming a Baptist preacher in Battle, in his twentieth year. In 1787 he was supporting a wife and five children on a salary of £50, and wrote a pathetic prayer to God for help, which he believed was answered by his call to Northiam, which paid more. In 1784 an entry in his diary discloses doubts concerning the godhead of Christ and the eternity of hell. Elhanan Winchester preached at Battle in 1792, and on the last Sunday of that year Mr. Vidler announced his conversion to Universalism. His congregation went with him, and in 1793 they all were excommunicated formally at Chatham, the presiding elder expressing to Vidler, who was present, a wish "that the hell he advocated might be his portion." After Winchester's departure for America, Vidler was invited to Parliament Court, where his first sermon was given, Feb. 9, 1794. He still preached part of each year at Battle.

In 1793, Thomas Paine, author of "The Rights of Man," was burnt in effigy at Battle. The mob stopped at the doors of prominent dissenters, crying "No Paine!" When they shouted at Vidler's door he stepped out and congratulated them on the ingenuity shown in their effigy. They demanded whether he was for Paine, "No, my lads," said he "be assured I have no liking for pain; I am for ease." The mob laughed, gave him three cheers, and passed on.

Vidler edited (1797-1801) a monthly periodical, "The Universalist Miscellany, or Philanthropist's Museum. Intended chiefly as an Antidote against the Anti-Christian Doctrine of Endless Misery." Except for the belief concerning hell, he did not assail orthodoxy, but his magazine shows signs of misgiving concerning the Atonement.

Vidler held on to the Trinity until 1802. When he criticised that doctrine as unscriptural, his adherents began to leave him; and the congregation was so reduced that he hardly had any salary at all. Denial of the Trinity cost his Society £320 per annum. He tried to make something selling books. While the Society was flourishing, the minister had ordered an organ (1801), and not having raised enough to pay for it, he had pledged his salary for the remainder (£50). But the salary left as Unitarianism entered (from £250 was reduced to £30), and it was only by his disinterested fidelity that the Society was saved from dissolution. Two gentlemen, Wood and Andrews, paid for the organ. By the help of the Rev. Robert Aspland, of the New Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, the magazine was revived in 1802, under the title of "The Universal Theological Magazine." The Society marched on bravely, with its invincible and earnest minister.

Curiously enough, the Baptist notion of a "chosen people" survived at Parliament Court the Universalist and Unitarian conversions, holding its traditional exclusiveness at the Communion table. Only in 1808 did our Philadelphians awaken to a perception that their door was not yet wide open. On October 6 they resolved "that, instead of the former mode of close communion (so called), an open communion of all the congregation be adopted in future."

Having thus reached the Philadelphian substance, they gave up the name. There had been a Society within the Society, called "the Church," which seems to have communicated at a different time, and to have seceded about the time when the open Communion was adopted. Vidler's Society applied for admission to the Assembly of General Baptists, and was admitted by a small majority; but this caused a division in that Assembly. The Baptist connection lasted long after the Society had become actively associated with the Unitarian body.

South Place was animated by a missionary spirit, and permitted its minister to preach in other places. In 1812, Vidler founded the Unitarian Church in Reading, remaining there five months. Among South Place records is a filial and grateful letter from the Reading Church to Vidler, saying they are "proud to acknowledge that their existence as Unitarians was owing to your instrumentality"; and the South Place Society wrote to Reading, saying of Vidler:

"His boldness and the sacrifices he has made in support of the truth as it is in Jesus, will, we trust, be had in everlasting remembrance."

Vidler was interested in public and philanthropic matters, and not theology alone. So early as 1801 he wrote this paragraph in his magazine concerning the neglected subject of cruelty to animals:

There are several species of barbarity in this CHRISTIAN country which reflect dishonour on our national character. Throwing at cocks, we believe, is pretty generally disused since our moral mentor, Addison, so compassionately pleaded their cause in one of the papers of the "Spectator"; but cock-fighting and bull-baiting yet continue; and we fear that the practice of pinning the cockchaffer among children is yet frequent. Parents and tutors of youth ought to discourage anything of the kind; from cruelty to animals the transition is very natural to cruelty to our own species.

He includes the pleasures of the chase under his ban, a Radicalism on which no one had previously ventured.

Vidler was soft-hearted, and once pawned his watch to help a poor man named Javel, who sometimes appeared in his chapel. But Javel was a footpad, and one night attempted to rob Vidler in Bethnal Green. Later on, Javel was executed at Chelmsford.

In 1810, the South Place Society discarded Winchester's and adopted Aspland's (Unitarian) collection.

Vidler died August 23, 1816, and was buried at the Unitarian Chapel at Hackney five days later. On being offered payment for the ground, the Hackney committee declined it, saying that they "considered it an honour that they should have his ashes deposited" with them.

Vidler was the first preacher to say a word in defence of Judas. He retranslated the Greek, to show that Judas did not hang himself, but "departing, was strangled." He declared that Judas was strangled with grief. He described how this happened, in July, 1798, in the public theatre in Liverpool, to Jack Palmer, the comedian, who fell dead while playing the title role in The Stranger. Vidler showed that the idea of Judas was not covetousness, but really to advance the cause of Jesus. This theme has been developed since by other writers in the form of historical romance.

Vidler developed this theme in 1799, while he was still a Trinitarian. It is one of the boldest suggestions of that intimidated time. And indeed, in that miserable period following Paine's "Age of Reason," when freethinkers were often imprisoned, and some Unitarians were swearing like St. Peter in denial of religious liberty, Vidler maintained that principle with fidelity; he exercised it steadfastly, progressing to larger views and bolder utterances to the day of his death.

RELIGION, EDUCATION AND POLITICS

Australian "Witch Hunt" 1943.

The Christchurch, New Zealand, "Star-Sun," for April 10, 1943, publishes an interesting report from its Sydney, Australia, correspondent, dated April 7.

A big argument was caused in Sydney during the previous week-end by remarks concerning religion and education delivered at the New Education Fellowship by Professor John Anderson, Professor of Philosophy at Sydney University. Declaring that teachers should resent the introduction of religion into the curriculum, Professor Anderson stated:

Religious doctrines are a direct attack and assault upon a child's commonsense. When religious instruction is combined with other instruction the effect can only be one of uncertainty. The child either becomes credulous, without a proper appreciation of evidence, or he becomes cynical and given to humbug. In any case, religious instruction prevents the child from becoming a solid critical thinker. If a child is forced to swallow doctrines of a religious nature, it will undermine his understanding of things in general.

The teaching of religion has an important political character, because it promotes an extension of credulity, which is a very desirable thing from the point of view of the ruling order. It spreads the habit of submission, which induces people to accept authority without questioning.

The New South Wales Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cahill), whose office confers on him no right to interfere with questions of education, said he would use his influence to ensure that this man, holding a position in a State-subsidised university, is not allowed to affront public opinion.

To this impertinence, Professor Anderson replied boldly and clearly:

I have before now combated the view that in making grants to the university the State purchases the opinions of university teachers. It is the business of a university to see that all views, orthodox and unorthodox, get a hearing, and are critically considered. I may add that it is peculiarly the business of a philosopher "to affront public opinion," or, as Shaw has it "to call the righteous to repentance."

In reply to a further question, the Professor said simply and directly: "Yes, I am an Atheist."

The matter was debated in the New South Wales Parliament on April 6, on an urgent motion by the Rev. D. P. Macdonald, Independent Member for Mosman. Before his election to Parliament, Macdonald was Presbyterian minister at Mosman. One would not conclude from this man's speech he could be independent member for anywhere, for the man is a poor, pettifogging sectarian dogmatist and ignoramus, the type of Pharisee who in other days applauded the execution of Jesus and the stoning of the prophets. His spiritual ancestors danced with joy at Smithfield when Bartholemew Legate was burnt and at Geneva when Servetus was martyred. Macdonald is in direct line of descent from the murderers of Bruno and the theological savages who hunted, tortured, and burned at slow fires witches, the while they gloated in righteous sadism. On the motion of this creature, the stupid New South Wales Parliament unanimously carried the following resolution:

That Professor Anderson's statements are a travesty of the Christian religion, and are calculated to undermine the principles of the constitution of the Christian State. That this House should bring the statements under the notice of the University Senate.

Of course, training to bomb, rejoicing in war, upholding racial discrimination, are not traversies of the Christian religion, or of the brotherhood teachings of Jesus! Only Professor Anderson's statements against God, and the idea of God, and the authority of the Church, and the principle of dull unquestioning obedience and errors in a democratic community! Macdonald believes that his resolution is democracy! This Gestapo theologian and "educationist" commands a unanimous vote. What mockery! And what outrage ! !

Creature Macdonald, Presbyterian persecutor, patriot, democrat, and war-monger, told the House in his best priestly fashion:

THE RECOGNITION OF ALMIGHTY GOD IS DEFINITELY LAID DOWN IN THE COMMONWEALTH CONSTITUTION. ANY REMARKS SUBVERSIVE OF OUR CHRISTIAN CONSTITUTION DEMAND REPUDIATION OF THIS HOUSE.

The Opposition Leader (Mr. Mair) and the Country Party Leader (Mr. Bruxner) also bitterly attacked Professor Anderson.

Replying to these political charlatans, who should be chased from public life in the name of civic decency and every principle of patriotism, by Christian and Freethinker, Militarist and Anti-Militarist, alike, Professor Anderson told a press reporter on April 6:

It was a pitiful performance, unworthy of the pettiest rural council. It was motivated by prejudice and the spirit of repression. This is the body that some think should have greater control over education. It has no conception of the spirit and conditions of education.

Most contemptible of all are the sentiments of Mr. Bruxner. With the whole apparatus of orthodoxy on his side, he fears the influence of one man. Nothing better could be expected of the U.A.P. and U.C.P. It is extremely regrettable that Labour should cringe before the religious vote, and go back on the principle of freedom of discussion.

Professor Anderson is right and his opponents are pitful creatures.

We congratulate our contemporary, the "Daily Telegraph" of Sydney, for the following leader, which it published on April 7:

A WITCH HUNT IN 1943 A.D.—

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION HAS NEVER BEEN SO ELOQUENT AS WHEN HE ASKED FOR THE SACKING OF THIS PROFESSOR. SOME MAY WONDER WHY, IN THE CAUSE OF CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES, MR. MAIR WAS SO MUCH LESS ELOQUENT, WHEN IN OFFICE AND SINCE, ABOUT THE SURELY EQUAL ENORMITY OF SLUMS.

But the point at issue is whether in New South Wales a man may still speak what is in his mind, even though every other man in the community may disagree with him. Professor Anderson expressed an opinion. Opinions are a subject for debate. If they are false opinions, debate will demolish them. That, anyway, is the theory of democracy, which substitutes for the rack of the Inquisition, the concentration camp and the economic terrorisation of the totalitarian State, the appeal to reason.

When teachers are afraid to open their mouths for fear of offending orthodoxy, and orthodoxy is defined by the clique of politicians who happen to have a majority at the moment, we will certainly bid a lasting farewell to freedom—of speech, thought, action and religion as well.

We understand that Professor Anderson was asked to submit a full account of his statement to the Sydney University Senate.

CIVIL DEFENCE

Cowdenbeath "Conchie" Jailed.

On Tuesday, May 4, 1943, our Rutherglen comrade, Thomas Hyslop, at that time working as a chemist and druggist in Cowdenbeath, and residing c/o Galloway, 2 George Street, Cowdenbeath, was charged at the Dunfermline Sheriff Court, before Sheriff MacLean, that, being conditionally registered as a conscientious objector on condition that he undertook Civil Defence duty, during the period between July 1, 1942, and March 31, 1943, he failed to comply with the condition to undertake any part-time Civil Defence duty.

Accused told the Court that Civil Defence was part of war service and he objected to that on reasons of conscience.

Mr. R. J. Waugh (Procurator Fiscal) said in June and July last year accused was before both a local and an Appeals Tribunal and exempted from military service on condition that he would do part-time work. He was asked to take up part-time work with a First Aid party in Cowdenbeath and had refused to do that, stating that the only thing he was going to do was dispensing work. He had also refused fire-watching duty.

"Apparently he just wants to do work he chooses for himself," the Fiscal added.

Sheriff (to accused):

You were registered as a conscientious objector subject to special conditions and one of the conditions was you were to do part-time Civil Defence duty. You were told to do fire-watch and you refused to do that.

Accused said he appeared before an Appeals Tribunal in the High Court at Edinburgh, and when asked by Lord Elphinstone, the chairman, what he was prepared to do he said he was prepared to any kind of work that had no connection with war. He stated quite definitely he was not prepared to do any war service.

Verbally, that was accepted by the Court, but when the decision was given to me in writing it said I was to do part-time Civil Defence. Of course, that was not in keeping with the tone of the actual conversation that took place in Court, because they agreed to accept what I said. . . .

Passing sentence, the Sheriff said:

You have, because of your religious views and conscientious objector views, got very special privileges which very few people in the country have got. You got them on those conditions, and you knew the conditions quite well, and yet you have not observed them. You have let the country down and let your brethren down. You are not prepared even to protect the women and children of this country against the dangers of fire.

The Procurator Fiscal and the Sheriff are both supposed to have legally trained minds. The remarks of both were irrelevant and had no right to be made. When will legal civil servants, as fiscals are, and Sheriffs understand the nature of judicial functions and learn to discharge them. An abuse of function is a public error and should be censured.

"Unconditional Surrender"

The Meeting for Sufferings of the Society of Friends, held 7th of Fifth Month, 1943, passed the following minute:

This Meeting desires to express its conviction that the demand for "unconditional surrender" by Germany, Italy and Japan" can only prolong the war. There is still a great need for the Allied Governments to put forward concrete terms on which they would be prepared to negotiate with the peoples of the Axis countries. These terms should be based on the three essentials: reasonable freedom, reconciliation, and co-operative service in the family of nations.

This Meeting unites wholeheartedly with the concern of the Peace Committee in this matter and desires to encourage it to publish a statement on the lines of the draft presented to this Meeting.

PROBLEMS OF THE PACIFIC

By A. Creech Jones.

(Reprinted from "Empire," for May, 1943)

[Our comrade A. Creech Jones, M.P., Chairman of the Fabian Colonial Bureau, was one of the British delegation to a recent international conference in Canada, organised by the Institute of Pacific Relations of New York. Representatives of about ten different countries attended. This article discusses some of the questions that were raised and summarises certain of the conclusions.—Ed.]

There is a tendency for Africa and the West Indies to dominate our discussions on colonial policy. The British collapse in the Far East awakened us to the fact that there are other large and important areas which have problems of no less complexity and perplexity. The British territories in South East Asia (and I exclude Burma from these figures) cover 134,000 square miles and a population of nearly 7 millions, while those in the Western Pacific cover 24,500 square miles and over 400,000 people. These dependencies offer to us to-day many and varied difficulties. They are difficulties which must be understood and tackled before long. I mention only a few. What is the place of Hong Kong in a United China? What is to be the future of the Chartered Company which controls North Borneo? How shall we meet the demand for full self-government in Burma? How solve the social problem and the position of the Sultans in the Malay States?

Britain is not the only Imperial Power in the Pacific area. Both the Dutch and the French have responsibilities there for considerable territories and populations. The Portuguese have colonies there and the United States cannot terminate abruptly her interest in the Philippines. The American President has also given some guarantee about the integrity of the French Empire. In the shaping of policies for this area Russian opinion and Chinese claims are of great moment. In Malaya the opinion of these two powers cannot be ignored. It is already clear that even after the destruction of Japanese war power, social progress and prosperity are dependent on the subordination of imperial, national and racial interests to a common purpose.

That is undoubtedly the prevailing view of the American people at present. A distinguished Republican submitted to the recent Pacific Conference in Canada a view which was little disputed by other Americans present. It is worth recording:

There seems to exist throughout Asia a conflict of interest between those people of the West who wish to exploit these regions primarily for their own profit and those who would develop then primarily for their own good . . . the American people will not permit their government to be an agent in the restoration of the old order in Asia . . . American policy cannot be formulated or forecast until Britain speaks clearly . . . if there is to be a return to the old way even under new names Americans are likely to be very cautious as to the commitments they will make . . . the resumption by Britain of its pre-war status (in Malaya for instance) unaccompanied by evidence that the new administration would be more philanthropic and less exploitive, would seem to Americans an unsatisfactory solution. . . . The American soldier, by and large, is out to crush the Axis . . . but he does not understand that he is fighting to restore any European colonial power its lost position in Asia. . . .

America will in all probability play a part in maintaining security, but she will not co-operate in placing imperial domination over any people nor in restoring the old order in Asia; she will participate internationally on terms consistent with the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms. But even in this ragard Americans must inevitably qualify their views by reservations about their constitution.

INTERNATIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES

It was one of the aims of the recent Pacific Conference in Canada to examine the emerging problems of the Pacific area, to find the objectives of the powers and peoples in that zone and see what common basis existed and was necessary for their co-operation in the days ahead. Mr. Churchill has talked of a Council of Asia. India and China will undoubtedly play a dominant part in such a Council, but the guarantors of a Far Eastern Settlement must be Russia and China on land, Britain and America at sea. The Dutch and the Dominions must also carry greater responsibilities for the peace of the southern Pacific. Moreover, an enduring peace depends not only on common objectives in Asia and the Pacific and strategic co-operation among the Powers, but also on the recognition of national and racial rights and the establishment of conditions of economic development and social wellbeing.

Lord Hailey in approaching this problem at the Conference stated on behalf of the British members present the following ideas:

I suggest that there should be created a Council for the Pacific Zone, consisting of the representatives of the sovereign powers concerned. It would have a double function. It would, in the first place, be the local agency of whatever organisation may be established by the United Nations for safeguarding the peace of Asia in common with other parts of the world. The preservation of peace demands not merely the provision of air, naval and military forces, but of a wide range of civil activities ancillary to them. These civil activities would be the direct charge of the Pacific Zone Council.

Its second function would be to secure, by joint consulation and by co-operative action, a common policy, so far as may be, in the economic development and of the tariff and customs arrangements within this Zone. It would maintain a technical staff, available for advising the administrations concerned on health, agriculture, economic or cultural problems. It would be the agency through which areas unable to finance their own development would obtain the assistance required. It would receive regular reports from the different national administrations in the area, and be empowered to require information and explanation from them. It would finally—and I desire to emphasize this point—be charged with the periodic review of the progress made in the promotion of self-governing institutions in the dependencies, and in the improvement of their standard of living.

A POLICY FOR SOUTH EAST ASIA

These ideas gathered strength as the Conference proceeded and resulted in a far-reaching creative effort to formulate a policy for the dependencies in South East Asia. This policy laid down that the main objective must be to secure at the earliest possible moment for each territory of colonial or dependent status conditions which will permit complete self-government. Colonial powers were not only trustees but they owed a moral obligation towards the rest of the world to account for their stewardship. This depended on the recognition of "third party interest," on international supervision and the introduction of "an intermediate authority." The surrender to some international authority of direct practical administrative power was rejected for many reasons. But some body representative of independent as well as colonial powers and of the indigenous peoples should be set up as early as possible to concern itself with the tempo of development of self-governing institutions and the liquidation of colonial rule and with general social and economic development. This international authority could suggest to the colonial power general lines of policy for the progress of self-government, should receive and publish regular periodic reports on political and social policy and progress thereon; could suggest lines of economic and social policy for securing the well-being of the people concerned and with its permanent staff advise and inspect and investigate reported grievances. But all this was conditioned by the fact that the power of the colonial trustee should not be divorced from responsibility.

I have not attempted to indicate any more than one part of the Conference's discussions. It was generally agreed that out of the United Nations must come a system begun in war, of co-operation on global lines for the purposes of security and economic and social advancement and that in particular regions international authority must assume through appropriate associations, responsibilities for securing the conditions essential for these purposes. The proposals formulated in the Conference will be discussed in all the United Nations and by the peoples in the Pacific Zone. It is for us to study them, remembering colonial as well as American opinion; to find accurate and satisfactory answers to the kind of question mentioned in the first paragraph of this article; to see whether in British colonial administration third party interest can be translated into genuine international and intercolonial collaboration, or whether the principle of accountability to some suitable international authority can be made acceptable by all the imperial powers. In the Pacific area it will not do only to defeat Japan or for Britain to take possession again and restore the regimes interruped by war. It will not do to restore the old authority to the Sultans in Malay, to neglect the beginnings of genuine local government, to reintroduce political discrimination on racial lines, to ignore the claims of those who permanently reside in the states and settlements. These are all negative policies. What matters more are our positive and constructive proposals for this complex area. It is for us to formulate them quickly.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Sir,—Your issue for June calls upon your readers to acquire The Labour Party's manifesto "The Communist Party and The War."

This is no ordinary manifesto, its political importance is world wide, its significance belongs to the province of political history and in view of our relationship with the Soviet Union wild and inconsidered allegations had to be eschewed. The high office of Secretary for State and Minister for Home Security is held by a powerful and respected member and executive of the Labour Party and it is only to be expected that he was consulted and approved of this remarkable manifesto, without, of course, suggesting that he used his official position as a Minister of The Crown with access to State papers and Security Police Dossiers to either prove or implement these charges against the C.P. Charges which are unambiguous and allow of no disputation as to their nature or implications.

Upon page 15 of this manifesto under the heading "Discord and Disunity Mean Political Death" is written. "Never in the history of British politics has any group calling itself a national party been guilty of such a shameful record of disloyalty to the nation, treachery to the working class and discredit to itself. That record was built by slavish obedience to an external superior authority (The Communist International)!! (My emphasis except for heading).

To overtly charge one's fellow countrymen with deliberate disloyalty to the nation and treachery to the working class and obedience to a foreign power is a charge none will make unless he is sure of his facts, it is a terrible allegation and one quite outside the province or ordinary political argumentation and heat of debate and this charge becomes the more powerful and deadly when it deliberately frees the British Union, I.F.L. and other 18B detainees of the charge it prefers against the C P., although I would rather not say Communist Party but "The Communist Executive."

Let us hope that ere long the Government will give that fact due weight and consideration and thus implement the Prime Minister's statement in the House in 1940 when he said "and as reports come to me I doubt very much whether there ever was a fifth column" and give recognition as Transport House has so tardily done to those 18B's who now wilt in Holloway, Brixton and Peel.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN P. DENNIS.

Bayswater, London, W., June 10.

Sir,—Apropos of Mr. Rhys Davies letter in the June issue of "The Word" re his remarks that the fundamental problem of the war was "What Caused Hitler?" In my opinion the question should be "What Caused Churchill?"

Yours faithfully,

ELIZABETH HILL.

Heathfield, June 22.

Dear Sir,—You publish this month an excellent pictorial comment by E. E. Briscoe on the lunacy and scoudrelism of war. Immediately below this, you actually call, surely in a moment of aberration, for a rally round the Imperialist Labour Party Executive. If any firm struggle is worth while in this madhouse of ours it should be directed against the insidious spirit of the Labour Party Bosses, a collection of cunning careerists and place hunters, rather than a handful of irresponsible clowns calling themselves Communists. The Labour guardians of Capitalist-Imperialism are really dangerous, as their works and actions clearly prove. They could have prevented this war, instead they demanded it. The "Communists" are merely amusing, adding a little to the gaiety of a naughty world. They at least had one brief period of telling the truth about the war. The Labour sycophants, along with their Tory allies, concealed the truth from the start and the same assortment of liars are still doing service to-day with their full approval and support. Every fulminating word you have written against the self-styled Communists on page 124, "Communist and Labour," could be said with equal force and more point against the Labour Imperialists, these smug climbers to the seats of power.

Yours sincerely,

V. WILSON.

Bredbury, June 7.

Dear Sir,—I can understand Mr. Braithwaite's difficulty and mental confusion.

All of us are educated upon two conflicting philosophies the effect of which is to render us mentally confused and unable to see the facts clearly or equate our theories with our experiences.

That is the "art of government;" to perplex us and cloud our judgment so that we assimilate "their" propaganda.

I believe there is only one cure for our financial troubles, and the determination with which orthodoxy has set out to kill, disparage and smother it should go a long way towards convincing seekers-after-truth that it is worth investigating. That this technique, formulae or base for money, as Mr. B. calls it, will give to every Britisher complete freedom—"the ability to accept or refuse"; as much economic security as industry can produce for them—everything "physically possible will be rendered financially possible."

Put in a few words the only base for money, credit, or tokens is real wealth.

If we have goods on our shelves priced at x pounds the obvious amount of money to have in circulation is x £'s. If not then create them free of debt or interest and distribute the balance either through the national dividend or by a price discount whereby the end is the same. If an earthquake results in a shortage of goods (prices) in comparison to the money available then reverse the price discount to that of price increase. Be accurate and when fishermen bring forth fish to sell at A £'s in the shops create and distribute A £'s as a dividend, or, again, cut prices of other commodities by that amount. Reverse the present Purchase Tax and we have the price discount. A private firm cuts wages when it introduces labour saving machinery and then increases the dividends, why shouldn't the nation do it?

If only people would give their attention to the subject of Social Credit they would find the key to all their problems, religious, economic, educational and the most vital of all, knowledge of oneself.

There is so much of use to the individual in this study that I hope you will some day allow its benefits to the propagated.

Yours sincerely,

AND. T. TEMPLETON.

Bearsden, 8/5/43.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I am writing to you on behalf of my friend, Tom Hyslop, whose home address is at Burnside, Rutherglen, although he works in Cowdenbeath.

To-day Tom was sentenced to six months imprisonment at Dunfermline Sheriff Court for failing to do Civil Defence duties, which as we know is entirely against his conscience and principle.

Tom Tyslop, like most of us who support "The Word," is fighting for freedom and liberty. Not the kind of freedom that Mr. Churchill speaks of but the proper kind, when a man does not have to play "yes man" to his so called government.

May you continue to publish your wonderful paper for it excells all other papers, especially the daily ones which contain lies and dope.

I remain, sincerely yours,

MAY ROBERTSON.

Cowdenbeath, May 3, 1943.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I was very pleased to read your editorial "Tunisia" in the June issue of "The Word" as I had previously understood you were opposed to a negotiated peace. Now you recognise that the present situation "offers the most favourable condition for a negotiated peace"; may I express the hope that you will give all possible support to the P.P.U. Armistice Campaign launched at the A.G.M.?

I regret that hitherto this vital matter has not been ventilated in the "Word" and would like to suggest, now the "campaign" is under weigh, that you should open its columns for discussion of this question.

As you so truly say, the great immediate need is for all Pacifists, Socialists and people of goodwill to unite in an effort to save the world another 1918 and after. Is it not clear that our opportunity is here? Let us all wholeheartedly support the P.P.U. Armistice Campaign and give new hope to untold millions.

With best wishes, yours sincerely,

G. J. BLIGH.

Stretford, June 14, 1943.

Dear Comrade,—Congratulations on the June edition of "The Word." I have persuaded several people to take it regularly.

The attack on the Communist Party was well-timed. They were complaining about threats to civil liberties at the time of the suppression of the "Daily Worker." Now their chief purpose seems to be to intern any individual who wishes to make use of his civil liberties by showing a preference for reason as against mob law.

The majority of the common people realise the necessity of a unified Labour movement to oppose the reactionary tendencies of the Tories, but the entry of the Communists into the Labour Party would tend towards disunity. It is the duty of the Labour Movement to create a new order in Britain that will make an instant appeal to the people of Europe and the rest of the world, so that we can give all men a new vision and a new hope. Common sense and reason are more potent forces than brute strength.

Yours fraternally,

DENIS BRIAN.

THE PATRIOTISM OF PEACE

By Lowell H. Coate

(President, The Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

The patriotism of peace is based on the "fraternity of peoples, social justice and world brotherhood—on industrial peace and international peace." In the words of Edward Markham, "The new patriotism carries with it the divine dream of the World State, the World Republic—the dream that will be realised in the rise of reason in the brain of man." The great seer, Tennyson, watched, in vision, the march of the human race,

> "Till the war-drums throb no longer,
> And the battle flags are furled
> In the Parliament of man,
> The Federation of the World."

And Longfellow expressed a similar sentiment:

> "Were half the power that fills the world with terror;
> Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
> Given to redeem the human mind from error—
> There were no need for arsenals and forts."

Whether or not the Poet's dream will be realized in this generation depends on the method which the nations adopt in dealing with international issues. In all of recorded history there have been developed but two important methods of dealing with international issues. In all of recorded history there have been developed but two important methods of dealing with international differences. One is the method of infuriated passion; the other is the rational and peaceful method of arbitration, in which justice is secured to all parties concerned, in-so-far as justice is humanly possible. One method involves the wholesale destruction of human life and property; the other is the constructive method designed to conserve both life and property. One is damnation; the other is salvation. One is war; the other is peace.

It is obvious, however, that the destructive method of trying to settle international disputes will continue to prevail, and that world peace will be quite as elusive as it ever has been, until such time as the nations are convinced of the advantages that will accrue to each by adopting the enlarged patriotism—a patriotism which knows no bounds save the limits of the earth. To the minds of some there is possible conflict between this enlarged idea and that which limits their interest to their own country, but the supposed discrepancy will vanish with a proper definition of terms and a correct understanding of exactly what is meant by Patriotism.

As a matter of fact, much that parades itself as patriotism is unworthy of the name. Take for instance, what may be called "military patriotism," which expresses itself in the desire for a gun and a human target. It is safe to venture that the average school boy has some such nebulous idea of patriotism, and about the first thing he thinks of when he hears the word mentioned is to get a gun and get ready to kill somebody. In order to make a name for himself he thinks he must become a military hero. And why not? Is it not the pictures of military men that he sees before him all the time in his histories and other literature? And is it not they who receive the major attention and honour in most of his reading? It is quite natural, therefore, that he should receive exactly such an impression.

Second, there is a sort of "blind patriotism," the exponents of which are dominated by emotion. At the nearest mention of international differences they immediately run a temperature and stop thinking. This type of patriotism expresses itself in the well-known sentiment of Stephen Decatur: "Our country! In her intercourse with other nations may she always be right; but my country, right or wrong." Such an attitude requires no thought whatever. It is the course of least resistance; is neither honourable nor intelligent, and so far as argument is concerned it amounts to exactly nothing. If our home, or our school, or our church is not what it should be in any particular, we do not lazily close our eyes and passively sing. "Our institutions right or wrong," but we courageously, intelligently, patriotically set to work to correct the imperfections in that institution. Yet many citizens have imagined themselves very patriotic while they repeated parrot-like the jingo-jingle "Our country right or wrong."

Third, there are the "profiteering patriots" who, while our youth are sacrificing their lives on battlefields far from home, are not satisfied to make a reasonably legitimate two or three per cent. on their investments, nor even thirty nor three hundred per cent. but actually make as high as 3,000 per cent. When one realises that there was a millionaire made for every American boy who lost his life in the world war, one is reminded of that statement of the great Samuel Johnson: "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel." And the noted Tolstoy, thinking of the extreme antagonistic nationalisms, and the pretended patriotism which so many in all ages and countries have used as a cloak for self-interest, once said: "Patriotism is . . . an unnatural, irrational, harmful sentiment, which causes the greater part of those calamities from which humanity suffers."

Fourth, there is what has been known as "100 per cent. Americanism," whose advocates attempt a practical monopoly of patriotism, limiting it to a few, more or less exclusive families who claim to be the true Americans and feel it necessary, in order to be thoroughly patriotic, to hate everybody else. In this connection we are reminded of the business man in Texas, who is said to have put a sign out over his office window: "I am a one-hundred per cent. American; I hate the Jews, the Catholics and the coloured people." But his competitor across the street, not to be outdone, advertised over his window: "I am a two hundred per cent. American, I hate everybody." Too many feel that in order to be properly patriotic they must hate somebody. It is difficult for them to realise that hatred is no essential part of any kind of right-thinking patriotism.

In contrast with the types which we have enumerated, there is a true, earnest, intelligent "patriotism of peace," expressed in genuine love for one's own country in the same noble and beautiful sense in which one loves one's own home. He is anxious to make it the most beautiful and attractive place in the world, and he is earnestly devoted to its best and highest welfare, but he is not willing to make some members of it happy at the expense of other members; nor does that attitude make him antagonistic to his neighbourhood. Every intelligent patriotic citizen, indeed, sooner or later discovers that it is possible for him to love his own home without necessarily hating the rest of the city; he can love his city without hating the state; he can love the state without hating the nation; and, by the same logic he can love his own nation without hating all the other nations.

There is no question that in the race for armaments America is in a position to lead the world. With her unlimited resources and her genius for invention she can produce the most destructive type of warplane and the most deadly brand of poison gas. But is this the glory she seeks, and the type of leadership she craves? America is ambitious. Bishop G. Ashton Oldham, in an address delivered in Washington, D.C., has pointed for her worthy path to glory. His statement, entitled "America First," is not only a beautiful expression of sentiment and idealism; it is a classic. It is, moreover, the very finest expression and the most perfect interpretation, which the writer has yet seen, of exactly what is meant by the Patriotism of Peace. Here it is:

AMERICA FIRST

"Not merely in science, inventions, motors and sky-scrapers, but also in ideals, principles, character.

"Not merely in the calm assumption of rights, but in the glad assumption of duties.

"Not flaunting her strength as a giant, but bending in helpfulness over a sick and wounded world, like a 'Good Samaritan.'

"Not in splendid isolation, but in courageous co-operation.

"Not in pride, arrogance and disdain of other races and peoples, but in sympathy, love and understanding.

"Not in treading again the old, worn, bloody pathway which ends invariably in chaos and disaster, but in a blazing new trail, which, please God, other nations will follow into the New Jerusalem where wars shall be no more.

"Some day some nation must take that path . . . and that honor I covet for my beloved America."

STALINISM'S LATEST CRIME

By H. W. Henderson

I have just read one of the most interesting pamphlets that have ever come my way, the story of Erlich and Alter. Who were Erlich and Alter? They were Polish Jews. They were lifelong fighters for Socialism. They were gallant fighters against Fascism. Where are they to-day? They lie buried in the sacred soil of the "Socialist Fatherland." They have perished at the hands of the henchmen of "the great and beloved Stalin." They were accused of collaborating with Hitler by advocating a separate peace with Germany.

This pamphlet will not be reviewed by the columnists of the Left-Wing. But you should read it. You should tell your comrades about it. You should buy a few copies and pass them around the workshop. For it reveals the Soviet terror at its worst. It ranks with the case of Sacco and Vanzetti as an act of judicial murder. It gives a faint idea of what this country would be like if the Stalinist murder gangs ever got to work in Britain. The capitalist press knows of these crimes but dare not publicise them while Russia is our ally. This is all the more reason why Socialists should take it upon themselves to spread the facts as widely as possible.

Henryk Erlich was born in Lublin, Poland, in 1882. Victor Alter was born in Mlawa, Poland, in 1890. Both had devoted themselves to the workers' struggle from an early age. Both had taken part in the underground struggle against Tsarism. Erlich suffered arrest for his activities in 1902, 1904, and 1909. On the last occasion he was sent into exile. Returning to Russia in 1911 he was placed on trial by the Tsarist Government for revolutionary activities in connection with the General Jewish Workers' Union "Bund." Later he was elected to the Central Committee of the Russian Social Democratic Party. Following the abdication of the Tsar he was elected one of the leaders of the St. Petersburg Soviet and a member of the Central Executive Committee of the Workers' Soviets of Russia. On his return to Poland in 1918 Erlich continued his Socialist activities. In 1929, when the "Bund" joined the Labour Socialist International, he became the representative of his party on that body. A lifelong fighter against every form of tyranny Erlich made one "mistake" which was subsequently to prove his undoing. He maintained a critical attitude towards Russia's internal policy. He refused to regard the enslavement of the workers as an evidence of Socialism.

Victor Alter was a member of the underground youth movement in Poland at the age of 15. For rebellion against the policy of "Russianisation" of the Polish people he was expelled from school in Warsaw. Later he joined the "Bund" and became a member of the Central Executive. A gifted speaker and writer he was the author of numerous works on Socialism including "Labour Co-operation," "Militant Socialism," and "Man in the Community." He was one of the most talented economists in the International Labour Movement and a convinced believer in international Socialism. His favourite saying was: "It is better to die standing up than to live on one's knees." He was an independent thinker on social and scientific problems—something hateful to the morons of Stalinist Communism.

When the Russian armies invaded Poland in 1939 they arrested thousands of Polish Socialists and trade unionists and deported them to Poland. Two of these were Erlich and Alter. Sentenced to death by the Soviet Government in August, 1941, they were released at the request of the Polish Government of that year. In December, 1942, they were re-arrested and sentenced to death by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court, and this time the sentence was carried out.

What was the charge made against these two internationally known Socialists? It is said that they had appealed to the Soviet troops to stop the war and conclude a separate peace with Germany. The charge was a lie. And the evidence presented in "The Case of Henryk Erlich and Victor Alter," issued by Liberty Publications, on behalf of the General Jewish Workers' Union "Bund" of Poland, shows it to be a lie.

Not only did they refuse all dealings with the murderers of their people. On every possible occasion they issued the most passionate appeals for resistance to the Fascist armies. Their words remain on record to testify to the falsity of the charges made against them. In a letter to the Polish Ambassador, dated from Moscow on September 24, 1942 (immediately after regaining their freedom), Erlich and Alter made the following statements:

The fight against Nazism and Fascism, employing every means at our disposal—and, first and foremost, an armed fight—is the duty of every man and woman who loathes barbarism and villany, it is the duty of every nation which loves freedom. As Socialists and citizens of Poland, suffering so cruelly at the hands of Hitler, we join the ranks of those who are fighting against this swastika monster. As sons of the Jewish people who, more than any, have been ill-treated and tortured by Hitler, we feel it to be especially our duty to take part in this struggle in defence of our dignity, through the utmost exertion of our efforts. To-day when a new Polish army is being created on the soil of the U.S.S.R. to continue Poland's struggle against Hitler, we appeal to all Jewish citizens of Poland who are strong enough to bear arms, and who are at present on U.S.S.R. territority.

To arms! Join the ranks of the soldiers who will once again offer their lives in defence of Poland's right to freedom of existence, who, at one with the Allied Armies, desire to free Poland and the entire world from the nightmare of Hitler slavery. And you, who are unable to bear arms, do not spare yourselves in assisting the army in its task of speeding up victory over the Axis powers.

Such was the appeal of two lifelong anti-Fascist fighters subsequently murdered for alleged collaboration with Hitler by the very gentlemen who, after dismembering Poland, congratulated their Nazi partners on the fact that their pact was cemented in blood!

In an appeal to his Jewish comrades—citizens of Poland—Erlich said:

Do not give up hope! The day of justice and reckoning will arrive. Hitler and his satellites have been outlawed by the great majority of the people of the world. . . . We call on you to fight. . . . In Poland, where millions are suffering intolerably, the Jewish population must unite in one thought, all our efforts for the struggle with Hitlerism. We shall spare neither strength nor sacrifice until our mortal enemy has been destroyed.

In October, 1941, Erlich and Alter expressed their opinion of the results depending on the issue of the Russo-German conflict:

Civilised mankind was never before faced with dangers like the present. Hitler and Hitlerism are a deadly menace to all achievements of culture, to the independence of all nations, and the freedom of all peoples. The outcome of the gigantic battles now fought on the vast plains of the U.S.S.R. will decide for years to come the fate of working-class movements, the fate of all mankind. The fight against these dangers demands supreme efforts of all those who are resolved to save themselves, their culture, their country and the whole world from the horrors of Fascist barbarism led by Hitler.

Speaking of the sufferings of their own race they said:

Hitler aims at the subjugation of all countries and peoples without exception, but his persecution of the Jews is particularly cruel. He drags through the mud the human and national dignity of the Jewish people, he places it outside of all law even his own Fascist law. He aims at the complex extermination of the Jews.

And these are the men who are accused of having urged the Soviet troops to lay down their arms and make their peace with Hitler! Every word of their appeals, every detail of their lives gives the lie to this assertion. But it is not the way of the Stalinist bureaucracy merely to murder Socialist fighters who have dared to criticise their tyranny. They must be disgraced as well. Hence the attempt, familiar to students of the Trotsky trials, to blacken the characters of their victims by representing them as traitors. In a country where there is no free press and it is impossible to put the facts before the public Erlich and Alter will for long be regarded as renegades and traitors. Free Socialists and all who love justice throughout the world should make the truth about this infamous murder as widely known as possible.

In a vain attempt to save them from the Bolshevik hangmen, an appeal in the following terms was sent on January 27, 1943, to M. Molotov, by a group of leading citizens of the United States. (M. Molotov, it will be remembered, is the gentleman who paid such touching tributes to his Nazi allies in the early part of the war and publicly accused the democracies of being the cause of the war. A fitting person to sit in judgment on anyone accused of collaborating with the Hitlerites!)

It is now more than a year since Henryk Erlich and Victor Alter, two prominent leaders of the Jewish masses were re-arrested at Koubychev. Most prominent representatives of freedom loving peoples throughout the world of British and American Labour Movements repeatedly requested their release in vain. To-day when universal public opinion unites in condemnation of Nazi criminals who are murdering in cold blood the entire Jewish population of Poland, we renew in name of justice and humanity our request for release of these outstanding courageous fighters against Fascism and Nazism, Henryk Erlich and Victor Alter.

This cable was signed by William Green (President of the American Federation of Labour), Professor Albert Einstein, Raymond Gram Swing, Philip Murray (President of the Congress of Industrial Organisations) and eleven other prominent trade union leaders and liberal thinkers in America. The effort was in vain. The victims were already dead as Litvinov intimated in his reply to Mr. Green on February 23, 1943.

Let their memory live in the minds of all who hate tyranny and abhor injustice. And let their fate be a lesson to those who listen to the blandishments of British Communist leaders who would bring the murderous and corrupt regime of Stalinist dictatorship to Britain if they could!

[The Labour Party dealt very thoroughly with this case in their report to the Annual Conference. We purpose to reprint their statement in full in our next issue. The Executive responsible is to be congratulated on a very clear and dignified report. —Ed.]

WINSTANLEY AND THE UNIVERSALISTS

Winstanley first came into public notice in April, 1649, with William Everard, as the leader of a small party of men who began tilling some waste land at St. George's Hill, Walton-on-Thames, asserting that it was "an undeniable equity that the Common People ought to dig, plow, plant, and dwell upon the commons without hiring them or paying Rent to any."

Everard, with Winstanley and others, issued a pamphlet, "The True Levellers," and was thereupon imprisoned at Kingston. The "True" or Communist Leveller, was distinguished from the purely Political Leveller. Winstanley, along with John Barker and Thomas Star, was arrested and sentenced to pay £9 11s. 1d. fine and costs. The three men then addressed an :

Appeal to the House of Commons, desiring their Answer: Whether the Common People shall have the quiet enjoyment of the Commons or Waste Land, or whether they shall be under the will of Lords of the Manor still (1649).

Winstanley also published the following tracts on much the same subject-matter :—

A Vindication of those whose Endeavour is only to make the Earth a Common Treasury, called Diggers (1649).

A Watchword to the City of London and to the Armie (1649).

A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England (1649).

A New Year's Gift to the Parliament and Armie; showing what the Kingly Power is, and that the cause of those they call the Diggers is the Life and Marrow of that Cause the Parliament hath declared for and the Armie fought for (1650).

An Appeal to all Englishmen to judge between Bondage and Freedom (1650).

The Law of Freedom in a Platform, or True Magistracy Restored. Humbly presented to Oliver Cromwell. . . . wherein is declared what is Kingly Gavernment and what Commonwealth's Government (1652).

These politico-economic writings clearly show Winstanley to have been, not merely an uncompromising Communist, but a constructive Communist Statesman, or actual practical politician, of rare faculty.

He dealt not only with Communism but with religion, and here stood forth as an uncompromising Universalist, proclaiming salvation for the whole Human Family, a Religion for All Mankind, and anticipating Secularism, Humanism, and Atheism. His works were mystical yet practical.

His tracts and pamphlets on this subject were six in number and depicted Truth rescuing and restoring the whole creation from bondage,all

Sold by Giles Calvert, at the Black Spread Eagle, at the West End of St. Paul's.

Winstanley dedicates one of these pamphlets, "The Mysterie of God," to his "Countrymen of the County of Lancaster." In this he describes himself as "not a learned man." The reason of this dedication is not very clear, since he was actually a Liveryman and evidently a well-to-do citizen of London.

In 1652, Winstanley started out with a "Red Van" from Harrow-on-the-Hill. He got as far as Nottingham and was arrested by representatives of Law-and-Order. He was never heard of again.

Winstanley defined his political, religious, ethical, and economic approaches very clearly in his writings.

He defines the two-fold nature of law. First, the law of nature within creatures, which moves both rationally and irrationally. The law of self-love moves irrationally in man, the law of generation or the members warring against the law of the mind. And there is the light in man, the reasonable power or the law of the mind, the witness or testimony of individual conscience an experienced observation of life.

Winstanley discusses and opposes to each other the two roots of law and authority :

(1) Common Preservation which is the Fountain Rule of all Government and Peace.

(2) Self Preservation which is the root of Tyranny, and so the cause of Kingly Government, Dictatorship, and Wars.

Winstanley thus built up a magistracy of the Common Peace against the magistracy of war. He evolves a complete system of social and industrial magistracy, an economic commonwealth. Winstanley has a very clear syndicalist conception which is amazing and intriguing in its care for details despite his old-fashioned phraseology. He works out a system of store-houses, general and particular. He objected to the "Elected Person" and held that his activities must be confined to administration purposes. every "project of law" had to be sanctioned directly by the people.

Winstanley, with much wisdom, defines "The Nursery of Cheaters" :

And so this Proverb is true, PLAIN DEALING IS A JEWEL, BUT HE WHO USES IT SHALL BE A BEGGAR. And why?

Because this BUYING and SELLING is a Nursery of Cheaters. It is the Law of the Conquerors, and the Righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, who both killed Christ and HINDERED HIS RESURRECTION, as much as darkness can put out Light.

Therefore, there shall be no BUYING and SELLING in a Commonwealth, neither shall any one hire his brother to work for him.

The Earth is to be planted, and the fruits reaped and carried into Barns and Storehouses by the assistance of every family. And if any Man or family want Corn or other provision, they may go to the Storehouses and fetch without Money. If you want a horse to ride, go into the fields in summer, or to the common stables in winter, and receive one from the keepers, and when your journey is performed bring him where you had him without money.

Well now, God and Christ have enacted an everlasting Law, which is Love; not ony one another of your own mind, but love your enemies too, such as are not of your mind; and having food and raiment, therewith be content.

A man had better to have no body, than to have no food for it; therefore this retraining of the Earth from brethren is oppression and bondage; but the free enjoyment thereof is true Freedom.

True Freedom lies where a man receives his nourishment and preservation, and that is the use of the Earth. For as Man is compounded of the four Materials of the Creation, FIRE, WATER, EARTH, AIR, so is he preserved by the compounded of these four, which are the fruits of the Earth, and he cannot live without them. For take away the free use of these, and the body languishes, the Spirit is brought into bondage, and at length departs, and ceaseth his motional action of the body.

Do not the Ministers preach for maintenance in the Earth? The Lawyers plead causes to get possession of Earth? Doth not the soldier fight for the Earth? And does not the Landlord require Rent, that he may live in the fullness of the Earth by the labour of his Tenants?

And so from the thief on the highway to the King who sits upon the Throne, does not everyone strive, either by force of Arms or Secret Cheats, to get the possessions of the Earth from one another, because they see their Freedom lies in plenty, and their bondage in poverty?

And thus far natural experience makes it good, That true Freedom lies in the free enjoyment of the Earth.

The Rev. Thomas Hancock, of Harrow-on-the-Hill, once observed of Winstanley :

His theory of Social Reformation had its basis in an essential modern and profoundly Anti-Puritan conception. He conceived of God, like the Alexandrian Fathers of the Church, as the Eternal REASON, and of Man and the whole Creation as the products of that perfect Reason. Personal and social life, the Conscience and the State, as he contended, had fallen or apostatised from Reason, and, consequently, no actual reformation was possible except by the personal and social return of men to the original formation in which God had constituted them.

Winstanley contrasted Kingly and Commonwealth Governments in these terms :

Kingly Government governs the Earth by the cheating Art of Buying and Selling, and take this Government at its best, it is but a diseased Government, full of confusion. If it had not a Club Law to support it, there would be no order in it, because it is the covetous and proud will of a Conqueror enslaving a conquered people.

This Kingly Government calls itself the Lord God of the whole Creation, for it makes one brother to pay rent to another brother for the use of the water, earth, and air, or else it will not suffer him by his laws and lawyers to live above ground but in beggary, and yet it will be called righteous. . . .

Commonwealth's Government governs the Earth without Buying and Selling, and thereby becomes the storer of ancient peace and freedom; makes provision for the oppressed, the weak, and the simple, as well as for the rich, the wise, and the strong; beats swords and spears into pruning-hooks and ploughs, and makes both elder and younger brothers freemen in the earth.

Winstanley opposed the idea of priestcraft and defined the Commonwealth's Christian Ministry :

When Commonwealth's freedom is established, then will KNOWLEDGE COVER THE EARTH AS THE WATERS COVER THE SEAS, and not till then.

He who is chosen Minister for the year shall not be the only man to make sermons or speeches (on the day of rest from labour); but every one who hath any experience, and is able to speak of any art or language, or of the nature of the heavens above or the earth below, shall have free liberty to speak when they offer themselves, and in a civil manner desire an audience; yet he who is the Reader (for the year) may have his liberty to speak too, but not to assume all the power to himself, as the proud and ignorant clergy have done who have bewitched all the world by their subtile covetous and pride.

And every one who speaks of any herb, plant, art, or nature of mankind is required to SPEAK NOTHING BY IMAGINATION, but what he hath found out by his own industry and observation in trial.

And thus to speak, or thus to read the Law of Nature (or God) as He hath written His name in everybody, is to speak the truth as Jesus Christ speake it, giving to everything its own weight and measure.

Winstanley denounced what Richard Carlile at much later date described as the "Gallipot Latin" of the medical profession. Describing the doctor's description of illness and prescriptions, Winstanley said :—

The latter is no knowledge but a show of knowledge, like a parrot which speaks words, but he knows not what he saith.

He defines the duty of the surgeon and physician in time of sickness.

If any person be sick or wounded the Chirurgeons, who are trained up in the Knowledge of Herbs and Minerals, and know how to apply plaisters or physic, shall go when they are sent for to any who need their help but require no reward, because the Common Stock is the public pay for every man's labours.

This Socialisation and use-service of the medical profession was in line with Winstanley's idea of the Commonwealth's ordinances against buying and selling. Whoever enticed his neighbour to buy or to sell was to be denounced for his unfaithfulness to the commonwealth's peace.

Winstanley explained :—

If any do buy or sell the earth or fruits thereof, unless it be to or with strangers, ACCORDING TO THE LAW OF NAVIGATION, they shall be both put to death as traitors to the peace of the Commonwealth; because it brings in kingly bondage again, and is the occasion of all quarrels and oppressions.

He or she who calls the earth his and not his brother's, shall be set upon a stool, with those words written on his forehead, before all the congregation; and afterwards to be made a servant for twelve months under the Taskmaster. If he quarrel or seek by secret persuasion, or open rising in arms, to set up such kingly propriety, he shall be put to death.

No man shall either give hire or take hire for his work, for this brings in kingly bondage. He that gives and he that takes hire for work shall both lose their freedom, and become servants for twelve months under the Taskmaster.

The "Laws of Navigation" also defined his Socialist approach :—

Beacause other nations as yet own Monarchy, and will BUY and SELL; therefore it is convenient, for the peace of our Commonwealth, that our ships do transport our English goods, and exchange for theirs, and conform to the customs of other nations in buying and selling. Provided that what goods our ships carry out they shall be the Commonwealth goods, and all their trading with other nations shall be upon the common stock to enrich the storehouses.

No medium of exchange being needed in Winstanley's Commonwealth, gold and silver have no other use than as objects of utility or ornament :

Therefore, there shall be no other use for silver and gold in the Commonwealth than to make dishes and other necessaries for the ornament of houses, as now there is use made of brass, pewter, iron, or any other metal.

Everything being for use or exchange, Winstanley worked out "Laws of Storehouses" :

There shall be storehouses in all places, both in the country and in the cities, to which all the fruits of the earth, and other works made by tradesmen, shall be bought and thence delivered out again to particular families, and to every one as they want for their use; or else to be transported by ship to other lands in exchange for those things which our land will not or does not afford.

Reference has been made to Winstanley's Law of Freedom published in 1652. Defining his opposition to war, he wrote clearly, in words that should be studied well to-day :—

Riches give men power to oppress their fellow-men and stir up wars.

What a pity that men should turn aside from such sound ethical printing to stupid disputes about theological mysteries and struggles for economic and political power.

[The story of the Universalists after Winstanley's time, their heresies and persecutions, and their departure from Winstanley's clear Communist economics will be developed in later essays.—Ed.]

RHYS DAVIES, M.P.

An Appreciation of his Socialist Anti-War Stand.

By

F. W. JOWETT

10 Grantham Terrace,
Bradford,
September 8, 1943.

My Dear Aldred,

I am glad you are going to make an appreciation of the splendid service of Rhys Davies, M.P., to the cause of Socialism and Peace a special feature in your September issue of "The Word." The courageous stand he has maintained in difficult circumstances for Socialism and Peace ever since this war of ever-increasing malignity began is worthy of all the honour that recognition in "The Word" or any other Socialist anti-war publication can give to it. His fight for what he believes and we believe to be the truth has never been surpassed in this or any other war. Opposition to the views he has so fearlessly expressed may seem overwhelmingly powerful now but it is my firm conviction that after this second world war, as after the first world war, those who have stood true to the principles of Socialism and Peace will have been justified by events. That our comrade and my own parliamentary colleague for many years may have health and strength to continue his fight is the fervent wish of—Yours fraternally,

F. W. JOWETT.

AWAKE!

Awake, ye trammelled minds of Earth,
Throw off this fateful lethargy,
That holds you helpless slaves from birth,
And kills desire for liberty.

Awake, and wield truth's sharp edged axe:
Cut down the loathsome tree of lies
That hides the light, and blurs and blacks
All hope of freedom, till it dies.

Awake, Resolve you will be strong:
And think and work with main and might
With those who strive against the wrong
And, through sane thought, reach for the right. Awake!

WAR AND PEACE

A Further Speech against War made in the House of Commons

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

(Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, 1924)

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Thursday, August 5, 1943.

Mr. Rhys Davies (Westhoughton): The problems I wish to discuss have no relation to any of the questions which have so far been raised to-day. The first thing I have to do when I speak on the issues of war and peace is to make it clear that I do not speak for the party to which I belong. I have been in the House for 22 years; I was almost born into the Labour Party and have been a member of it all my life, and I have preached the same gospel that I intend to propound to-day ever since I have been in public life; and although I am 65 years of age I shall continue to preach the same gospel as long as I live. I would like a reply from the Government bench to some of the remarks I shall make although I do not press for that to-day. Perhaps a note will be taken of what I say and I hope a reply will be forthcoming in due course. I want to challenge the whole philosophy of war as an instrument of policy. If I had the right to do so in Germany, in Japan, Russia, China or the United States I would stand up and make the same protest against war irrespective of the consequences. I have travelled too much and lived too long to be influenced by propaganda, during wartime in particular. I have met kings, statesmen, politicians and diplomats in many countries. Indeed, I have met some people abroad who were once regarded in this country as unfit members of the community but who became in due course very popular with the very people who used to condemn them. I am sure that there are hon. Members here to-day who remember the time when we dined with Mustapha Kemal Pasha in Constantinople. We hailed him then, some years ago, as one of the finest gentlemen of the East. I recollect, however, when he fought and defeated us in the Dardanelles that he was regarded as a low-down scoundrel just as we regarded most of the Bolshevik leaders before Russia was attacked by Germany.

There have been a few Members of this House from time immemorial who have adopted the view that I take about the issues of war and peace. The late John Bright, I believe, stood up in the House and opposed every war in which our country was engaged. I take very much the same line. If wars could settle problems for mankind, the human race ought to have reached the New Jerusalem long ago. In fact, wars create many more problems than they set out to solve, and I predict now that this war will fall into exactly the same category. When the historians ten years hence come to record the history of this period, they will stand aghast at the fact that there is hardly a soul in this Parliament to make a protest against spending the substance of the nation as we do in passing what is called the Consolidated Fund Bill. I have been here long enough to hear the then Prime Minister of the day telling us that we must tighten our belts when he reduced the unemployment benefit rate by 2/- a week at the instance of the American Federal Reserve Board. The more we spend of the nations' substance on war it stands to reason that the less we shall have to spend on reconstruction when peace comes. What about sanitation, water undertakings, housing, school teachers and the like? When this war ends the present proposals on education, the Uthwatt and Scott Reports will be of little avail. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will then stand at that Box and say that there is no money left to undertake any of these desirable things. The House of Commons passes £1,000,000,000 this week almost without a murmur, but when we want a few additional coppers for old age pensioners all the cunning of the Government and the Treasury is brought to bear against our proposals. It has been computed over and over again that if half the money that nations spent on war were devoted to housing, education, travel and the like, the human race would have very little to complain about.

I shall be told, of course, that we are in a war and that it must be fought to a conclusion. It is astonishing how people change their minds about war. There are millions of folk willing to take a stand against war when peace prevails, but once war breaks out they follow the thunder of the drums and the bands that play patriotic strains in the streets. I have heard it stated by some of my hon. Friends that war is inevitable; it is useless anybody arguing against it; that it must be accepted as a fact, as part of nature itself. I decline to believe that war between nations is inevitable. Why should it be so? A century ago people regarded the plague, cholera and smallpox as inevitable. Indeed, they thought that war between the several communities in this Island was inevitable. We have travelled a long way from that, and consequently I decline to accept the fatalistic view that wars are inevitable. Let me come to what is happening at this moment. Perhaps however I ought to make it clear once again, if necessary, that nothing I say must tend to support either Hitler or Mussolini or any tyrant of that kind. I am as opposed to Nazism, Fascism and totalitarianism as anybody in this country. I am so opposed to them that I object to the Nazi technique being employed in industry in this country at the present time. The strange thing to me is that there are plenty of people in this country who object to totalitarianism in Russia, Germany and Italy, but they do not mind its application here one bit. Indeed, we have already reached the stage when there is a larger proportion of our people in these Islands in uniform and under discipline than has ever been the case in history. The essence of the Nazi technique is here in full blast. Now we are faced with proposals to conscript schoolboys and grandmothers for industry.

Let me now pass on to the question of bombing. It is astonishing how the human mind works on these things. (Interruption.) When the war ends and the inevitable reaction takes place, as it always does, it will probably be said then that I was right in what I am now saying. There are some people here who rejoice that Rome has been bombed, and there are those in Germany who are delighted that Bath and Exeter were devastated. I cannot understand their delight on either side. I have been in Rome and have seen the famous church that has been damaged. I have also been inside St. Peter's, Rome. If I lived in Germany and was allowed to speak, I would protest against the bombing of London, Exeter, Bath and Manchester, and because I would do that I want to protest equally against the bombing and blasting of any town anywhere. It is not sufficient for my purpose to hear people say, " Why did not the German people protest against bombing our towns? " Then there are hon. Members who will say, " Why do not the Germans get rid of their masters? " and they will turn to me and say, " What grand fellows there would be in Germany if a few of them stood up and denounced Hitler and his regime." But if anybody in this country gets up to denounce the very same things that are done here, his patriotism is in grave doubt. In my view, however, any man in any Parliament, in any assembly in the world who stands up to do what I am trying to do now, to protest against this mass slaughter of the innocents and the destruction of the beautiful cities of Europe is doing a great and valuable service to humanity. If Exeter, Bath, London, St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey are bombed, why stop there? Some day, I suppose, Jerusalem will be bombed and Mount Calvary and the Wailing Wall destroyed in the process. Then we may see whether the human race will at last wake up to the ghastly things that are happening in our day and generation.

The British Government have recently taken part in the Hot Springs Conference with a view to bringing food to the starving peoples that are to be liberated on the Continent of Europe. What a mockery when we all know that practically the whole of the human race is already on rations because of war. And, while they were talking at Hot Springs about providing food for the conquered peoples of Europe there were millions actually dying of starvation in China and India. I hope that the House as usual will tolerate my views as I am trying to express them.

Let me now say a word on the difference in the attitude of the public to this war and the last. In the war of 1914-18 the crowds were hostile whenever I spoke as I do on this occasion, and the people at the head of affairs were rather kindly disposed to the minority. In this war, however, I have addressed hundreds of meetings all over the country, and I have never found any hostility except among Members of the Government. I will venture to state why I think there is that difference. We declared war on Germany because she went into Poland. I object to aggression, but I am not going to accept the argument which some hon. Gentlemen here use very often that Germany is the only villain because she has declared war three times in 75 years. She has, and she has been wrong in declaring war at all. Incidentally, I object to any strong and powerful nation using small nations as pawns in the international game, as Germany and other great Powers have been doing. But let us be fair; let us come to Russia. So far as I know my history, during the 75 years in which Germany has declared three wars, Russia declared about 12, Italy 11; and if we count the fighting we have done on the North-West Frontier of India we have hardly been out of war at all for centuries. In my own lifetime we have declared war three times in 45 years.

At long last, Mussolini has gone, and it is a good thing for humanity that he has disappeared. I wish all dictators alike went the same way. I am not so sure that it would not be a boon and a blessing to mankind all over the world if the Governments of all the belligerent Powers gave up office for sheer shame.

Mr. Lipson (Cheltenham): What made Mussolini give up office?

Mr. Davies: Exactly the same reason that will make some other people give up office later on, probably in this country too. It would be a good thing, as I said, if all the belligerent Governments gave up office and allowed others to come into power to make peace among the nations and bring mankind back once again to sanity and reason. (Interruption.) Does the hon. Member love this war? Is he so delighted at seeing millions being slaughtered?

Mr. Lipson: No, and the hon. Member knows that is not true. Nobody in this country delights in this war, but we realise that it is an inevitable evil.

Mr. Davies: Nations have gone to their doom and Empires have toppled because statesmen and politicians have refused to listen to unpopular unpalatable arguments.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir Thomas Moore (Ayr Burghs): But did not the late Prime Minister do everything he could to try to prevent this war? Are not our hands clean in this matter?

Mr. Davies: Yes. I know the story about all that, too. There were some people in this country who were always hostile to the Nazi regime. An hon. Member says " Hear, hear," but he went over there and saw what the Nazi regime had done. But there were other Members of this House who went over to Germany before Hitler began to persecute minorities, and they came back and said what a grand fellow the Fuehrer was. There were members of this Government who thought it was a splendid achievement that Hitler came into power to put a " cordon sanitaire " right across Europe to prevent Bolshevism coming West. What is the position now? I wonder whether I dare predict that at the end of this catastrophe Fascism may be eliminated from all over Europe. But what about the next stage? Suppose I suggested that Communism would take its place all over Europe. What of it then? Just imagine this war being waged and millions of people being killed in order to destroy one form of totalitarianism only to find another form of it being enthroned. That is not at all unlikely if this war proceeds along the lines that the present Governments of the United Nations are taking. If it takes two or three more years to defeat Germany in the field and then three or four more years to defeat Japan in the Pacific, I am not so sure that we may not in the end have civil commotion even among the democracies of the world.

(To be concluded).

EXPULSION FOR CONSCIENCE.

Speech made in the House of Commons on the motion for adjournment on Friday, July 16, 1943.

by RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

[In the House of Commons on July 1, 1943, our comrade, Rhys J. Davies, M.P., raised the question of the expulsion of Arthur William Pettet, 26 Marlborough Street, South Chingford, London, E.4, from the National Deposit Friendly Approved Society because he served six months' imprisonment as a conscientious objector to military service. This expulsion was upheld by the referee, Mr. Kennett Macmorran. The reply of the Minister of Health upheld the referee's decision. Consequently, Rhys Davies decided to raise the question on the adjournment.

Comrade Rhys Davies raised the issue on the adjournment, when he made the speech reproduced below. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health, Miss Horsburgh, replied. She quoted the words in the rule governing the decision:

"The committee of management may expel any member who has been imprisoned for any crime."

Miss Horsburgh argued that it is not a crime to be a conscientious objector, but it is a crime to refuse to be examined medically and so go to prison. Within the meaning of the rules this was "imprisonment for crime." To our mind, political imprisonment, or imprisonment for opinion, or action based on opinion when clearly such action defines and interprets principle is not crime within the legal meaning of the rules, or the legal and constitutional definition of crime. No lawyer would be disbarred for such imprisonment nor would a doctor be struck off the medical list. Pettet ought not to have been expelled and the Ministry ought not to uphold his expulsion. Rhys Davies is correct, not the Ministry for Health.—Ed.]

I am glad of this opportunity of raising a point that may be regarded as of little significance to the Members of the House of Commons, but one which is, I can assure them, of considerable importance to a large number of people in this country. On 1st July this year I asked the Minister of Health the following Question:

"Whether he is aware that Mr. Arthur William Pettet, 26 Marlborough Road, South Chingford, London E.4, has been expelled from the National Deposit Friendly Approved Society because he served six months' imprisonment as a conscientious objector to military service; that an appeal against the decision of the society was upheld by the referee, Mr. Kennett Macmorran; whether in view of the fact that Pettet has already suffered for his offence, he will take steps to wipe out this additional penalty by restoring the man to membership of his approved society, and how many approved societies, giving their titles, have adopted this punitive policy."

I guessed what sort of reply I should receive from the right hon. Gentleman, and I do not complain of that reply. He said:

"I am aware of this case, but I would point out that under Section 163 (4) of the National Health Insurance Act, 1936, the Referee's decision is final and conclusive. With the exception of a similar one in the same society, no other case of the kind has come to my notice."—(Official Report, 1st July, 1943, col. 1768, Vol. 390).

I very much regret that I am compelled to raise this case, because I have no feeling at all against the National Deposit Friendly Society. Indeed, I regard it as a very worthy organisation. It is held in the very highest esteem by the public, and to my personal knowledge its administration is most efficient. Why it should commit this error is beyond my comprehension. Be it noted that, out of 6,000-odd approved societies in this country, this is the only one, as far as I know, to adopt this policy. I have been the secretary of an approved society myself. It may interest the hon. Lady the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health to know that I also hold views very similar to those of Mr. Pettit on the issues of the war and peace; nevertheless, I held my position there without any complaint from anybody. I imagine there must be many conscientious objectors in administrative posts in other approved societies, too. Consequently, I am sorry that this has happened in connection with this organisation.

The National Deposit Friendly Society has expelled this man and one or two others from the private side as well as from the National Health Insurance section, but Parliament has no control of the private affairs of a friendly society. In respect of the National Health Insurance membership of this society, the Ministry of Health is however held responsible, and the matter can be raised in Parliament. In the few words I have to say, I wish to achieve two objects. The first and foremost is to prevent such expulsions spreading in this society and to other societies and, if possible, to induce the Ministry of Health to exercise friendly pressure upon the National Deposit Friendly Society to restore these men to membership once again. I want to be quite fair with the House. Mr. Pettit is an absolutist conscientious objector. The local tribunal granted him conditional exemption if he did A.R.P. or land work, but the appellate tribunal the higher authority which later considered his claim for unconditional exemption, relegated him to non-combatant service in the Forces. It will be noticed that the appellate tribunal was not as favourably disposed to this man as was the local tribunal. Because he declined medical examination in connection with military service, he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

As hon. Members know, I speak as one who has himself been an administrator of an approved society, otherwise I would not be as familiar with this problem as I happen to be. When Mr. Pettit knew that he was to be imprisoned for six months and that no health contributions would be payable by an employer in respect of him for that period, he gave due notice under the rules that he desired to become a voluntary contributor and to pay both the employer's contributions and his own. The trouble is that, in doing so, he may have been a little too honest, because he acquainted his approved society with the reason for the change. If he had never given the reason at all, possibly he would never have been expelled from the Society; but, in the circumstances, the Society administers the rules in relation to expulsion. And what they found was this, that under the model rules, a person may be expelled from membership of an approved society if he has been imprisoned for any crime; they assumed that to serve a sentence in prison as a conscientious objector was a crime according to rule. Let me say as one who has been secretary of a society which I suppose has as large a proportion of conscientious objectors in it as any other approved society that we have never regarded, and I very much doubt whether any other society in the land except this one has regarded, imprisonment for conscience as a crime for the purposes of expulsion.

I was very glad that when I raised this issue the feeling of the House was rather favourably inclined to my point of view. I cannot argue that this man was not subject to punishment under the Military Service Act, but the House of Commons, I hope, will always lay it down that when a man has once suffered imprisonment for any offence, it does not then fall to an outside organisation to add to that penalty another penalty for the very same offence. Let us remember that this man has now suffered three penalties for his conscience. He has lost his job and has been in gaol for six months, and now, if you please, he is expelled from his approved society as well. When his case came before the district committee in the area where he resides they did not think that he ought to be expelled at all, but when the case came to be dealt with by the national executive, not one of whom knew the man personally, they decided to expel him. That is surely carrying punishment too far. He then appealed to the society's arbitration tribunal as he was entitled to, within the rules of the society, and it decided to uphold the expulsion. Then, of course, he had the right to another appeal to the referee appointed, and paid, by the way, by the Ministry. This referee, I understand, is a very eminent lawyer. He too decided to uphold the society's decision and, of course, from that decision there is no appeal at all unless—I do not know my law well enough to say—the case can be taken to the High Court. It is, I am sure, against public policy that a society like this should be allowed to determine to expel a man in the way I have indicated.

Let me come to the referee. How on earth he could decide in favour of the society's decision is entirely beyond my comprehension. He ought to have known two or three things. The National Health Insurance Act and the model rules referred to were passed in 1911, before conscription was ever introduced into this country and before a conscientious objector for military service was ever heard of. Here we are now in 1943, and the referee has not the remotest idea what was meant by this rule when it was passed in 1911. If I know anything about the right hon. Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George) who introduced the National Health Insurance Scheme he was, if I might say so, somewhat of a conscientious objector himself once upon a time. I am not so sure whether, according to this referee and the society, that they would not have expelled the right hon. Gentleman if he had been a member of that society in his younger days. I am really astonished at the referee because the whole point turns on whether this man committed a crime. Every Member of the House knows that I believe that what this man did, by refusing to enter the Fighting Forces, was to decline to commit a crime, not to commit one. That is the way I look at life.

I am appealing to the Ministry. They say the case cannot be carried further. The hon. Lady the Parliamentary Secretary will forgive me for saying this to her, that I am sure that if the Ministry of Health were good enough to appeal to the society, as I hope they are entitled to do, they might reinstate this man and every other member who has been expelled for similar reasons. I do not want to detain the House longer except to say that I am under the impression that this man is apparently a constituent of the Prime Minister. If the Prime Minister were an ordinary Member of Parliament, I am almost sure that as Member for his Division he would be saying more eloquently the things that I am now saying. I hope, therefore, that I have made out the case. I realise to the full the difficulty of the hon. Lady in connection with the referee's decision but I appeal to her again to see whether the Ministry cannot ask the National Deposit Friendly Society to reinstate this man. They may have no legal power to intervene but I am sure they could find a way to induce the Society to remove this anomaly.

This war will end some day and when it ends we shall probably find in the Parliaments of the future what we saw after the end of the last war. There are Members in this House who were in gaol for conscience during the last war. Some of us, I suppose, would be in gaol too if the authorities had the chance of putting us there. And so, if a man can become a Member of this Parliament, the greatest sounding board in the world, can it be honestly said that another man is not entitled to continue membership of his approved society? The Society would not lose any money because he would retain his membership as a voluntary contributor. I hope I have said enough to induce the Ministry to take some further interest in this vital issue.

[In later discussion, Rhys Davies insisted that, acording to the wording of the National Service Acts, a man commits an "offence" when he refuses to submit himself for medical examination, and not a "crime" as used in the model rule.—Ed.]

IF THERE WERE ONLY ONE.

If there was only one little slum-child,
Pale for the want of food,
Then I say, that all the progress we boast of Aint no damned good.

WAR COALITION OR SOCIALIST STRUGGLE.

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

[Being the powerful and almost ignored Speech delivered by our Comrade, Rhys Davies, at the Labour Party Conference, held in London, Whit Monday, 1943.—Ed.]

The Coalition has now been in existence for three years and the time has arrived to judge the fruits of the alliance.

When it was formed it was argued that Labour Ministers would, by joining it, be provided with an excellent opportunity to induce the Tories to adopt Socialist measures. Experience has shown, however, the reverse to be the case; Socialists have embraced Conservative tendencies instead, and they perform the most doubtful tasks of government.

The Coalition secured powers from Parliament to conscript both wealth and man-power for the prosecution of the War. Real wealth, however, is left almost untouched, but men, women and even young persons are conscripted treated like so many robots, and directed from pillar to post by the State.

Our Labour colleagues in the Coalition have placed a larger proportion of the people in uniform and under discipline than has ever been known in history.

Over 12,000 industrial workers have been prosecuted and more than 1000 sent to prison for offences that were never punishable before our Labour representatives joined the Coalition. No employer, however, has yet been sent to gaol for similar offences. A Labour Party above all cannot succeed on those records.

Trade Union machinery has been cunningly harnessed to discipline the workers in the interests of the employers and the State; and it is a historical fact that thousands of artisans are being treated more harshly by this Coalition than has ever been the case since the days of the Tolpuddle martyrs a century ago.

If Labour had retained its independence in Parliament, no Liberal or Tory Minister would dare treat the workers in this cruel fashion.

Whilst we are supposed to be fighting for freedom for the Poles, the Greeks and the Czechs abroad, our own people have lost most of their own liberties here at home.

I protest against this descent to serfdom.

The Nazi technique is almost in full blast in industry in this country already. Let us remember that a prison cell does not become a bed of roses just because you are put there by a Socialist Cabinet Minister.

In spite of the Coalition the Beveridge Plan has been torpedoed, the Catering Bill challenged by the Tories on the Floor of the House, and the Old Age Pensioners left to their own fate. Moreover, the Tories have refused point blank to agree to amend the most obnoxious clauses of the Trades Disputes Act, and the treatment meted out to some discharged soldiers is inglorious in the extreme.

History has never witnessed such political somersaults as we have since this Government came into being. Ardent Tories are now mumbling the "Red Flag" in public, whilst Socialist ministers are chanting "Rule Britannia."

One of the worst features of the Coalition is the dilemma that we are often called upon to support reactionary measures in Parliament so as not to embarrass the Government. We are constantly offending our friends by placating our opponents.

Labour Ministers send letters to the Electors at By-Elections urging the workers to vote Conservative, and some of them speak on Tory platforms. Because of all this the Labour Party is being by-passed by new political movements. The Socialist flame that once burnt into capitalist society has been extinguished.

When the French, the Poles, Norwegians and the Czechs demand their freedom from the Nazi occupying power, they are regarded as heroes, but when the Indians claim the same rights from this Coalition Government, they are treated as traitors and terrorists.

This perfidy has brought disillusionment among our people. There is no enthusiasm here for anything. The masses are bewildered; they do not know what they are fighting for; and I venture the view that the common man in every belligerent country is becoming heartily sick of government as an institution.

When this catastrophe is over, and the inevitable reaction sets in, we shall not then be asked what we did to defeat Hitlerism; we shall be questioned as to what we did to maintain the rights and liberties of our own people here at home.

The Coalition has placed Parliament in shackles and Democracy is languishing. Nearly one in six of the civilian members of the House of Commons is in some paid post in government.

There is always grave danger ahead when Labour leaders become the darlings of the aristocracy and the heroes of the popular press.

The Prime Minister has recently suggested that either a Coalition of all the Parties or a government of the best men from each Party be set up to appeal to the electorate when the war is over. That, of course, is the logic of events however ominous it may be.

Let me, if I may, warn my Labour colleagues what recent history teaches in this connection. When the Tories have used their genius and exploited their popularity they will then throw them on the scrapheap as they have done with better men before. In the end, they will go down unhonoured and unsung.

The greatest tragedy that can ever befall any Labour leader is that he should forget the rock from which he was hewn.

Finally, there is only one of two courses open to the Labour party. Either we break the Coalition and save our souls, or continue this artificial alliance and pass into political oblivion. You cannot worship God and Mammon —even in politics.

MOTHERWELL I.L.P. OPEN FORUM

All comrades in Lanarkshire, including our Anti-Parliamentarian comrades in Blantyre and Burnbank, should rally round the Motherwell I.L.P. and assist its splendid struggle for Socialism and Anti-Warism. Announcements of its future meetings will appear in these columns.

Comrade W. E. Currie, the organising Secretary of the Motherwell I.L.P., served in the last war, but turned Anti-Militarist as a result of his experiences. He has been tireless in his Socialist activities since. His family has made a sound stand against war. Arising out of the Duke of Bedford's private visit to the Anti-Parliamentarian miners of Blantyre, Comrade Currie contacted him and proposed that the I.L.P. should invite the Duke to Motherwell to speak. The Duke met some of the I.L.P. comrades and it was agreed that the Duke should have an opportunity of facing his "Communist" opponents and stating his pacifist position, and his view that monetary reform is NOT opposed to Socialism, but, on the contrary, a necessary step in the development of the Socialist programme.

Following upon the Duke of Bedford's meeting, and the complete rout of the "Communist" opposition, the Motherwell I.L.P. is now organising a strong Socialist campaign throughout Lanarkshire. Other speakers are being brought to Motherwell and an all-in Lanarkshire federation and council of Socialist thought, discussion, and action is being evolved.

For a full report see our next issue. Motherwell is pointing the way of Socialist struggle against war and its reactionary aftermath! Local comrades wanting to assist should write to: Comrade W. E. Currie, Organising Secretary, I.L.P., 178 Muir Street, Motherwell.

ARRAIGNED.

Skies are no longer ours—to love.
They are the playground of adventurous, unpitying youth
Who ride, remorseless, their swift toys of doom.
Day's blue is streaked with fear.
Tumultuous crags of sunset hide a menace—
Night's very moon a curse.

Earth is a target where death,
Impersonal, blind death, comes hurtling down,
Belched forth from that which sees not, knows not, cares not.

Machine!
Versus the man, versus the creature, versus all life—
The springing verdure, and the wealth of time.
Machine!
Thing of nuts and bolts and levers!
Hideous perfection! shameless artifice!
Apotheosis of man's lust to kill!

We are confounded by Heaven's Judgments . . .
Man stands arraigned by all his past—
—His pitiless subjection of the groaning earth
—Crime mounting upon crime—endlessly.

All he has gained,
All he has felt.
All he has learned,
Quest of self, climbing towards the light—
Quest of the spirit—groping, seeking, finding.
Conquest of self, climbing towards the light—
—Overborne! Abjured!—

It comes to this—
Less than the ant,
Less than the happy birds,
Less than the worm,
Less than the least of these—
All that man can do (poor, purblind thing).
All he can do to WILL destruction of his kind,
And lay on youth (outward-looker, visionary, Builder of Dreams).
The shameful task of Executioner . . .

Whose soul cries out, remonstrant,
"I NEVER PLANNED THIS DEED."

WHILE MEN MARCHED FORTH TO WAR

From the topmost bough of a green spring tree,
A bird sang forth its joy to me,
Love of life that sounded far—
While men marched forth to war.

Flowers looked up to a clear blue sky,
Scenting the wind as it passed by,
White-winged seagulls high did soar—
While men marched forth to war.

Ears were deaf, and eyes were blind,
Joy and Beauty were left behind,
Yet few could reason well what for—
While men marched forth to war.

Greed and Fear did follow after,
Ghosts with neither love nor laughter,
Down to Hell for ever more—
While men marched forth to war.

VICTORY ROAD.

(Dedicated to The Humanist Society of Friends).

Where dust of chaos is turbulently whirled
You stretch your hands in friendship toward the world.
Past bomb and slum and Greed's long caravan
You glimpse essential majesty of man,
And see beyond our mutilated skies
The Brotherly city ultimately rise.
As amoeba held in prehistoric seas
Potentially Beethoven symphonies,
As humblest mollusk stored in his house of shell
Genius of Carver, Keats and Raphael,
So your Humanist circles prophecy
The world that dream and daring glorify.
So in your generous hands and hearts you span
The Victory Road that's built on faith in man.

BARLINNIE PRISON REVISITED

By The Rev. THOMAS PICKERING
(Priest in Charge, St. Columba's Episcopal Church, Clydebank, Glasgow)

[Our loyal and sincere comrade, the Rev. Thomas Pickering is well-known as a member of the Tramp Preachers or Brotherhood of The Way movement. He played a great part in the famous Free Speech struggle in Glasgow and we hope soon to be able to tell the story of that campaign. Like the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., of Liverpool, comrade Pickering refused to register for fire-watching and has been sent to prison twice. On the first occasion, the Bishop paid the fine without our comrade's knowledge and consent, but from a spirit of fellowship and service. On the second occasion, Thomas Pickering definitely instructed that no one must pay his fine, and now he tells his story and proclaims his message.—Ed.]

It must be 10 years ago since I was in Barlinnie Prison, Glasgow, for several 20 days' imprisonments, along with other Christian Tramp Preachers, and some Socialists, Labour and Communist propagandists also.

We were all there concerning Free Speech on Glasgow Green and other Parks, and in the city generally.

It brought victory, in some measures to the advocates of Free Speech, although certain totalitarianists of British and other brands, are still carrying out measures against this priceless free speech liberty, in all lands.

Quite recently I revisited Barlinnie, twice through the compelling powers of the Civil Defence Act, concerning fire watching. My voluntary Christian offer to help, in line with conscience, was turned down in Clydebank, and I was "lifted" and spent a few days in Barlinnie on the first offence (non-registration) at the beginning of Lent, in March this year, as well as a second period of one month, in June, this Whitsuntide. There is a slight improvement in this fortress of Glasgow these days, as compared to those of 1930, for free speech, under supervision, is allowed now, of about 25 minutes daily, provided that no more than two prisoners are found together in conversation, with hands by their sides, whilst walking steadily round and round the exercise yard. Lest prisoners should look forward to more advances, too quickly, there are week-ends of sobering effect which amounts to victimisation these days. No doubt the war has had something to do with it, although I do not believe that it need have been so. I remember quite well that 12 years ago we had two religious services—a change, to say the least, from the prison cells—on Sundays, but now, prisoners only get one religious service every Sunday. The exercises too were longer in those days, now they are shorter. In the very interesting articles in The Word, written by Councillor Chas. A. Earl and the Rev. Sidney Spencer (both Unitarians) the conditions of the English prisons (Wandsworth, London and Walton, Liverpool), are described vividly and truthfully. On the whole they agree with those in Barlinnie, Glasgow, the Scottish citadel.

Neither of these political or religious prisoners, however, deal with these dreary, drab and dry week-ends. Let the reader think of them for a few precious moments. From 12.30 noon every Saturday each prisoner is in solitary confinement until 7.30 a.m. on Monday morning, except for a 25 minutes' exercise on Sunday and a 25 minutes' religious service in the Prison Chapel on the same day. In effect, he is shut up for 2 days, save for a few hours. Only one reading book is provided for him during that period, unless he manages to secure a transfer in the book realm, with another prisoner. For thus breaking the Sabbath and the prison rules he can be punished. There is also a food restriction order for Sunday. No porridge, no potatoes, no meat.

I asked the Governor if he would allow me to write the Home Office about these drab week-ends in prison and he granted my request. In my letter to the Secretary of State for Scotland, and Prison and Borstal services, I put forth the prisoners' complaint about Sundays and suggested that even in these days it was not difficult to provide two exercises, instead of one, on Sundays, and an extra, in the way of a lecture on Sociology, Biology, etc., on Sunday afternoons, with free and open discussion amongst prisoners. I suggested that prison chaplains and visiting ministers would not be averse to developing things after this fashion, without delay, if allowed to do so. A few weeks ago the Governor notified me, by post, that the Home Office had received my letter ! ! !

It rather looks as if nothing different will happen in the week-end prison routine within this fortress, before the autumn leaves begin to fall (so far as the Home Office is concerned).

It is for the churches and other societies and movements to keep up the correspondence and pressure, morally and spiritually, not co-ercively, until ever week-end in ever prison becomes what the Sabbath rest means it to be, which is, a week-end of Rest and Recreation, with Edification and Joyousness. As a Christian, Episcopalian, and Brotherhood Broadcaster, I will seek to do my part in this matter, and trust that every reader will do likewise. By such action will the drab prison week-end go, and a better one take its place. By doing that which is little, ye shall be entrusted with that which is much, even the changing of all prisons into Convalescent Homes for erring or victimised humanity, until we, with them, attain to perfect humanity in all the glory of Divinity.

Thus prisoners will change, because prisoners and people have changed.

May the Home Office, Church and Labour, you and I, do our bit now and the prisoners will do their bit also.

I fancy that the Governors and Warders, with the medical staffs and chaplains, are saying "Amen." As I meditate further, it is no fancy. They really mean it, because we unswervingly intend it.

Jesus and the pioneers speed us.
Pacifists in prison encourage us.
Truth leads us.
Perfect Freedom calls us.
All souls cry out to us.
Do something about it now.

WANDSWORTH AGAIN

By Councillor CHARLES A. EARL

On the 3rd June, 1943, I was again sentenced to two months' imprisonment for refusing to register for firewatching and by 6 p.m. on that day I had become No. 5775 in H.M. Prison at Wandsworth. The same two prison officers who had received me into the prison 18 months previously were on duty and both of them recognised me. I was of course familiar with the reception routine, and although I had found the day's proceedings rather trying and had for weeks been dreading the return to prison, and all that confinement in such a place means, I was not feeling nearly so upset as on my first sentence and in consequence was more critically observant of my surroundings and treatment.

The first thing that struck me was during reception. I have explained in my previous description of prison routine how a prisoner on being received into prison, is stripped before bathing and while his personal belongings are entered into a book and he signs for them he is told to throw a blanket around his body. On the previous occasion I thought nothing of this and probably should not have done so on this occasion, but for the fact that when we appeared before the Medical Officer, I heard him tell the man immediately in front of me that he was verminous, and then I realised that this individual had discarded the blanket just before I put it around myself. Now although there may not be anything very dangerous to health in this kind of vermin, the idea is not pleasant. On the other hand, men suffering from all kinds of other diseases such as skin diseases and venereal diseases, all use the same blanket and then the consequences to others might well be serious. I don't know how often this blanket is changed, but if it is anything like the blankets in general use throughout the prison, changes are not often made.

At about 8 p.m. that day's prisoners, between 20 and 24 men, were taken from the reception hall to cells on A1 landing. Those cells were in a very dirty condition. They were regularly used as reception cells, and new prisoners were lodged there for one or two nights before being transferred to more permanent quarters for their stay in prison. Who washed these cells and how often they were washed I don't know but it couldn't have been done very often and of course the blankets had been used by goodness knows how many individuals.

As I have already said, the shock of entering prison was not so great this time as last, although the sound of the cell door closing upon me, made me feel rather depressed and lonely, but that sort of feeling simply has to be thrown off, because the sentence has got to be served, and it is no good being sorry for oneself.

The next day I was removed to a cell on C4 landing, but this was not to be my permanent home, because three days later I was transferred to H4/23. This landing was occupied almost entirely by conscientious objectors. In both of these cells I had to use the blankets that the previous occupants had used which were not washed with each change of prisoner.

Food was almost identical with that issued to me on my previous visit; it was then mid-winter and now midsummer, and prison cocoa on hot days is a difficult drink. I must, however, record one or two improvements in things that I had previously complained about.

The food tins were kept very much cleaner. The boiled rice which was served once a week, instead of being plain and unsweetened, was either sweetened, contained sultanas, or was served with stewed prunes, so this seemed a great treat. Another welcome improvement was a very small portion of cheese three times a week instead of twice as previously. The quantity of food issued each day was however very small, especially as so many of the prisoners were young men in the early twenties, and the last meal of the day, consisting usually of a small "cob" of bread and margarine and cocoa, was served at 5 p.m. and there was nothing more until 7.30 the next morning. They were always hungry.

I must again stress the totally inadequate sanitary arrangements and the long long hours of solitary confinement. Although it is now summertime, on Sundays the prisoners are out of doors for one hour only one week and one and a half hours the next week. On the yard in which I was exercised there were approximately 400 men and three W.C.s. Now allowing 5 minutes for each man per W.C. it means that only 12 men can use one W.C. in 1 hour or 36 men the 3 W.C.s in an hour and on every other Sunday when the exercise time is 1½ hours only 54 men can use the W.C.s, assuming they all take 5 minutes.

As for the rest of the men they must use the small chamber pot in their cells. Now I do want everyone who reads this to imagine that they are the occupants of these cells. That on each Sunday they are shut up in them for 21½ or 22 hours and that the opportunities for emptying slops are at 7 a.m., 9 a.m. and 2 p.m.; and from 5 p.m. until 7 a.m. the next morning there is no possibility of leaving the cell. Remember that all food is eaten in the cell and all that long time is spent in it. The cell has a small window with two panes about 4 inches square to slide along and let in air. Imagine in the hot weather the state of the air in this small room. Would any of you who read this care to use your living room, even with its superior size and ventilation, as a lavatory as well as a dining and living room. Yet thousands of men and women in prisons all over Britain have to live in such conditions.

Every day from 5 p.m. to 7 a.m. the next morning the cell is locked and the chamber pot is all that can be used. It was the thought of these conditions that made me dread my return to prison so much. Imagine the abominable stench every morning when hundreds of men are emptying slops.

What I am now going to say is going to be very difficult to believe, but it is the simple truth. On occasion 3 men are allotted to one cell (2 men are never put together for fear of sexual trouble). Up to May last this occurred on more than one landing in Wandsworth Prison. Now try and picture the lives of the men who were compelled to live 3 in a cell, remembering the conditions I have already described. I appeal to you to do all in your power to bring about a change in this shocking state of things. I now want to say a few words about the unfortunate men who live in prison. I call them unfortunate because I am quite sure in my own mind that most of them are victims of circumstance, that they are more sinned against than sinning. I was very distressed to find that after an interval of 18 months I could recognise so many faces, men who were still serving their sentences or who had been out and in again, some of them several times.

On my first day in the prison I was hailed by a young homo-sexual whom I had tried to befriend and sympathise with during my first imprisonment. He said he had been in and out twice since then. Out of 105 men in this particular workshop, 4 of them were male prostitutes. How many more there were in the prison I could not say. I only ask whether punitive treatment such as this, is the right method to use to cure homo-sexuality?

Then there were elderly men between 65 and 75 years of age, imprisoned for begging or sex crimes. Is imprisonment of this kind an effective remedy?

There were about 1500 men in this particular prison and their average age was not more than 30 years. What an indictment of our social system!

If I could, I would make it a necessary condition that before any person could be given the office of Magistrate or Judge he or she should be obliged to serve a sentence of at least one month as an ordinary prisoner. None of the officials being aware of the fact that these people were not criminals. It is the only way that the real life of the prisoners can be known or understood. It should be obvious to anyone that when visitors are shown around, the sort of things that I describe are not and would not be brought to their notice.

A friend of mine, the Reverend Will Hayes, has written a book about Asoka. Asoka was a king of Magadha in Northern India about the year 270 B.C. My friend describes how this king created a class of officials whose duty it was to visit the prisons and give special attention to prisoners. The officials had to see that no one was unjustly imprisoned and release all who were stricken with years and not fit to be in prison. They were empowered to make grants of money for the maintenance of a culprit's family and see that relatives of the prisoners did not suffer. This was in the year 270 B.C. in India!!

I have no knowledge of our prisons for women, but I ask you to think of those old men in the cells of Wandsworth, and to realise that what applies to Wandsworth applies to other British prisons.

(Concluded from column 3.)

was sufficient to convince them that the majority had been right. They then refused to carry on under the Scheme and were returned to prison.

So back to prison the Absolutists went—there to remain until five months after the signing of the Armistice—and the Wakefield "experiment" was ended.

WAKEFIELD!

A September 1918, Memory of the Men who would not Compromise.

By JAMES RITCHIE HENDERSON
("Gowrie")

[In our February, 1942, columns we told the story of "Gowrie's" stand against compulsory firewatching. Our comrade was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for his refusal to register for firewatching, at Kilmarnock Sheriff Court, on November 24, 1941. This trial, and also his 1914-1918 Courts-Martial and imprisonments, were recalled in detail. Now we recall an incident of his famous stand during the first world war.

Twenty-five years ago, this month, a number of "absolutist" conscientious objectors, including several Friends, were removed from the ordinary prisons, where they were undergoing "hard labour" sentences, to Wakefield, where the Government attempted to put into operation a scheme of "modified imprisonment."

The objectors were to have certain concessions regarding visits and correspondence and be paid 3d. a day, which could be spent at the Canteen, but work, ordinary prison labour—mail-bag making, etc. —was to be compulsory. The scheme collapsed, for the men who had gone to prison rather than compromise, felt that it was wrong to co-operate in schemes of partial amelioration in lieu of that absolute exemption which was provided for in the Military Service Acts. They felt that if they were deemed C.O.'s they merited complete exemption and this right ought not to be withheld from them.

This chapter in the story of the C.O. movement in Britain was written in 1919, when events still were fresh in his memory, by our comrade, "Gowrie," as James R. Henderson is known to his "Forward" and other admirers. "Gowrie" was one of the Wakefield men who spent three years in prison. His book of general prison experiences, "Among the Broadarrow Men" was published by D. & C. Black, in 1924. More recently, "Gowrie" has described his Barlinnie experiences in "Forward."—Ed.]

On the night of Sunday, September 8, 1918, I could not sleep. I was in a prison cell in the Midlands, and time after time I rose from the plank bed and stood on my stool to gaze through the window bars at the glittering stars far above.

The excitement within me was not because prison was new and strange, but because a change was imminent. After eighteen months' confinement in that prison I was, with three other anti-militarist prisoners, to be removed the following day. The governor had told us, suddenly, that we were to be taken to Wakefield Prison; nothing more.

Only one warder accompanied us, and we took our midday meal together in a cafe in Sheffield, experiencing the novelty of wearing our own clothes. When the big prison at Wakefield was reached we found that there were about sixty men there, many of whom had arrived the same day, every one an Absolutist C.O., and every one of whom had been in prison over two years.

We were all dressed in "Home Office" clothes and allocated to cells—rooms they were called here, because the locks were off the doors —and a good deal of freedom within the prison walls was allowed. We took our meals together and strolled around the extensive grounds in the evening. No one knew on what footing we were there. Only vague reports were heard that the Government had decided to make ameliorative concessions to Absolutist C.O.s who had served two years' imprisonment.

Next morning at eight o'clock the Acting Governor told us that we had been brought there under a Government concession, and that we would not be subject to the same rigorous treatment that we had left. Immediately Scott Duckers asked, in a quiet voice, "Is work compulsory here?" On the answer being given in the affirmative the solicitor-prisoner replied, "Then I refuse to do any." The whole position was so uncertain and a trap seemed so probable that the men decided to form a voluntary organisation to work such service as was necessary for health and cleanliness—food preparation, laundry, sanitation and so on. The Governor had not sufficient officers to enforce orders, so the voluntary organisation prevailed. An advisory committee was formed, on which appeared these names: Ayles, Watkins, Thompson, Sara, Scott Duckers, Newman, Clark, Davis, Southall, Horwell. We passed resolutions and even notified the Government that our Absolutist principles as held from the first could not be compromised.

When Saturday arrived, certain men had visitors, and from them it was learned that the happenings at Wakefield Gaol had been reported in all the national newspapers with headlines such as "Objectors take charge of a gaol," "Prisoners run their own prison," etc.

On Monday, September 16, more men arrived. Immediately after dinner word was sent round that regulations had been received and that an urgent meeting was to be held almost at once to consider them. It was generally felt that the Home Office Scheme in disguise was being foisted upon the Absolutists. The following resolution was passed by 98 votes to 4, 102 men being then present.

"The Absolutists at Wakefield Prison, having carefully considered the special regulations dated September 16.

(1) Find that the Government has neither appreciated nor met their claim as based upon the imperative demand of conscience.

(2) Decide that they cannot submit to them because they are convinced that to do so would seriously compromise their position, and that therefore their present course of action must be maintained for the time being."

As we were returning to work that afternoon, the warders told us that a number of additional warders were coming from Armley Gaol. By Wednesday, September 18, a hundred and twenty-two men were present, and that was all the Absolutists who were sent to Wakefield. On that morning the officers came from Leeds.

Excitement was high all the morning. At ten-thirty a young man rushed into the laundry and called us to the meeting-place immediately. He didn't know whether we would get there or not. The round-up had commenced, and warders were locking up any stray men they could find. Our small party got to the rendezvous safely. Many men, it was learned, had been stopped by the new warders and ordered to work. Upon refusal they were immediately taken to an isolated hall known as F Wing.

It was resolved that all who were present, about 80, as far as I can remember, should proceed en masse to F Wing and let the locked-up men know that we were with them. As we went through the grounds we sang and cheered heartily. Our cheers were answered from F Wing, and we could see the faces of our comrades at the separate cell windows. Our message was shouted to them (I believe by Walter Ayles), amid loud cheers, but warders soon appeared, and as we returned to the central hall we knew that it was to be locked up.

A Home Office official had arrived and each man was asked if he was prepared to work under the proposed scheme; the other 111 were reduced to First Stage prisoners and locked up.

We knew now that we were only waiting until arrangements were made for our removal to other prisons. Sunday, September 22, was our last night at Wakefield. The previous Sunday had been a happy one, shining out like a star amid all our prison Sundays of solitude. We had met and talked, enjoying fellowship, and had been inspired by a great unity of purpose. Now we were separated in cells, and realised that we should soon be scattered in different parts of the country again. It was a night to be remembered and as we sang we felt that our comradeship was a real and lasting thing.

On Monday, exactly two weeks after our arrival, we departed from Wakefield in small groups. Eleven men stayed behind, but a week

BOMBING AND CIVILIANS

By the Rev. J. F. GERRARD, B.A.
(Vicar, St. Thomas's Church, Wigan).

[The following outspoken article, indicating the moral fearlessness of its author, is culled from the St. Thomas's Church "Parish Magazine," Wigan, for June, 1943.—Ed.]

Recently in the Commons, Mr. Stokes, M.P., declared that there was an ever growing volume of opinion in this country which considered indiscriminate bombing of civilian centres both morally wrong and strategical lunacy. It is an opinion shared by many in the Churches. Aerial bombing is one of the horrifying developments of modern warfare, causing the deaths with great suffering of many thousands of civilians in their homes. As far back as 1925 and 1932 attempts were made to reach an international agreement which would ban the bombing of cities; our country was one which refused to agree. It should be remembered that it is practically impossible to restrict bombing to military objectives. Communiques issued by the R.A.F. not infrequently contain such phrases as "the target area was plastered with bombs," or "the bombs fell in the target area." Factories and engineering works are usually surrounded by streets of working-class houses, and sometimes by blocks of flats or tenements.

When bombs are dropped from a great height, or under adverse weather conditions, it is practically impossible to aim so as to hit a works of ordinary size. A bomb released from an aeroplane drops diagonally and not vertically. From an aeroplane travelling at a height of 10,000 feet a bomb has to be released about two miles before the machine is actually over the target. Consequently a great number of bombs are released to cover the area in the hope that one or more will hit the target. Some 16 to 18 out of 20 bombs intented for a particular objective will probably destroy house property, and kill and maim the occupants. A traveller in Germany in August, 1942, writing in the Zurich "Volksrecht," states "It is mostly the densely populated residential districts which are affected by bombing, whereas war factories have so far suffered little. For example, the Krupps works in Essen, as I observed to my surprise, had suffered scarcely any damage worth mentioning."

This recalls the escape of the German battleships from the Channel port. From reports we were led to suppose they had been blown to pieces, yet they got away apparently unscathed under their own power, to Norwegian ports.

But problems of military strategy are not the first consideration in the minds of those opposed to bombing. There is the moral issue of supreme importance. Till this war began, the rights of civilians were respected as sacred. Oppenheim, writing in "International Law," says "The immunity of non-combatants from direct attack is one of the fundamental rules of international law. It is a rule which applies with absolute cogency alike to warfare on land, at sea and in the air." This rule has now been swept aside by all the belligerent countries. By bombing they hope to shatter the morale of the civilian population. It is an utter delusion, for it has the opposite effect, the stiffening of morale and capacity for resistance amongst the survivors. But what it leaves behind is a legacy of hatred and bitterness which will leave its mark for many generations. Apart from the loss of life there is the destruction of the heritage of centuries: cultural monuments, churches, paintings, books, the irreplaceable treasures of the ages. Our age will be known as the age of barbarism.

From the Christian standpoint such bombing is no better than murder and savagery. As the Bishop of Birmingham has pointed out: "You cannot send a bombing aeroplane on a mission of Christ." You cannot do evil that good may come. While not slackening in his efforts to bring about a negotiated peace, the true Christian in every country will seek to humanise war as far as it is possible, and one of the ways would be to restrict bombing to the actual battlefield, or better still abolish aerial warfare altogether.

Every person should interest himself in the question for unless the civilian asserts his rights the military caste will treat him as of no importance. The Japanese with characteristic ruthlessness, have found a solution, that of executing airmen found guilty of bombing cities. But it ought not to be impossible to frame an international agreement. Unless we do so civilisation as we now know it is doomed by this devilish development of modern warfare; murder, and sudden death will be the fate of many an innocent non-combatant.

WAR, BOMBING AND COMPASSION.

IS IT NOTHING TO YOU?

Bellshill Minister's Anti-Bombing Sermon.

Our contemporary, "The Bellshill Speaker," in its issue for June 4th last, reported the powerful sermon delivered the previous Sunday at West Church, Bellshill, by its Minister, the Rev. D. D. Bowyer, who based his sermon on the text: "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" (Lamentations, I, 12).

From the "Speaker's" report of this sermon, we reproduce the following passages:—

It has been said, Mr. Bowyer remarked, that Jesus was the "divine scismograph." His heart was a delicate instrument, sensitively registering the faintest tremors of the world's pain and sorrow. . . . can we not hear Him saying to all men and particularly to us His followers "Is it nothing to you all ye who pass by?"

Surely no one, unless one whose heart is turned to stone, can be unmoved at the terrible sufferings of humanity. Can we Christians remain silent when confronted with the agony, the pain and the suffering of God's creation? I say we cannot. I do not believe compassion is dead in the hearts of British people, for if compassion be dead then have we suffered a devastating defeat for the cause of Christ in the world.

It is terrible beyond words to realise that we are using upon the German and Italian people the very same weapon of indiscriminate bombing which they used upon us, and which we condemned as unChristian and barbarous. Were we not promised from Government spokesmen that Britain would never stain her fair name by such actions?

From the press, the B.B.C. and the Government spokesmen it would appear that we British people are delighted to know that the German and Italian cities are being laid low and that children are being blinded and maimed, their minds tortured by fear and their bodies wracked with pain. The exultant note over the recent wrecking of the dams, when 4000 were drowned and hundreds of thousands homeless, is surely quite foreign to the spirit of compassion and kindness of which we used to be proud. You mothers here who have little children, can you exult in the suffering of other children even if they be German or Italian? God forbid.

Surely this exultation over suffering humanity, over helpless and innocent children, is quite contrary to the spirit of Jesus Christ.

Who gave our leaders the powers to bomb indiscriminately? It was not the people. And yet before God we shall be held guilty, for they are acting in our name.

Mr. Churchill was recently giving forth certain of the plans of the Allied nations to the press in Washington. Among other things he is reported to have said this:—

"It is the duty of those who are charged with the direction of the war that they begin the process so necessary and desirable of laying the cities of Japan in ashes, for in ashes they must surely be before peace comes to the world."

What right has anyone to commit our nation to such a policy of barbarism? No good can come to us from such a policy. Do you imagine that the cause of Christ in the world is to be maintained by cruelty; by killing, wounding and maiming millions of our fellow beings for whom Christ died.

One of the outposts of the Christain faith which must be held at all costs against the forces of evil is the outpost of compassion. If we become indifferent to the suffering and pain of others and callous as regards the suffering we inflict upon others then the cause of Jesus Christ will have received a severe setback. In the name of Christ the suffering children are saying to-day, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by."

Are you aware that millions of people on the Continent of Europe are in danger of starvation, and that for lack of milk and vitamins children are wasting to death? In Belgium during the last war 100,000 tons of foodstuffs were allowed. This time they are asking for 2000 tons a month of vitamin capsules and dried milk for children, and nursing mothers. The arrangements are ready. A neutral ship is waiting in Philadelphia, and the cost is to be paid by the Belgian Government. All that is required is permission by us.

At our General Assembly it was unanimously agreed that the Church should demand that the Government grant the necessary permit and should allow foodstuffs to keep alive babies and give strength to mothers. It was declared by the Prime Minister of Belgium that "unless help were given immediately then the Allied nations would liberate not a nation of living people, but a graveyard." Not only does commonsense demand that we keep alive our Allies (for liberation to dead men is not much good), but also humanity and Christ demand it. The starving children and the wasting mothers look across to Britain and they are saying "Is it nothing to you, all ye who pass by?" . . .

It is St. John who says "Whoso hath the world's need and seeth his brother have need and shutteth up the bowels of compassion from him how dwelleth the love of God in him."

There is one thing that we Christians can do in this present conflict, indeed that we must do and that is to keep alight the flame of compassion in the heart of humanity. If pity, sympathy, charity, and mercy die out from the hearts of men and women; if there ever comes a day when we are unmoved at the sufferings of other people then truly the devil will have conquered and Christ will have been driven out from the hearts of men.

Maintains that the Labour of Constructive Thinking creates lasting wealth. Upholds the eternal commandment: THOU SHALT NOT KILL. Invites all readers of "The Word" living in Detroit to attend its services and join in its community work and struggle against the wrongs and falsehoods of present day society.

Where there is no intelligence there can be no democracy; where there is little intelligence there may be a little democracy. Th world cannot be made "safe for democracy" until it is made SAFE FOR INTELLIGENCE.

If war would destroy only the unfit from off the earth we might find some toleration for it. But alas, the unfit stay at home to propagate and become millionaires, while the youth and virility of the land are pushed out to useless slaughter. Whenever we can send to the front first those who plan and foment wars, and those who profit by them, wars will soon come to an end.

Despite their governments, the people of all nations, in their hearts, want peace. And somewhere sometime, millions of men and women must stand up and cry: "We're through! we will not go on forever with war causing more war, causing more war, causing more war still."

Scattered over the United States there are now 48 camps housing several thousand young men known as Conscientious Objectors. Opposed to killing even their enemies, these men refuse to permit themselves to be conscripted for war—and the government very wisely and justly respects their right of conscience.

—News item.

It is perfectly plain to me, and nothing can be plainer—than the fact that unless there be some determined Souls—a saving minority in this maniac world, that stand firm for Peace, that refuse to betray their highest ideals, and that will not compromise or barter their principles, but will face unflinchingly whatever abuse and punishment may come to them—

Unless this salt of the earth shall preserve its savor—mankind is lost and there is nothing ahead of our world but a new Dark Age. Therefore do I greet these young Objectors as the pilgrim heroes of a new day—the day when wars shall be no more.

Mussolini's resignation was announced, Sunday, July 25, after we had handed our 'Copy' to the printer. Until a Socialist or Anarchist Commonwealth is established in Italy, changes of Government are of small consequence to the working man or woman in Italy. Political changes are superficial—only social changes are real.

THE BROKEN SWORD

By C. H. Norman.

Readers of "The Word" will understand the difficulties with which one is faced in writing a third, detailed review of the war. As the war progresses, the only one certain fact which is persistent is the incompetence of the military and political leaders in all the contestant countries. There never has been any such person as a good general: some are less bad than others. The history of Napoleon is an example. He was able to defeat the more incompetent generals opposed to him by adopting new methods: but when those were exhausted he committed the same errors as his opponents, destroying his grand army, and, finally, leading to complete destruction his Empire, his satellite states and his armies, causing later his own exile and death. The introduction of air warfare has only reinforced the truth of this proposition, except that the air commanders seem even more boastful and more incompetent than the military and naval commanders. Harris and Goering are a pretty pair when we consider the destruction wrought upon their respective countries and citizens by the conduct of the air campaign. Their defence methods have completely failed as the state of many cities in England and Germany conclusively proved, notably Plymouth and Hamburg.

As for the military commanders, it is well to recall that there is only on record one honest despatch from a military commander admitting his defeat (apart from classical times), namely, the despatch of Charles de Rohan, Prince de Soubise, to Louis XV of France announcing the defeat of his army at the battle of Rossbach: "I write to your Majesty in a paroxysm of despair. Your army has been completely routed. I cannot say how many of your officers are killed, taken prisoners, or missing," etc. In those days, there was more popular criticism of military incompetents than unfortunately there is to-day. "One lampoon represented him searching for his lost army with a lantern; another gravely announced that the Hotel de Soubise was to let, as its noble owner intended to enter himself as a pupil at the military school; while a third informed the public that the prince intended to build a palace to celebrate his late campaign with the stones which he anticipated would be thrown at him." ("Life of Madame de Pompadour," Noel Williams, p. 342). It would be perhaps indelicate to name some British, American, German and French generals to whom some of these comments might apply to-day: there are perhaps too many of them to "mention in despatches."

Let us examine the position in which the various countries find themselves at the end of nearly four years warfare. The National Debt of Great Britain is now standing at about £17,000,000,000. In June, 1943, according to "Reynolds News," the English golden sovereign would purchase in Cairo (where there is an open market) £6 in sterling paper money, which means, in plain language, that the paper sterling pound is worth 3/4 in terms of gold. What has been gained by the creation of this remarkable economic position? The British Empire has been so roughly handled under the leadership of the late Neville Chamberlain and the living Winston Churchill that there is not much left in a solvent condition. Burmah and the Eastern possessions have been lost to Japan. Australia and N. Zealand are being protected by the United States. India is seething with discontent. The West Indies are largely under the management of the United States. Canada is economically in United States' hands. Unlike the last war, when Britain and France kept together till the end, so acting as a balance to the United States, to-day the United States dominates the scene, as, without United States aid, the British Government could not recover the lost territories. Mr. Churchill has demonstrated that the British Empire was incapable of defending its possessions successfully against the foreign combination which the Churchillian policy from 1914 onwards brought into existence. On the wisdom and foresight of these kind of people, one may quote one example, as it has a great bearing on the causes of the present situation. The Liberal Government of Campbell Bannerman came into office in the autumn of 1905. In under six months, Sir Edward Grey was planning the policy which led to the first stage of the European War in 1914. He prepared a considered and careful memorandum, in which the following amazing passage appeared: "I hope the French would recognise that in a war with Germany our liabilities would be much less than theirs. We should risk little or nothing on land, and at sea we might shut the German Fleet up in Kiel and keep it there without losing a ship or a man or even firing a shot." ("Before the War," by G. P. Gooch, page 16). It seems incredible that a man of such narrow judgment and holding such opinions should have had unquestioned control of the British Foreign Office from the date of that memorandum till 1915. He actually repeated the substance of his statement on August 3, 1914, in the House: "For us, with a powerful fleet, which we believe able to protect our commerce, to protect our shores and to protect our interests—if we are engaged in war, we shall suffer but little more than we shall suffer if we stand aside"! The world can judge of the accuracy of those forecasts by the events which happened. To-day, it is established beyond doubt that the forces of the Empire have proved insufficient and unable, under the leadership of Mr. Churchill and his technical advisers, to preserve the Empire from destruction, as, without the full aid of the United States in all respects, it would not be possible to regain the territories lost or defeat the many enemies which a fatuous foreign policy have brought in arms against the Empire.

Let us consider next the state of Italy. The Italian Government has lost the whole of its African possessions and certainly could not preserve the integrity of its own territories from invasion by United States and British forces without the aid of Germany. Here, again, the sword has broken in the hands of Italy's leaders. But the comparison of the defeats in North Africa (which were mainly due on both sides to cutting off the water supply and not in the least to military strategy, which was exceedingly bad on both sides) with the defeat of the British at Dunkirk is valueless. The defeat at Dunkirk produced directly the collapse of France and the withdrawal of the French forces from active participation in the war. The hope that the Tunis victory would end in Italy seeking a separate peace has proved a vain one up to mid-August, 1943, anyhow.

Turning to the condition of Russia, Russia has involved herself in such a situation that, apparently, only substantial aid from capitalist United States and Britain will enable the Russians to drive the German invaders out of the occupied territories. The wild statements of the Russian propagandists have exceeded anybody's. At the end of the first year of the German-Russian war, the Russians officially announced that the Germans had sustained at least ten million casualties. The second year of the war, according to the Russians, was more disastrous for the Germans than the first year: so that, presumably, the German casualties, by end of June, 1943, must be over twenty millions. Yet the German Army is still able to occupy and administer one third of the Russian territories! The liars of the Russian propaganda department are indeed hoist with their own petard, as indeed is Mr. Winston Churchill, who adopted as his own the Russian statement that the German dead exceeded 2,600,000, which was more than the Germans lost in the whole of the last war. Judging by the military position of the relative forces, the German statement of their total losses in the war as 2,650,000 by May, 1943, seems more probable than the Russo-Churchillian farce. It is, however, the fact that the vaunted Red Army, Red Fleet, and Red Air Force have proved unable single handed to defend the territories of Russia. It is plain also from the clamour for the Second Front that the Russians themselves have no hope of driving the Germans out of Russia by their own unaided efforts. Russia has up to date steadily declined various pressing invitations, of the United States especially, to declare war on Japan and allow the Far Eastern Provinces to be used as a base against Japan.

The unfortunate French are being torn to pieces between alleged friends and foes. Parts of the French Empire, which were untouched in 1914-1918, have been seriously devastated, and the food blockade by the United States and Britain have added to their economic difficulties. Here again the great French Army and Fleet proved themselves ineffective to protect the territories of France against either friend or foe. Occupied France is beginning to suffer severely from Anglo-American unrestricted air attacks. The sword here has broken into little pieces.

What is the state of Germany? Great as have been her victories on land and in the air, her cities also have been devastated by air attacks of a ferocious and unrestricted kind, while the naval food blockade is adding to the privations of the women and children. Powerful though the German armies are, the truth is that Germany has been unable to end the war at the moment of success, and the tide has been turned to some extent against her by the full development of the American attack, which has exceeded what took place in 1917-1918. The sword has not broken entirely in the German hands, but its efficacy up to date has not produced the guaranteed result as prophesised by the German General Staff.

The only country which looks as though the wielding of the sword has brought it some advantage is Japan, whose position certainly is very much better to-day than it was in 1940 in the way of valuable resources and possibility of successful action against powerful enemies. The Pacific campaign has not gone too well for Japan in 1942-43 though the losses inflicted on the scanty, Australian forces have been severe. Moreover, the campaign against the Japanese occupation of Burmah failed completely in making any headway towards dislodging the Japanese from that country. How the operations will develop there if the United States and Britain embark upon the rash adventure of European invasion at several points no one can foretell, except that there are unpleasant possibilities for the unfortunate Australians and New Zealanders, who have had it established that they too are incapable single handed of defending their countries from the attack of the Japanese forces. Without American aid the state of Australia and New Zealand (bad though it is) would have indeed by now been desperate, if not hopeless. The United States has really had to undertake the defence of many outposts of the British Empire as well as the Dutch and her own. The defence has not been conspicuously successful up to the present, but the end is not yet. It is clear, however, that in the case of Australia and New Zealand, their sword, without aid, would have been as effective as a broken reed to save their countries from invasion and occupation.

This review of the position as it really is, dismissing the wilder statements of government propagandists on both sides, is again a proof of the truth of the lament of the Swedish statesman, Oxenstierna, at "the little wisdom with which men and states were governed." Did the ordinary citizen carry on his private affairs as statemen carry on the public business of the countries they rule this world would would long ago have returned to the state of barbarism, which these statesmen and military leaders are rapidly bringing once more into existence in all parts of the globe.

SOCIAL TECHNIQUE OF NON-VIOLENCE.

By Lowell H. Coate, M.A, Ph.D.
(President, The Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

Civilization must renounce Violence or Violence will destroy Civilization.

Violence has proved a complete failure. After ten thousand years of history Violence has left an unbroken record of human suffering, disappointment, bloodshed, broken hearts and homes and crumbled nations. Violence contains within itself the seeds of its own destruction, yet every nation to date has rested and relied upon physical force and violence as its chief source of power and authority. All have uniformly failed.

Nothing is more true to history than that "They who take the sword shall perish by the sword." Where are the Cyruses and the Caesars, the Alexanders and the Napoleons? They are but an unhappy memory of the death, destruction, starvation, tragedy and human despair which they have left in their paths.

To-day the human race is deliberately pursuing a course which leads to suicide! It has developed the instruments of violence to such a big point of scientific efficiency in the airplane, submarine, machine gun, poison gas, death ray and numerous other destructive devices that whole cities and entire populations can be blotted out over night. The United States has this year made the largest peacetime naval appropriations of any nation in the world's history, and is annually spending 15 billions of dollars on crime and violence, yet there is tragic increase and mounting costs for crime, and the world is threatened with the most destructive war of all time.

It was the former Prime Minister of England, Stanley Baldwin, who asked: "Who does not know that one more war in the West and the civilization of the ages will fall with as great a shock as did that of Rome?" H. G. Wells asserts that "It is a race between education and catastrophe." The next great cataclysm will engulf us all; none will escape its horrifying effects. Again we say: "Civilization must renounce Violence or Violence will destroy Civilization."

As the world faces an unprecedented international crisis and the worst war of extermination in history, why does the Peace Movement find itself hopelessly divided, ineffective and without a united message for the world? One important answer to this question is found in the total lack of any sufficient, fundamental, underlying philosophy. The Peace Movement as such opposes war, but war is only one manifestation of violence. During the usual 20-year period between wars there is no war to oppose and hence no challenge and no special incentive to Peace activity, and the moment war is declared no opposition is permitted. So pacifists drift along from one war to another with little or no effective united action.

We of the Non-Violence Movement are thoroughly convinced that the Peace program must be broadened to include opposition to all forms of violence, particularly organised violence, such as (1) lynchings, (2) pogroms, (3) vigilantism, (4) gangsterism, (5) dueling, (6) capital punishment, and (7) all civil and international wars. These various forms of violence are taking place all about us every day and all the time. The need is always apparent and the inspiration always present to increase our opposition to every form of human violence.

The power and social technique of Non-Violence has been developed in order to adequately counteract the forces of violence. Without approving or disapproving of the motive in any particular case, the following forms of Non-Violence have proved effective in numerous instances: Arbitration, education, persuasion, propaganda, political action, petitions, protests, parades, peaceful picketing, the boycott, the sit-down strike, economic co-operation, social, political and economic pressure, civil disobedience, tax holidays, the commercial embargo, the "rule of silence," political non-co-operation, diplomacy, mediation, conciliation, adjudication, and ordinary legal procedure. A technique involving a combination of many or all of these forms of Non-Violence has the most powerful potentialities known to modern civilization.

The whole question of Social Technique vitally confronts organized society to-day, and Non-Violence is the answer. The church and organized labour have been almost unanimous in their opposition to violence, but what the times require is a definite, positive, constructive program of a permanent nature, something comparable to the ever-readiness of the military machine which is automatically geared for quick action, in order to properly meet and to successfully counter the unjust and unsocial elements in our complex modern society.

This is in truth an effective Social Technique. It can be achieved, and, under proper leadership, it will be realized in this generation.

WAR AND HUMAN NATURE

Some skeptics continue to insist that "So long as human nature remains as it is there will be wars." But such doubting Thomases should be reminded that exactly the same thing was said of dueling, witch-burning, religious intolerance, human slavery, the double standard, and political autocracy. But dueling made its exit when the court of honour became the court of justice. Witch-burning lost its shadows in the light of aroused compassion. Religious intolerance surrendered when intellectual freedom focused its strength. The shackles fell from human slavery when public opinion was enacted into law. Women's right triumphed when organized weakness defied prejudice and tradition. Autocracy crumbled when a united Democracy touched hands around the world. One more enemy of man, and the greatest, remains unconquered—War. But wars, too, shall cease when we learn that future victories shall not be to the violent, but to those united in Non-Violence.

All these social plagues have gradually disappeared from society, while human nature has continued about as it has always been. We may not be able to change human nature, but we have been able to change the nature of human thinking, and "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he." If by changing the nature of human thinking we have thereby been able to alter human conduct, we have achieved substantially the same result as might have been achieved by an actual change of human nature.

Religion has sometimes claimed the power to miraculously change human nature, but it has remained for the gradual power and process of Education to change the nature of human thinking regarding many social sins of civilization, and to-day millions of minds are changing and branding war as society's chief remaining social sin.

COMMUNISM
THE STORY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY
By GUY A. ALDRED

THE CASE FOR A PACIFIST CHURCH

By
WALLACE HANCOCK AND FRANK HANCOCK.

1. Many Christian Pacifists are in a dilemma. They are probably members of Churches, which have great traditions. These associations have often been life-long, and a deep affection is felt for the spiritual soil from which they have sprung. Yet they know that for at least four years they have received little or no spiritual help from their Church. They can take no part in its witness. The truest and deepest emotions revolt against Services from which they should have drawn strength and inspiration. These are tragic years in their own personal lives. They are fraught with even greater consequence for the Church and the Nation. Yet, as Church members they are not only impotent, but would seem to connive, albeit unwillingly, in the preaching of a war-time gospel to which they are irrevocably opposed. There would appear to be two ways out of the dilemma. There is the Society of Friends, which for centuries has stood for pacifism, and has in all times and circumstances, resolutely testified against the necessity and legitimacy of the war-method. For some it has been natural to apply for Membership of the Society. The majority of Christian Pacifists, however, for certain reasons have not been able to avail themselves of this course. To such, the idea of a Pacifist Church makes a strong appeal.

2. It is timely that we should clarify our ideas of what a Church is. Clearly, in many minds, "Church" is linked with the acceptance of certain theological beliefs and certain outward forms of worship. Most priests and ministers claim to be in either the apostolic succession, or to have been ordained authoritatively, and thus have become authentic interpreters of the Divine Will. Christian pacifists from their own experience, deny the validity of this claim. They deny that the Holy Spirit runs in ministerial and priestly channels, either exclusively or chiefly. This leads us to doubt whether Dr. Belden's movement "Pax Christi" can ever succeed. We hope it will. He is enlisting men and women of pacifist tendencies, who bind themselves to renounce war when their own Church or Denomination gives it authority. Our fear is that the Churches have lost their authority. Any Divine Authority must be at least rational, according to the light of its day. The Churches are teaching that nations and men can in these days gather grapes of thorns, and figs of thistles. Pacifists are driven then to agree with the Archbishop of Canterbury that the difference between pacifist and non-pacifist is "profound and incapable of adjustment." So far then, from waiting for the "Churches" authority to embrace pacifism, we question whether the Christian Gospel is any longer safe in the hands of the present-day Churches. They are enthusiastically supporting principles which are the negation of Christianity, and against which a pacifist must protest with all his mind and soul.

Rev. Hickman Johnson, in an apologetic for war-time Christianity writes:

"Some of the criticisms to be brought against the Church can be summed up in the sentence 'the Church has failed to be a Church.' No one dare assert that the full Biblical hope of the Church is realised in the separated dwindling communities we to-day in this country and the continent call the Church. Nor would anyone venture to absolve the Church of sloth, cowardice, pride and selfishness in its own inner life and its outward influence. . . . It has broken the laws of God within its own confines; it has repeatedly and signally failed to give effective witness against racial, international, social and economic injustice."

We agree, and many pacifists have left the Church. But it is the acceptance of war by the Churches as an instrument of Divine policy, as the Christian method of dealing with evil, which Christian pacifists will in no-wise recognise. So that Christian unity is already seriously broken, and cannot be restored until the Churches forever renounce their faith in war, and condemn all violent sanctions to implement the Gospel of Forgiveness and Love. We know that the use of coercive violence is a denial of the whole Christian ethic.

3. For many pacifists it will not be possible at the close of hostilities to "agree to differ" on this subject. Neither will they attempt to condone the Churches' endorsement and encouragement of "man's inhumanity to man." For yet again, for the third time in one generation, it is even more indelibly recorded, beyond chance of denial, that the leaders of the Churches, and laymen alike, whilst professing supreme faith in the way of Christ, have enthusiastically supported war. Recently they applauded a Prime Minister who said of his enemies: "We will make them bleed and burn in every way that it is possible." Indeed not only Church members, but thoughtful people everywhere are bewildered at, and ashamed of, the religious pronouncements of the Churches. Christian Pacifists are therefore not concerned with maintaining a unity that extends to matters of dogma, ritual and Church government, but does not embrace the far weightier and more essential practices incumbent upon all Christians. Would not He who, when face to face with the dead Church of Judaism, declared, "But I say unto you," confront and confound the war-ridden Christian Church to-day with an even greater challenge to its forfeited authority? Would He not be calling out of the Churches to-day, evangelists of a truer gospel, which should lay again solid foundations of His Kingdom of Love and Peace? For there can be no reconciliation between good and evil, no working agreement between the true and the false. The difference in moral principle between those who consider for instance that mass bombing is compatible with the teaching of Jesus and those who do not, is clear, admitted and unambiguous and is not open to reconciliation.

The Christian Pacifist stands for the way of reconciliation. This means the reverse of compromise between principles. He stands for the reconciling of the works of man to God. The war has revealed again the cleavage between man, and man's Church and God, and there can be no reconciliation between us and the Churches until they repent and utterly renounce the way of war. At the same time we deplore our separation in thought and Christian workship from Christians in the Churches. We shall endeavour to combat any spiritual pride and strive to maintain a spirit of love towards our fellows. Indeed our pacifist principles must make for fellowship. Yet non-pacifists will at once admit the fundamental difficulty of two groups, with such differing conceptions of God's Way and Will, worshipping and working together in the same Church.

But what is becoming increasingly intolerable is that Christians dominated by a conception of the pacifist way of life should continue in Churches in which their essential faith is repudiated. Some Churches are "tolerant" towards the individual pacifist, yet quite illogically deny the validity and resent the expression of his deepest insight into God's ways.

Is there any escape from the conclusion that, if the pacifist's way of life is God's method of individual and world salvation, then that gospel must have free and unrestricted outlet? It must not be crabbed, confined, censored, censured and jostled as a minority movement in Churches that admit they are sub-Christian.

This essay is written with the purpose of inviting Christian Pacifists to express their convictions on this subject. The authors wish to gauge the strength of the desire to overcome the dilemma with which we are all confronted, and to take action along these lines, if such action seems to be widely and deeply indicated.

C.O. WEEK: AN OPPORTUNITY

By DENIS HAYES

Publications' Editor, C.B.C.O.

September 19th-26th is "C.O. WEEK." Its aim is to show the unity of all C.O.s and to provide financial help for the C.B.C.O., 6 Endsleigh Street, London, W.C.1

There are some topics you can talk about until the crack of doom with great pleasure to all concerned and some that fail to capture your interest right from the beginning.

The forthcoming "C.O. WEEK" provides a suitable opportunity to find out into which category the work of the Central Board for Conscientious Objectors falls. It is a technical kind of work and you might think at first sight that it would be anything but interesting. Like all jobs it has its routine patches, but more often it is so full of human interest that it inspires and stimulates. And there is one great advantage: the issues that face the Board are so practical and concrete that it is impossible to allow your attention to lapse into that kind of social day-dreamnig that spells ruin to planned and consistent policy. The Board builds no "castles in Euston."

The Board originated in the National Joint Advisory Bureau that was set up some months before the outbreak of war to deal with the problems raised by the imposition of conscription. January, 1940, saw the beginning of the Board proper when the cardinal principle of equality was laid down. The aim of the Board was to look after the interests of all C.O.s, whether religious, political, humanitarian or ethical, whether or not they belonged to any body affiliated to the Board, and whatever stand their compulsion bade them take. This as Fenner Brockway, Chairman of the C.B.C.O., has pointed out, is the one principle of the Board. All human effort is open to criticism, but the fact remains that there has been a greater unity of effort in the very diversity of the C.O. movement in this war than in the last. This fellow-feeling has been focussed in the Central Board.

There are now seventeen constituent bodies of the Board, including the Society of Friends, Independent Labour Party, Women's Co-operative Guild, Peace Pledge Union, and Fellowship of Reconciliation. It co-ordinates the work of sixteen Regional Boards, one for each Tribunal area. The particular job of a Regional Board, as its name implies, is to advise C.O.s in the region, to care for their dependants in need, and to arrange for regular observers to report the proceedings of the Local Tribunal. On the "ground floor" are 360 local advisory bureaux and individual advisors to whose devoted work the C.O.s of this war owe so much.

The Board itself meets at Friends House, London, every six weeks and it is a real experience to be one of the forty or fifty representatives who attend, listening at one moment to a soft-tongued Londoner and at the next to the indignant tones of a Welshman or the slow voice of a Scot. To have the Political Secretary of the I.L.P. sitting happily next to the Recording Clerk of the Society of Friends and the Chairman of the Peace Pledge Union is somehow a reassuring sight in these days of strife and division.

It is not easy to give a proper impression of the scope of the Board's work in a few words, and it is easiest perhaps to look at it in a number of different aspects. First, broad questions of policy are hammered out after full discussion. Through the singlemindedness of the Board the whole tendency to "Cat and Mouse" treatment —the repeated prosecution of C.O.s for successive offences of essentially the same kind—has been fought ditch by ditch for three and a half years, and fought with some success. Prosecutions in the Army, for refusing medical examination, for fire-watching offences, for refusing industrial work, all come within the wide implications of this problem. In addition, the duties of the Non-Combatant Corps and of Civil Defence C.O.s as well as the conditions of landworkers have been the subject of frequent intervention.

Another aspect is the publishing side. The monthly C.B.C.O. Bulletin gives facts and figures that bring up to date the C.O. position in its various aspects. Pamphlets about the National Service Acts, about Prison Routine and Courts-Martial as well as the twelve penny Broadsheets can all be obtained from the Strickland Press. Ask for a free copy of "Trials of Conscience," the Board's report for 1943.

A third aspect is that of Public Relations, an elastic term that covers the taking up with Government and other departments of countless cases of individual difficulty. C.O.s in the Air Force taken overseas while resisting service, men given illegal police court sentences and cases of brutal treatment of C.O.s in the Army are fair examples.

The answering of hundreds of enquiries at the Board's office, the keeping for posterity of complete records and statistics of the C.O.s of the second generation and much other work remain. All this work cannot be done without money, and the Board's need is pressing. Will you support "C.O. WEEK" and help the work along? Send a donation to the Board at its office, 6 Endsleigh Street, London, W.C.1.

FROM A NEW ZEALAND PRISON

Paparua Prison,
Canterbury,
New Zealand,
29/5/43.

Dear Guy,—It is indeed refreshing to hear of you though I must confess that I haven't written to you since my imprisonment commenced at the beginning of December, 1941, though I do believe my wife wrote. In spite of what you say, I envy you folk your liberties. If you were here I'm afraid that you'd be doing about 100 years for all your sins! There are consolations in the very worst of situations. "The Word" I find of great interest, a bundle having arrived from England recently.

My present two year sentence for subversion expires in May 1944, though prior to its commencement I had served two periods of three months as a military defaulter, a mild case of "cat and mouse," and I expect that the game will be resumed after May 1943 as the Magistrate told me on two occasions that I was not a fit person for the defaulters' (conscientious objectors) detention camp as I might subvert the others! My attitude has been, and still is, of course, one of uncompromising and absolute opposition so I see nothing but prison ahead of me for the duration of the war. A bleak outlook indeed, but so far I've fought off despondency. In fact, the progress? of events convinces and continually convinces one more than ever. This should amuse you. In the last war my offence was known as "sedition" and our present Labour P.M. and several of his cabinet ministers were imprisoned then for sedition. A change of name eases slightly a troubled conscience.

I'm afraid prison regulations forbid mention of prison conditions, etc., but I think I'll be allowed to say that after having read "Gowrie's" details in "Forward," the N.Z. conditions are generally superior. In most cases the C.O.s do a month or two in prison before passing on to detention camp for the duration. There must be nearly 1000 there now. Less than 12½ per cent. receive exemption which is usually conditional upon paying your wage surplus above soldiers' rates (and allowances) into the Social Security Fund. Paper shortage, so best wishes in the good work.—Cheerily and fraternally yours,

MICHAEL YOUNG.

UNITED SOCIALIST MOVEMENT MEETINGS.—Sunday, September 5, Guy Aldred speaks in the Central Halls, Bath Street, Glasgow, at 6 p.m. He will speak the first Sunday in every month thereafter at the same time, up to and including the first Sunday in May 1944.

DEFICIT APPEAL ANNOUNCEMENT.—Owing to pressure on our space we have been compelled to hold this announcement another month. Meantime, since the paper is produced at a loss, your donation will be welcome. Statement next month without fail.

DUKE'S "MORE MONEY" CURE FOR NATION'S ILLS.

REMARKABLE MOTHERWELL MEETING.

At the Empire Theatre on Sunday night a large audience sat for almost three hours while from platform and audience speeches and remarks were made on the war and post-war situations. An outstanding address was given by the Duke of Bedford on the reform of the monetary system and how money should be brought to the service of the people.

MOTHERWELL ON SWIVEL CHAIR—

Before the Duke spoke the audience was treated to an address by Mr. Guy Aldred, a well-known Glasgow personality who, in the course of his address remarked that Motherwell was a strange place for it was in Motherwell in 1914 that he was charged with being a German spy, as if German spies went to the market place and addressed Socialist meetings. It was in Motherwell also that Walton Newbold was returned as the first Communist M.P., and it was there Mr. Newbold despatched the famous telegram to Moscow intimating that Motherwell had been won for Communism. Since then Motherwell had been represented in Parliament by four different M.P.s, but while the member of Parliament changed, the slums of Motherwell remained.

—ALSO COMMUNISTS

In a criticism of the Communist Party Mr. Aldred said that members of that party gave their allegiance not to this country but to Soviet Russia. They opposed the war when Norway, Belgium and France were invaded and said it was not their war. They changed their tune when Russia was attacked—it was their war then, and they wanted a Second Front at all costs.

BREAKING DOWN PREJUDICE

The Duke of Bedford said there was a good deal of prejudice between monetary reformers and socialists. This state of affairs was unfortunate and it had to be broken down. The former said that monetary reform meant everything and the Socialists said that nationalisation of wealth and property meant everything. His own view was that monetary reform was essential, Socialism or no Socialism.

With regard to monetary reform there were one or two maxims he would wish to leave with them. He wished to affirm that schemes for the people's welfare, if they were physically possible of accomplishment, should never be turned aside because there was no money to finance them. He would say, however, that money was not everything, because there were many monied people who were unhappy in the midst of all their wealth, but on the other hand there were ever so many of the poorer classes to whom a little more money would be a blessing.

Inflation he would describe as a state of affairs when we had more money than could be backed by goods and services. It was in the interest of the ordinary citizen that money should be plentiful and it was in the interests of the financier that money was scarce, so that people would come to him for loans.

"The realities of sound finance are the most unsound things indeed," the Duke continued. He reminded his listeners of the trade boom that started after the last war and said there was no reason why that had not continued, as there was abundance of goods and labour at that time.

The financiers did not like this post-war prosperity. Employers were financing themselves and were in a measure independent of the banks. The financiers insisted that the country should go back on to the gold standard.

"The tyranny of debt and finance is every bit as cruel as the Nazi tyranny," said the speaker as he drew a vivid picture of the difficulties ensuing when a country exported to such considerable value that the debtor country could never hope to give goods in exchange. Where it was impossible to make a return in seven years, the debt should be wiped off. In any sensible financial system money must be in relation to desired goods and services. He foresaw that in the immediate post-war period it would be absolutely necessary to continue the rationing system.

POST-WAR PROSPECTS

"Every citizen should receive an equal ration and have enough to give a fair price for them," the Duke continued. Britain was a small country and she would need imports to give her people a higher standard of life. If a large measure of our export trade was lost and other countries stopped sending us imports our share of prosperity from trade might be very little indeed. It was a familiar saying that God helped those who helped themselves. The working people must suffer most in any post-war depression and it was up to them to prevent it in so far as it was in their power. God had given them intelligence and he meant them to use it in every direction.

LIVELY QUESTION TIME

In questions the Duke was asked what he had done to help the workers to get better housing and what help did he give the workers in the General Strike of 1926.

The Duke answered that in 1926 he was still a comparatively young man, still feeling his way, and he was afraid that he did not do anything to help at that time. He had, however, acquainted himself with working-class life in Portsmouth with particular reference to adequate incomes.

Asked if he favoured the nationalisation of finance under a Socialist Government the Duke said he was in favour of national control of the banking system but he would leave the banks free to choose their own personnel.

FREE DISCUSSION

An hour was allowed for free discussion and the time was fully utilised. Two ladies and some eight or ten gentlemen took part and much variety of view and opinion was manifested. An R.A.F. man in uniform said we must strive to maintain the same unity in this country as we had after Dunkirk.

In contrast to the many other points of view expressed a man rose and said that we should remind ourselves that the greatest thing in the world was children. We must shape the world to suit the children; we must give them the best we can now, if we were to look for them giving their best. When he came to die he would like to be surrounded by his children and hear one say in token of farewell, "Cheerio, dad, you've made a grand job of us."

Both speakers replied to the discussion.

DUKE'S CLOSING WORDS

Closing the discussion, the Duke said that foreign policy must be based on the new principle of treating all other countries as we should like to be treated if we were in their place. The world's wealth of raw materials must be available for all States.

In regard to Italy the Duke said there was no saying what form of Government would be ruling in Italy when peace came to be signed. Pronouncements made here that Italy would lose all her colonies were not likely to help the democratic elements in Italy. In regard to both Italy and Germany after the war he thought we should do business with them on the basis of actions and not words. We should be able to send representations to Germany and Italy to see how promises are kept and we should allow the same privilege to our former enemies. If we adopted this line we would be mobilising public opinion in Germany and Italy for peace much more effectively than by keeping an army of foreign teachers.

The meeting was most orderly throughout.

—"Motherwell Times," Friday, Aug. 13, 1943.

The report of the meeting published in "The Hamilton Advertiser," for August 14, was briefer than that which appeared in "The Motherwell Times," but included some items omitted in the latter's report. We reproduce the "Advertiser" account below:—

POLITICAL OPEN FORUM
DUKE OF BEDFORD URGES MONETARY REFORM

The Duke of Bedford, whose recent visit to Lanarkshire aroused considerable political interest and Mr. Guy Aldred, Glasgow, a well-known anti-Parliamentarian Communist, were the speakers at an open forum, held under Motherwell I.L.P. Branch auspices in the Empire Theatre on Sunday night. Mr. James Johnston, who presided, said it was the desire of the Motherwell I.L.P. to bring personalities of the political world to its open forum and, provided they had the courage of their convictions, they were worthy of a hearing.

Mr. Aldred dealt with the subject of "The War—And After," while the Duke of Bedford spoke at length on the principles of monetary reform, particular reference being made to the operation of the gold standard. The gold standard system, he said, could be used by the financiers to bring misery to the people of the country. His Grace also gave illustrations of how financiers exercised control in industry and of their influence on the press and politics. If world peace was to be obtained in the future, countries must realise that national selfishness was just as bad as personal selfishness.

Both speakers answered many questions on points in their addresses. Later an hour and a half's open discussion followed, in which speakers of widely divergent views discussed pacifism, Fascism, anti-Communim, peace and housing.

In dealing with housing the Duke said that it was almost hopeless at the present time to direct the necessary materials to housing construction. Directly the war was finished the matter must be given attention. In very many places the houses were a disgrace, especially in mining areas. Conditions which he saw in his recent tour were so bad that he intended to raise the question in the House of Lords.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I thank you for your letter acknowledging receipt of £1 10/- from our members and have much pleasure in forwarding a further donation of £1 towards the deficit fund.

In following the lead given by Comrades Maxton, McGovern and Campbell Stephen, we recognise the powerful influence of "The Word" these days and the courage and fearlessness of its Editor.

The need for Socialist unity is greater to-day than ever before if we are to rally the forces of reason, truth and progress.

With commonsense and understanding this can be acomplished and we are prepared to do everything in our power to bring this about.

With best wishes.—Yours fraternally,

W. E. CURRIE,
Organising Secretary,
Motherwell. Motherwell I.L.P.

Dear Sir,—Once again I take this liberty in writing you this letter. I trust this will express my sincere thanks to you, and all concerned in "The Word" for your gallant stand in such difficult times.

I know that there is a danger in admiration to the extent of hero-worship, or idolatry, man-worship. To me Christ is the Centre of all my worship. I am determined that Christ shall be Centre of all my Politics, but I must once again express my deep admiration to the Duke of Bedford for his courageous Christian stand.

The Leighton Buzzard Conservatives, to satisfy their petty desires, employed a stonemason who, with hammer and chisel erased the Duke's name from the foundation stone. To the "Daily Worker" I would like to say, you may delight in the "Chiselling off the Duke," but deeply imprinted in the minds of all peace-loving peoples is an admiration so strong and clear, that no chisels of the warmongers shall ever obliterate it.

To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in it a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it, Rev. 2, 17.—Yours in true friendship,

D. G. LODWICK.

Briton Ferry, July 22.

My Dear Guy,—I attended a lecture, under the auspices of the Eduation Committee of the I.L.P., in Lynn Park the other Saturday. Jim Taylor, one of the old members of the I.L.P., read an essay on "The moral issue of Socialism." I enjoyed it thoroughly. He, to my mind, put up a stonewall case for anti-parliamentarism. I found myself in complete agreement with his powerful essay (it took him an hour and ten minutes to read it) in which he appealed to the I.L.P. to get back to the old way and educate the younger members in the A B C's, as he termed it, of Socialism.

I noticed some of the Glasgow Councillors there. This afforded me some fun. The speaker got their "dander" up by his powerful indictment of the political place-seeker, and the revolutionary who becomes drugged by an overdose of applause and popularity.

Best wishes meantime and all power to your elbow in the struggle.—Fraternally yours,

HUGH LAMBERT.

Paisley.

Dear Friend Aldred,—Your correspondent, Tom Pickering ("The Word," July 1943) thinks it would be better had you "gone forward with humanism to Christianity." Would that Tom Pickering and the few other existent pacifist parsons were to become recipients of just that modicum of discernment necessary to perceive that their particular trade is itself, at best, both fundamentally and essentially, sub-Christian.

In his book, "Inquisition and Liberty," (Heinemann), p. 12, G. G. Coulton says:

"Justin Martyr claims that, 'philosophers like Socrates and Heraclitus were essentially Christians, since they lived for truth, and Christ is Truth.'"

There is, and ever has been, but one true religion: a way of life, proper to man: the way which is based upon the operations of the Spirit of Truth in the minds of mankind. These operations—the Light within—constitute the sole and wholly sufficent touchstone by which Truth can be determined. There is no superior authority. This Light is Reality. It utterly transcends all the notions which, founded on more or less dubious History and Tradition, form the stock-in-trade of the agglomeration of professional purveyors, speciously and spuriously called "The Church." It is not forced upon any; but manifests Itself to all; and is accessible to all who practise "waiting upon God."

Every time I see the facsimile of your "Certificate of Ordination" ("The Word," May 1943), it reminds me of the imprint of King and Queen on a childs' coronation or jubilee mug! What a foible for you to treasure and parade! For, as long ago as 12th September 1909, someone wrote in "Reynold's Newspaper": "Aldred . . . is a participator in that universal Spirit which is the torch-bearer of progress, and the most potent factor in Society."

Humanism is "the study of human interests: the disposition of mind proper to man" (Nuttall's Dictionary). No precepts for human interests can surpass those contained in "The Sermon on the Mount." No disposition of mind can be proper to man than that directed towards attainment of the Unsurpassable. Hence, where applied Humanism is, there is Christianity. Conversely, where applied Christianity is, there is Humanism.

The cult of superstition and ritualism whether set up and fostered by Rome, Anglia, the Humanist Society of Friends or any other Corporation, has no more justification within the compass of the New Order promulgated by Jesus, than has legalised Bank forgery, or War.—With fraternal regards,

CHAS. W. D. NEWMAN.

Stroud, July 7.

Dear Sir,—There seems to be a great deal of anti-Jewish feeling abroad to-day. There is one aspect of this case that might act favourably for Jews. If the Jewish Authorities would fall into line with modern practice in regard to the humane slaughter of animals, they would reap the benefit in increase of sympathy from all lovers of animals. At present their "Kosher" butchers are exempt from the provisions of the Humane Slaughter of Animals Acts; still slaughter the poor unfortunate animals selected by them in a most primitive, cruel and bloodthirsty manner, amounting almost to vivisection. Very few people know this. —Yours faithfully,

JOHN SALTER.

Highbury, London, N.5.

Dear Comrade.—Re the article you published last month, from my pen, on the execution of Elrich and Alter. The pamphlet dealing with this case is issued by the Liberty Publishers, 2 Knightsbridge Court, Sloan St., London, S.W.1, at 2d., post free, 3d.

The paid hirelings of the Communist Party have done everything in their power to represent the indignation aroused by this atrocious assassination as the result of "Polish intrigues" in our midst. The complete falsity of this assertion of the Communist Party will be plain to any thinking person who considers the following facts:—

A Committee of 230 representatives of the American Labour Movement, supported by the American Federation of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organisations, issued a statement which ontained these words:

"We reject categorically the absurd and nonsensical accusation, that Erlich and Alter were supposed to advocate a separate peace with Germany. The attempt to slander those two martyrs, which aims at throwing a shadow on their faithfulness to the ideals of progress and humanity is shameless and vile."

This Committee organised a great meeting at the Mocca Temple in New York on March 30th, 1943, to protest against the murder of their comrades. It was attended and addressed by Mayor La Guardia of New York, Wm. Green (President of the American Federation of Labour), and other outstanding opponents of Hitlerism.

La Guardia compared the executions to those of Sacco and Vanzetti, and other speakers described the charges as "cynical fabrications."

The meeting, composed of 3,500 delegates of Trade Unions, adopted a resolution which expressed its "indignation and protest against the execution of Henryk Elrich and Victor Alter, internationally known labour union leaders of Poland," and "scornfully rejected" the charges that they had in any way assisted Fascism.

The entire American democratic press expressed similar indignation at the murder.

In spite of these protests the wretched "Russia Today Society" is already in the market with a pamphlet entitled "The Polish Conspiracy" in which it is asserted that, "during February and March, 1943, Polish emigre politicians both in Britain and America conducted a widespread ampaign to rouse public indignation against the execution of two Polish Bundists, Alter and Erlich," and that "the Polish National Council in London saw fit to issue a statement denying the treachery of "these two Polish would-be quislings."

Not one word is said about the great protests of International Labour!—Yours fraternally,

H. W. HENDERSON.

FOUR YEARS OF WAR.

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Four years of war leave the issue still undecided. In the Far East Japan is entrenched in positions of enormous military strength from which, if it is possible to do so at all, she will only be evicted at an immense cost in British and American lives. Moreover, the fruits of victory would only be the recovery of territory to which the Allies, in the first instance, had as little moral right as Japan. Whether oil and rubber are worth the sacrifice of human lives would be for the relatives of the casualties to decide.

It might of course be argued that we are not merely fighting to regain oil and rubber but to demonstrate to the peoples of Asia the just retribution that falls on a wicked militarist aggressor, but in view of the not too glorious record of the white races in the Far East and of our present repressive policy in India, it is more than doubtful whether the demonstration would affect the peoples of Asia as deeply as we might desire or in the precise manner we should wish!

In Europe the result of the war still seems to depend mainly upon what happens in Russia, for Russia's geographical position and enormous reserves of man-power make her by far the most formidable enemy of the Axis. On this point agreement appears fairly general. The Soviet government has more than once emphasised the fact that Russia has borne the brunt of the fighting. Russia's admirers in Allied countries have shown their appreciation of the same point by their insistent demand for a Second Front. German propaganda has itself always represented the Eastern battle as the key point in the whole struggle. If, therefore, the food situation and terrible casualties should compel Russia to negotiate and Axis troops and aircraft could be withdrawn from the Eastern Front, not only might the position of British and American Forces in Southern Europe become serious to a degree but we might experience in our own country terrible reprisals for our air raids on German cities.

If, on the other hand, the vast resources of Russia in men and materials enabled her to wear down her opponents, the result would be an Allied victory in the West . . . but what would the nature of that victory be? Certainly it would not be a victory for freedom and democracy. Rather would the battle for the restoration of true freedom and true democracy then begin and the men of vision and goodwill who waged it would find themselves confronted by tremendous odds. In Britain, militarism, Vansittartism and bureaucracy would be firmly entrenched and fortified by conscription and the lawless tyranny of Regulation 18B, while the long years of war domination by the State would have weakened the people's desire for freedom and lowered moral standards in many directions. In the U.S.A. bureaucracy has also gained in power and evidence is not lacking that the worst blunder of Versailles—failure to provide adequately for the economic needs of the defeated nations—would be repeated by the victorious Allies. In fact there is every reason to anticipate that victory by the present Allied governments would mean, in Europe, the replacement of the Nazi and Fascist tyrannies by the tyranny of the Soviet Government and the tyranny of International Finance—a change hardly worth the cost of the war! Whatever the achievements of the Soviet Government—and I do not deny that in certain directions they may be considerable—it is as much a cruel bureaucratic tyranny as its rivals and it is feared by small neighbouring States as a proved aggressor. In saying this I do not mean to suggest any unfriendliness towards the people of Russia with whom I believe we can live on neighbourly terms; nor do I even mean to suggest that in the interests of the people of Russia, our own interests, and everyone else's, we should not try and make the best of the Soviet Government in spite of its defects. While being prepared to do this, it is well, however, that we should face realities and have no sentimental illusions based on propaganda. With regard to International Finance, the Morgenthau plan, Mr. Churchill's close association with American financiers and the rumour that Sir Otto Niemeyer may succeed Mr. Montagu Norman as Governor of the Bank of England are straws already showing in which direction the wind might blow. Sir Otto Niemeyer is a reactionary orthodox economist of the worst type, the effect of whose financial policy, especially in the Antipodes, has earned him the profound distrust of all enlightened monetary reformers. The Axis Governments, whatever their faults in other directions, have at least delivered Europe from the despotism of Finance which, by restricting the money-supply in the interests of usurers and currency speculators, maintained poverty in the midst of potential plenty. The financiers of Wall Street and the City would, however, quickly reimpose that despotism—unless, of course, prevented by Soviet Russia, whose future policy on money and trade questions remains somewhat of an enigma.

In the United States there are fortunately monetary reformers and people enlightened and high-principled on other matters whose close co-operation we must seek in the post-war battle for the restoration of freedom. Unluckily, however, these good comrades are at present in the minority as regards numbers and influence. Power, financial and political, is in the hands of men of a very different type and this one day, we may learn to our cost, unless we are able to play our cards with firmness and exceeding wisdom.

In the meantime as long as the issue of the war is undecided it remains the duty of the people of goodwill to do everything to promote a just peace by negotiation, the two main features of which are a fair sharing of the world's economic resources and the abandonment by every nation of policies towards its neighbours which it would resent if applied to itself. For such a peace the rank and file of the people of all the belligerent states are by now more than ready, educated as they have been, by the purgatory of modern war. It becomes increasingly evident, however, the longer the war continues, that complete victory for either side would prove a moral disaster. What is needed is a compromise in which neither belligerent is embittered and humiliated by post-war military occupation of its country, but both are compelled to surrender the right to dominate and to exploit and both are obliged to confess with shame, "Well, if only we had had a bit more sense, we could have come to this arrangement at the start. We have gained, by war, nothing which we could not have gained just as well without it, had passion and prejudice not usurped the place of reason, honesty and goodwill."

GLASGOW NO. 1 TRIBUNAL.

On Thursday, July 15, the editor accompanied Miss Maria Bertolini before Glasgow No. 1 Tribunal. Miss Bertolini read her case and Sir A. Campbell Black, K.C., as chairman, brought out the facts in this case with sympathy and understanding. This was the third case heard that morning and two cases followed. Miss Bertolini was given unconditional exemption on Pacifist grounds. She is a Catholic and a member of Pax, although the last fact did not arise and is, to some extent, irrelevant. In the other cases, one was granted conditional exemption and three were refused.

It will be recalled that on Tuesday, November 1, 1942, the editor accompanied Miss Bertolini's younger sister before the same Tribunal. She also received a most fair hearing and was granted unconditional exemption.

GOD AND WAR.

By Councillor CHARLES A. EARL

"WE PRAISE THEE O GOD, WE ACKNOWLEDGE THEE TO BE THE LORD."

Christians bomb Berlin, London, Hamburg, Coventry, Rome, Canterbury, Tokio, Shanghai, Moscow, Helsinki, Paris, Rotterdam, Antwerp, etc., etc.

Our machine is loaded with big and beautiful bombs, luscious four thousand pounders and thousands of brilliant flaming incendiaries. The members of the crew have taken their places and only await the chaplain's blessing before taking off on their errand of brotherly love and mercy. O for the wings of a dove is not sung because the long flight requires stronger wings than those of a dove, and anyway if we could see doves they might easily be mistaken for "birds of peace" instead of "birds of prey" and that would never do.

We are off, steadily but swiftly rising into God's glorious heaven, brilliant with moon and stars. O peaceful night, only disturbed by the roar of bomber engines going to their work of destroying evil things. These splendid machines with their lovely loads bought with the pennies of Christians, including children of whom Jesus said "Suffer them to come unto me, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." We are approaching our target, the navigator is directing the skipper, the bomb aimer is taking careful aim, bomb doors are opened; "they are away" the bombardier cries, and the skies are rent with flame and noise. We are reminded of the well-known hymn:—

"When God of old came down from Heaven
In power and wrath He came.
Before His feet the clouds were riven
Half darkness and half flame."

And our work done, we returned home rejoicing, evil things have been destroyed.

EVIL THINGS ARE DESTROYED.

A Christian Mother Receives "The Blessings From Above."

Listen children! Is that the syren? Get up and dress quickly we must try and reach the shelter. I do hope poor old grand-dad and all the other sick folk in hospitals will not be too frightened or hurt.

"Holy Father in Thy mercy
Hear our anxious prayer
Keep our loved ones, now far absent
Neath Thy care."

Come along quickly dears, I can hear the aeroplanes. Look! The incendiary bombs are lighting the whole city up. Crash! Crash! Crash! Those big and beautiful bombs drown the cries of the children. "Suffer them to come unto me." They are coming, God, in their thousands, and many of them are suffering too.

The "all clear" sounds, Heaven's morning breaks, but earth's vain shadows do not flee. All is desolation and misery. If those big and beautiful bombs do only destroy evil things, then indeed the world is very evil, because the destruction is complete.

Homes, churches, hospitals, shops and factories are destroyed, the bodies of God's children lie amid the ruins, the Christian soldiers have in very truth done their work well.

OUR RULERS ORDER A DAY OF PRAYER AND THANKSGIVING.

We go to God's Houses (those that are left standing) in Berlin, London, Hamburg, Coventry, Rome, Canterbury, Tokio, Shanghai, Moscow, Helsinki, Rotterdam, Antwerp, New York, Washington, Cape Town, Canberra, etc., etc.

We give thanks to a loving Father that He has blessed our arms and endeavours and that we have been enabled to destroy so many evil things.

What is that you say! We are all God's children, and God is indeed a God of love, the Father of ALL men! How can that be? Were not our Christian soldiers and those big beautiful bombs they dropped, blessed by God's minister before being sent to destroy evil things? How can those children who were destroyed, be God's children, and at the same time be evil things and only fit for destruction? Those children made in God's own image and with God's spirit within each one of them! How very confusing it all is. Don't let us think about it, let us leave it to our rulers and God's ministers.

We rise from our knees, and sing

" Praise God from whom all blessings flow."
" Now thank we all our God."

BENEDICTION (The peace of God, which passeth all understanding).

The divine service is over and we are returning to our work of making bigger and better beautiful bombs, strengthened and refreshed, and to prepare the way for another day of prayer and thanksgiving.

THINK IT OVER.

Does what I have written sound profane? Yet I say in no uncertain voice that it is profane and blasphemous to give thanks to God because His children have been maimed and killed in their millions. Would we admit that when bombs were dropped anywhere in England that God was responsible? No! and by the same token the German people know quite well that God is not responsible for their sufferings.

God does indeed work in mysterious ways, His wonders to perform, but I am very confident that His ways are ways of love, not ways of brutal warfare and indiscriminate destruction, and the Brotherhood of Man shall be achieved.

ment of the German people, we should do much to destroy the influence of German war propaganda in keeping the German army and people fighting and working to avoid defeat of Nazi Germany and thereby save British and Allied as well as German and Italian lives.

As for denial of food relief for mothers and children in Nazi occupied countries I would say as the writer of the before-mentioned pamphlet on " Food Relief in the Second World War " says in his closing passage :

" It is easy enough to understand our duty. We have only to think how it would have been if our own island had been more closely blockaded, if we had watched helplessly while our men and wives and children sickened and died of hunger and disease, if our hopes rested on the avowed friendship of the Poles, the Greeks, the Belgians. Let us imagine what we would ask of them, for our children, if not for ourselves, AND THEN LET US DO UNTO OTHERS AS WE WOULD HAVE THEM DO TO US."

THE FOLLY OF VANSITTARTISM

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT (First Commissioner of Works, 1924 Labour Government).

[The following article from the pen of our comrade Jowett is culled from the " Bradford I.L.P. News " for July 2, 1943.—Ed.]

This year's Labour Party Conference declared itself in favour of the Vansittart policy concerning treatment of the German people after an Allied military victory. A motion in support of the Vansittart policy was carried by 1,542,000 votes against 966,000, and as the Editor of Forward, Emrys Hughes, remarks (June 26th) :

" nobody could have been surprised that the speeches made by various trade union leaders were widely quoted for consumption in Germany."

After the Conference resolution to support the Vansittart policy was carried, Will Lawther, leader of the British miners, broadcast a message to the German people explaining the resolution. He told the German people that whilst we have no wish to punish the German people and would give all help and support to those who have fought and fight against the Nazis :

" The whole British Labour Movement is united in the view that all those who support Nazism must totally destroyed."

" What does Will Lawther mean when he says that ' all those who support Nazism must be totally destroyed '? " asks Emrys Hughes in his editorial above referred to :

" Do not the great majority of the workers in Germany support Nazism at the present time just because they do not know what the alternative is to Nazism?

" Are not the German miners producing coal for the war machine just like our miners are doing and giving their sons to the Army, just like ours are doing, simply because they believe that if Nazism goes the Allied Armies will march in, occupy Germany, shut down the war industries, demobilise the Army, and plunge Germany into chaos, unemployment and starvation which will be even worse than war?

" That is undoubtedly the frame of mind of the German workers to-day. They may be terrified of the bombing, they may be shuddering at the prospect of the mass slaughter that is to come. They may be absolutely war weary and loathe the name of Hitler and all that he stands for, but when they are told across the ether by a British miners' leader that all those who support Nazism must be totally destroyed they think that means them, and they decide to fight on under the Nazis."

That any reasonable person should expect anything but stiff German and Italian resistance to Allied invasion of Europe as the combined effect of the Labour Party Conference resolution and the President of the British Miners' Federation's broadcast message, is to me, an amazing thing.

And is the stupendous cost in British and Allied lives of the invasion to which we have been committed so lightly regarded that we can afford to risk even the possibility of increasing the cost of it by wild and extravagant threats of punishment to follow if invasion is not successfully resisted?

Consider the magnitude of the task to which we have been committed. According to authoritative statements which are published more freely and in more precise form in the United States than in this country, not less than 200 divisions would have to be landed in Europe for an Allied invasion.

The number of men in a division varies as between infantry and armoured divisions, but about 16,000 may be the average number. Even if we reckon them as 15,000 each it means that three million men with all their guns, tanks, provisions and equipment, must be successfully landed against all enemy opposition, and thereafter reinforced and supplied constantly for what cannot be other than a long and ghastly campaign, the like of which has never been undertaken in all history.

How many more British and Allied lives will be lost and bodies mutilated by giving German war propaganda the priceless gift of last week's Labour Party Conference resolution and Will Lawther's broadcast message to the German people? It cannot be estimated, but Dr. Goebbels may be relied upon to make the utmost possible use of such admirable propaganda material to provoke the German Army and people into fighting and working more stubbornly and effectively to avoid defeat if possible.

If we were fully informed of the use made of the Vansittart punish-the-German-people policy (which is now, in sustance, officially approved by the Labour Party) and of British and Allied refusal to allow even vitamins and dried milk to go to the starving children of Belgium and of Vichy France, we should see more clearly the probably disastrous effect of thinking only of military operations to end the war.

We cannot afford to ignore the effect of our war strategy on public opinion in enemy and occupied countries if we wish to spare the lives and bodies of our own invading forces—even if we think only of them.

It cannot be otherwise than unhelpful, moreover, to the armed forces whose lives are at stake, and who have to move through occupied countries, that German wireless and press are telling the peoples of those countries that although there were controlled relief to Poland from 1939 until the Churchill Government took office, and that

" As far as the supplies from America were involved it was certified that the loss in transit was less than one-half of one per cent—that is to say, less than would have been lost by sending the same quantity over the United States railroad system in peace time. . . . Not one ounce of food has so far passed the blockade to the starving children of Belgium where four children died in 1942 for each one who died in 1938." (" Food relief in the second world war," by Roy Walker).

Not all the facts that will be recorded of this war, whenever there is peace again in the world, will tell of Nazi and Fascist atrocities as anti-axis war propaganda would lead us to believe. In the March 31st issue of an American publication, The Christian Century is an extract from a letter written by a boy of 21 in the Middle East to his Aunt relating the experience of a prisoner of war recaptured from the Germans. This is what the letter said :

" On one occasion, one of our chaps was wounded in No Man's Land, and I and some others crawled forward to try and get him. Every time I moved, a burst of bullets went over my head, and I wondered how they always missed me.

" This prisoner was with Jerry and watching me; the place I was in was littered with mines, and Jerry was FIRING OVER MY HEAD EVERY TIME TO STOP ME GETTING BLOWN UP. Afterwards one hundred and sixty mines were taken in the hundred yards I crawled over." (" Peace News," June 18th 1943).

And not all prisoner of war camps in Germany are conducted on the reputedly typical Draconial Nazi system as is proved by the following description of a prison camp for 3500 prisoners one and a half miles from Bremen which appeared in the News Chronicle, June 26th, 1943,

" In the camp there are 3,500 people of 37 nationalities. The conditions are healthy, though the food supplied by the Germans is very poor, and without the help of the Red Cross the inmates would never have had a decent meal.

" The only drink they got, they said, was " what the Germans call beer." The camp has a good hospital with five British doctors, one Indian doctor, and a dentist. There is a good theatre in the camp run by an English actor, Henry Mollison, brother of Clifford Mollison. Henry was a passenger in the Dalambra, sunk in the Atlantic. There is also an Indian theatre for lascars, who make all their dresses for shows. A sports organisation runs 32 football teams, and players have jerseys corresponding with their teams at home. It is the same with cricket and baseball. The latter is played chiefly by 70 Americans captured about a year ago.

There are schools of navigation and shorthand, with prisoners acting as teachers, and a library. All prisoners have 120 French cigarettes a month.

It is my belief that if we considered what little there is of good as well as all that is evil that Germany is responsible for in this war and considered also the effect of our threatened punish-

BIG ANTI-WAR MEETING IN GLASGOW

Ovations for Guy Aldred and the Duke of Bedford

By J. R. HENDERSON

The Cosmo Cinema, Glasgow, was filled to capacity on Sunday afternoon, September 12th, on the occasion of a public meeting held under the auspices of the No Conscription League. The speakers were Guy A. Aldred and the Duke of Bedford, and that both were given a patient, uninterrupted hearing and no single sign of disturbance was evident throughout the entire meeting confirms the idea that the opposition and hostility aroused against the Duke of Bedford does not come from the people, but is an artificial, worked-up press campaign directed against a man of integrity and courage. The audience was by no means a "private" one, for the meeting had been widely advertised, and at the week-end many pavements in the city streets bore chalked advertisements in huge letters, inviting the public to the meeting.

The chair was admirably taken by Oliver Brown, who, after a happy and witty speech, introduced the speakers.

The large audience showed its appreciation of Guy Aldred's long, untiring struggle in the fight for freedom by rousing cheers when he was called on to speak. The seasoned warrior made a powerful plea that we should recognise the forces which had brought the world to the present period of darkness and chaos.

Taking as his theme "The Lost Horizon," Guy Aldred said that we have got to-day a legacy, not of service, but of servitude to the state, and the greatest need is that we should come back to a sense of common human decency. The other day the Pope made a broadcast, in a very different tone from some of his former broadcasts. At the time of the Spanish Civil War in 1936 every declaration made by the Pope was on the side of Franco. The ruling powers of this country applauded the Catholic press when it stood behind Franco. Now the Pope calls upon all mankind to act as brothers, and the press of the country goes dumb. They are not interested. The Pope doesn't count unless he serves the cause of war. But there was not a word of protest when cities were destroyed in Spain.

Mr. Aldred spoke of the sorry business the ruling class has made of this world since the last war, the years of unemployment, poverty and hunger, and urged that people should stop to think about the meaning of this war and what is going to happen to those who come back. He had no time for the flag-waving, victory-shouting, shallow-minded people, who only lived for excitement. This "patriotic" hysteria was wasting people's lives. It was up to the whole Socialist movement to seek to regain its lost horizon, to become again a living force, and to deliver us from the bureaucracy and state servitude which is dominating our lives to an increasing extent to-day.

The Duke of Bedford, who was received with loud cheers, said that war is the supreme example of doing evil that good may come; of trying to do right things by wrong methods. Therefore, it is bound to end in failure. The original war objective of Britain was to liberate Poland, but it is now an open secret that if the Allies achieve victory in Europe, that victory will mainly be a Russian victory, and the Soviet Government has no intention of restoring to Poland any territory taken from that country. That means that the other great war objective — the liberation of small countries from the domination of powerful countries—will not be achieved. The result of that will be to substitute for the Fascist and Nazi tyrannies the tyranny of international finance and the Soviet tyranny. That did not mean that the Duke did not want friendly relations with the Soviet Government. We should try to make the best of every government. It is perfectly futile to lecture and threaten the government of another country as long as you have skeletons in your own cupboard.

Here in this country we are still paying for the Napoleonic Wars, because we tolerate a system which keeps us in servitude to big finance. The failure to achieve our war aims is already obvious. But it is the policy of our Government in the event of victory to establish a military tyranny over all Axis and Allied countries. Yet we failed to keep down even 5 million Irish. So we shall have to be the greatest militarist and conscript country in the world. Of all tyrannies military conscription is the worst. To-day it not only takes our men, but has extended its tentacles to women and children. In addition we have industrial conscription, depriving the worker of his freedom and breaking up his home.

At the present time we have something like two thousand Government rules and Regulations, and we are told the bureaucracy must be extended after the war. To-day the Prime Minister is increasingly independent of the Cabinet, and the Cabinet is increasingly independent of the House of Commons. The people are becoming more and more disenfranchised.

A great many people are getting so used to the tyranny of the State that they are getting servile and ready to accept its continuance. Our hope for the future must lie with those people of strong independent mind who realise that in resisting State servitude to-day they are serving and fighting for the freedom of future generations. We may say, in fact, Freedom is dead; defend it with all your might.

Our immediate duty, by wise and courageous influence upon our fellows, is to strengthen the demand for the ending of this insane struggle, by a negotiated peace which shall be fair to all parties. Every nation should agree to consider every other nation as if it were in the other's place. The economic resources of the world should be shared fairly so that each country receives what is proportionate to its needs. We must learn that national selfishness does not pay any more than individual selfishness. It was intolerable that money should be in the control of the powerful financial gamblers, who could create a scarcity of money among the population at a time when there was abundance. The depression of 1931, which caused such widespread poverty and misery was artificially engineered by financiers.

If we see the truth of this important issue of war, how are we to get something done about it? By interesting our neighbours; by organising, and by bringing pressure to bear upon members of Parliament and members of the Government.

A question was asked as to the possibilities of a negotiated peace at an early date.

The Duke of Bedford replied that it was a question of getting a sufficiently strong popular demand, which could force the hands of the politicians who are insisting upon unconditional surrender. The people are thoroughly sick of the war.

The Duke of Bedford was asked why he did not include the big industrialists as well as the financiers in his condemnation of the sinister activities of international finance. The industrialists had the same anti-social motives and was it not desirable that we should get beyond both industrialist and financier, to the destruction of both?

In his reply the Duke of Bedford said that as we have not yet achieved an ideal society he was not sure that there was a reasonable chance of getting rid of the profit-making motive. Even if we grant that production for profit is wrong, the present financial system is a far greater evil than production for profit. The amount of harm done by the latter is relatively small compared with the harm which the financiers do.

It was noticeable that the applause which followed this question was much more pronounced than that which followed the Duke's reply.

The time allotted to questions proved to be far too short for the number of questioners, and many had to be disappointed.

There was not a note of opposition throughout the whole proceedings. Literature was rapidly bought up and the meeting was a great success.

P.P.U. ACTIVITIES

During the few months since the passing of the Armistice resolution at the A.G.M. of the P.P.U. "campaign" activities have been conducted in various parts of England. Open-air meetings on Armistice have been held regularly in Birmingham "Bull Ring" on Wednesday noon and on Sundays, and at Newcastle-on-Tyne on the Town Moor on Sunday evenings. London Area of P.P.U. has held meetings weekly on "Negotiation Versus Unconditional Surrender," on Streatham Common (Sundays, 7.30 p.m.), Wimbledon Common (Sundays, 7 p.m.) and in Hyde Park (Wednesdays, 6.15 p.m. and Sundays, 3 p.m.). A further meeting was held on Tower Hill on August 9th (from 12.30 p.m.) when the speakers were Sybil Morrison and Donald Port. At all these meetings speakers have been impressed by the willingness of the "man-in-the-street" to listen to the case put forward.

A meeting of members of Manchester & District Region (P.P.U.) held on July 29th, decided to give wholehearted support to the "campaign" provided that "the statement of specific social and economic principles" was circulated to a "representative section of the movement" in hope of general agreement. Mr. G. F. Bligh, 206 Derbyshire Lane West, Stretford, Lancs. would always welcome invitations to speak to Groups, etc., on the subject of "The Armistice Campaign: What Can We Do Now?"

A Public Meeting was held in the Friends' Meeting House, Mount Street, Manchester, on Tuesday, July the 27th, when the speakers were Corder Catchpool and James H. Hudson with the Rev. Stanley Mossop in the Chair. The Meeting was arranged by the representatives of Organisations in Manchester keenly interested in Peace by Negotiation. The subject of the Meeting was "Can Military Victory Bring a Lasting Peace."

Corder Catchpool emphasised that to offer our fellow-men an alternative to continuing the war is not giving way to Hitler's demands. It is acknowledging God'sdemands, lifting the whole issue to a higher level by calling men everywhere to a constructive, co-operative building now of the new and better world which their better selves long for. Continuing, Corder Catchpool spoke of the urgent need for more of the courage of good faith.

"I confess my good faith in the common folk of every land. To our human minds indeed it seems as though nothing but a miracle could change the present course of events; but faith believes in miracles—

> Unless
> Thou hast the patience still to bless
> Us both with sudden sight,
> We are both lost—one in the plight
> Of Victory, the other in despair.

James H. Hudson said that though some people might think the present time inopportune for such a meeting he, personally, thought it most opportune. He had spoken on this same subject in various parts of the country and had everywhere met with an encouraging reception. He wholeheartedly agreed with Corder Catchpool that no lasting peace could be attained by military victory. The only hope lay in a negotiated settlement.

The meeting was attended well and enthusiastic.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—One could hardly believe that in a country that professes Christianity and all that it stands for to the highest degree, persons or parties could criticise the Duke of Bedford and want to have him interned just because he stands for the Truth and is against War with all its diabolic evils.

If the Church had made a firm stand, as she ought to have done, and exposed all the evils of war instead of being so base as to call this a Righteous War, she would have been a follower of the One she once professed to believe in, that is, Christ and His teachings.

Many persons who criticise the Duke of Bedford to-day will, in the near future, hold different opinions and be a little wiser than at present.

Through these trying times I wish you success and health to continue.—Yours faithfully,

W. H. BAGULEY.

THE PEREGRINATIONS OF A PEACE MAKER

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

The ordinary citizen often wonders how an M.P. spends his "leisure" during the Parliamentary Recess. The readers of The Word may, therefore, care to follow the footsteps of one Member of the Commons for ten days or so in September, 1943, when he was supposed to be having his holidays. Indeed, he wishes sometimes he could spend them at home and thereby acceed to the urgent requests of those in authority who in spite of their appeals to others probably manage themselves to have at least a fortnight at the sea-side. The most arrogant and impudent things done in wartime are, that those who urge others to work harder than ever, to suffer compulsions, go down the pits to get more coal and fight to the last man, never suffer or do any of those things themselves.

Anyway, to begin with, we addressed a very excellent conference of 130 delegates at Hull one recent Sunday afternoon; Councillor Kneeshaw, in the chair. The gathering was called under the auspices of the Hull City Labour Party, and the subject was "Race Hatred." It was very gratifying to note that the heart of the rank and file of Labour on these fundamental issues is as clean as ever. The trouble arises from the fact that we are hardly ever provided with the opportunity of putting our case to the people; the Ministry of Information and its satellites are the purveyors of news and they and their organisation are supported by unlimited publicity and State funds. We have in this country what is termed "Freedom of Speech," within certain limits; but what we have not got is freedom of publicity. If we had addressed ourselves that day at Hull to denouncing every German as a scoundrel the newspapers would have said so in big headlines. As we were advocating the obvious, that the human race is pretty much the same everywhere, good, bad and indifferent alike, not a word of the meeting appeared in any journal anywhere. The British ruling classes achieve exactly the same object as the Totalitarians; the only difference is that our "masters" accomplish with kid gloves what the Nazis achieve with knuckle-dusters.

Be that as it may, we came away from Hull, the worst bombed town in the British Isles, much encouraged.

Let it be noted in passing that an average of 25 letters daily reach me and that all those must be dealt with "rain or fine." All that apart from callers, deputations, telephones and telegrams. It is common knowledge of course that the M.P. who takes "a line of his own," who is not a "Yes-man" gets a very much heavier post than would outherwise be the case. Then, I must not forget my garden. Where I do my thinking.

The next meeting was held in the Unity Cafe, Liverpool. This was a smaller affair, though the place was filled; but as the Cafe is in a cellar we ventured the view humorously that we must not be discouraged; Lenin, Trotsky, Marx, Hitler and Mussolini all began their careers downstairs. Indeed, some of them ended where they began, too. Quite an interesting gathering nevertheless. The leaders of the Cause there have in mind attempting something bigger in the near future. In any case, Liverpool is not an easy target when you aim high.

Then, we came across a different class of people and in a very different part of the world at that. The meeting here was called "The Forum." The Free Churches at Cleveleys, a suburb of Blackpool, have for some years held successful gatherings where public men and women are invited to speak, saying just what they like. My subject was, "What are we Fighting For?" Not an easy one to answer. Indeed, it appears on occasions as if we were at last fighting for fighting sake. Nevertheless, we pointed out that the background of this War, like the last, was Capitalism, colonies, balance of power, trade, commerce and material issues that have nothing to do with "Fighting for Religion and Freedom" or Roosevelt's Four Freedoms. In short, we said that there is no hope of destroying the spirit of Nazism until the causes that made the foul thing are removed. The statesmen of the United Nations know all that full well. It was a crowded gathering with the Rev. Norman Castles (Congregational) presiding. It was clear that many present would not agree with our contentions, but most pleasing what was was their universal fairness and toleration when discussing and questioning. Got a slant on this visit on the reasons for the emergence of Common Wealth, the new political movement.

Spent an hour on the promenade at Blackpool and what a sight! Long queues for trams and buses, fish and chips, Blackpool Rock, oysters, chocolates, cinemas and donkey rides. What do these people care about the Quebec Conference, the pattern of Peace to come or such mighty problems as the Balance of Power in Europe? Those who rule them know how little is required to satisfy the average individual. The T.U.C. was meeting not many miles away, but these masses, strolling aimlessly on the seven miles concrete and the many more miles of sand seemed little concerned about the C.I.O.; the A.F. of L. or the fate of the Third International. Indeed we doubt whether they cared very much about the collapse of Italy or the fate of the Balkans either.

A day at Horwich, an L.M.S. railway works town, in my own constituency proved profitable. Sat in the Labour Club to receive constituents with problems about missing men in the Forces, refusal of war pensions, and the many other difficulties that emerge from the present conflict. If all the tears shed by the common folk during the last four years had been collected the total would have provided enough salt water to flood Downing Street, Berchesgarten, the Kremlin, the White House, the Vatican and their occupants as well!

Travelled over 200 miles to Swindon, Wiltshire; a G.W.R. town this time and addressed another successful meeting at the Trades' House. The place was full, with an American soldier thrown in. The Rev. D. Davies, a Congregational Minister in the chair. A large parcel of The Word sold like hot cakes; and the collection of silver as it rolled out of the plates at the close of the gathering, seemed to show a deep conviction among those present. In any case, the peace movement at Swindon is not short of enthusiasm. Councillor King, the local Secretary of the Rechabites and a C.O. of the last war is a tower of strength here. In spite of his attitude to war he is a Town and County Councillor. This was indeed a very encouraging experience. We debunked the militarists of all countries alike and enjoyed ourselves to the full in so doing.

Down then to Winscombe, Somerset, to speak on "India." Never heard of this place before. A most delightful spot on the edge of the Mendip Hills. The meeting, well attended, was held in the hall attached to the great High School of the Society of Friends. A most magnificent edifice with spacious gardens, fruit in abundance and a flare of flowers almost saying "goodbye to all that" except those under glass—a sight for the gods.

Mr. Robson occupied the chair, and we got a real fright when, in his opening speech, he talked so familiarly about India and its many millions; he had spent 30 years there as a missionary for the Society of Friends. Well, Well! Anyhow, all went smoothly, though there were a few ardent Imperialists present who by their questions made it clear that so far as their type is concerned there will be no freedom for those 350 million dark skinned people in India until they are able to take it and clear out British Imperialism as the American colonists did when they established the United States, after the Boston Tea Party.

The next gathering was at the mining village of Bedwas, Monmouthshire, held in Saron, the Congregational Church. We made no secret, even in a Church, about our views on the present war. We said that the behaviour of some of the Church leaders during the last War had offended the more intelligent members of the community so much that they had never been inside a Church since. Some of the present day Church leaders were no better, and he thought that unless something was done to place Christian principles more effectively before the people we would gradually become a pagan nation.

The meeting was very interested in the prophecy that what might well happen as the result of this conflict was the destruction of Nazism in Germany and the enthronement of Communism instead. What would then be the attitude of Great Britain and the United States towards Europe?

Finally, we addressed a very well attended meeting at the Queen's Hall, Wigan, in connection with the Religion and Life Movement. Talked of the relationship of Christian principles to Industry. Told them that the Saviour, if He lived nowadays, might be a Shop Steward or even a Trade Union agitator. He never, however, laid down Trade Board rates of wages nor believed in conscription of labour. He elevated the individual above the material; what He did above all was to lay down a set of principles to guide us all.

After reading all that there may be some who will think that the real holidays of an M.P. happen when the House of Commons is sitting!

[Reports of Comrade Rhys Davies great campaign for Socialism and Peace have reached us from many parts of the country. We cannot publish them this month owing to pressure on space. Comrade Davies has proved himself to be a fearless champion of the Socialist struggle against war and capitalism in its forms of degeneracy, from Imperialism to Fascism and Nazism. We hope to see him soon in Lanarkshire and trust that local comrades will succeed in organising meetings in Glasgow, Motherwell, and Hamilton, with a view to spreading the union of all the forces making for Peace, Socialism, and Reason.—Ed.]

WAR AND PEACE

A Further Speech against War made in the House of Commons

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

(Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, 1924)

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Thursday, August 5, 1943.

I object to the philosophy that is pronounced from the benches opposite on occasions when it is said that we are going to carry democracy to the Continent of Europe at the point of the sword. Hon. Members object as I do, to the Nazis trying to force Nazism on other nations. By what right, therefore, have we to complain of the form of government they should have in Italy or in Germany? I think some of the speeches of the hon. Gentleman (the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs) on the Front Bench opposite on international affairs have been much more reasonable on this issue than those of some of his colleagues, and I hope he will take note of this vital point, that it will be fatal for the future peace of Europe if the democracies try to enforce a democratic regime on all the countries of Europe that may ultimately be subjugated by the United Nations. If we adopt that attitude we are thrown back to the stage when wars were waged between the Catholics and the Protestants, each trying to force their religious philosophies on each other.

I refuse to believe that any two countries in any part of the world will ever be governed alike at any time. I have been to the United States of America many times. The United States is a republic, and Germany is a republic too, but the difference in mental attitude between one of those republics and the other is far greater than the difference between the United States and ourselves. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me for saying that I am a very ardent patriot when I am abroad, in spite of all my criticisms here. I remember in 1938 having dinner in Washington with the late Senator Borah, the Isolationist, a very well-informed man, and asking him whether he thought a war was looming on the horizon. He said "Yes." I said "Do you think my country will keep out of it?" He replied, "No; if there is war in any part of the world you are in it. You will fight anybody at any time on the slightest excuse." And all of a sudden I became a very ardent British patriot, and argued against him as much as I could.

But let me return to the point that now Mussolini has gone and Badoglio has taken his place. What do our Government envisage as the form of government in Italy which they will recognise? They say "unconditional surrender." If the hon. Member who is listening to me on behalf of the Foreign Office does not mind my saying so, I am very slow to cast any suspicion upon a Minister of any Government here, but I cannot believe that Eisenhower was in error when he appealed to the Italian people that they ought to consider the terms of peace offered to them by the United Nations. Yet we are told by our Foreign Secretary that no peace terms of any kind have been offered to Italy. I do not understand military affairs, but I know human nature well enough to say this much, that if any person happened to have been born in Italy—if a man had been born in Italy he would be an Italian subject—and he were asked, under present conditions, to make absolute unconditional surrender, what would his reply be? Take the position of Badoglio. What can he do? He might as well continue to fight on to the last man as agree to an unconditional surrender. The United Nations would in any case go on fighting in Italy in order to defeat the Germans in that country.

What the United Nations ought to do if they want Italy to be put out of this war is to offer something to the Italian people upon which they could negotiate in order to get peace restored between us and the Italians. I agree that there is a difference between the mentality of the Italians towards us and that of the Germans. In spite of the centuries of blood relationship between the English and the Germans I think that politically the Italians have more in common with us than the Germans, and consequently I do not like this callous call for unconditional surrender. When I turn my mind back to what happened in the last war I recall that President Wilson offered 14 points to the Germans if they surrendered, and I understand that they laid down their arms very largely because they thought, "this is better than fighting on to the death." But when it came to the terms of peace I believe that only two of the 14 points were inserted in the Treaty. I am rather proud of one thing the Prime Minister said the other day. I do not agree with a lot that he said, but he made one statement with which I was pleased, that it is not intended to keep an army of occupation in Italy; that would be too expensive from a military point of view. Let me say as an old coal miner that I trust that when we make peace with these countries, whichever way the war may end, we shall not import the same spirit of revenge into the peace treaty as on the last occasion in 1918-19. I know that some Members of the Conservative party have issued their peace points. They are apparently going to re-educate Germany, to penalise Germany—

Sir T. Moore: We have not issued any points.

Mr. Davies: Not in this House. I wonder whether I dare ask hon. Members to remember the effect upon our coal and shipbuilding industries of the treaty made at the end of the last war, and upon other industries too, including cotton. We shall reach a stage, I hope earlier than we think, when we shall have to live in peace once again with all the peoples of Europe, and I trust that in the forthcoming peace treaty we shall not be so stupid as to demand such reparations from the conquered nations as would put our coal-miners and our ship-builders out of work for years, which is exactly what happened on the last occasion.

There are people in this country who talk loudly about educating the Germans. The President of the Board of Education has said that we shall require about 70,000 additional teachers to educate our own people, to start with, and at the same time it is suggested that we are going to educate 80,000,000 Germans too and probably 42,000,000 Italians as well. And what is wrong with teaching the French a few lessons, and the Japs—there are about 100,000,000 of them? If the House does not mind my suggesting that we might make a start by educating the Indian people. There is a job of work to be done there. And, of course, should Russia and Germany make a separate peace, I suppose we should have to educate 100,000,000 Russians in addition.

I have something else to say, but in passing I want to thank the House for its tolerance to people who hold my views. Incidentally, I am not alone in the House in holding these principles. There is a minority here who take the same line as I do, but there is a larger number outside. I should not be surprised if there were two, or three, or even four million in this country who agree with what I say. Hon. Gentlemen laugh. I have lived longer than some of them, and ought to know.

I do not want to detain the House much longer. (An Hon. Member: "Hear, hear.") If Hon. Members say "hear, hear" to that, I will continue; but in spite of their enticement I will conclude. I am afraid I have not put my case in a very chronological order. I only had an elementary education. I could hardly speak English when I was a boy. I naturally feel very deeply on this issue. I have travelled most of Central Europe. I have seen the Czechs, the Slovenes, Slovaks, Hungarians, Macedonians, the Poles and the Ukrainians. I would like this last utterance to be particularly noted, if I may say so. I told some of their leaders in Central Europe when I met them that they would not be able to live together in peace until they had learned to tolerate one another's language and religion. They are astonished of course, at the toleration practised in this country on that score, and of which I am very proud. I disagree with my hon. Friends because of their point of view on war and peace, but I have no spirit of hatred towards anybody who disagrees with me. Human nature has been built that way; men in the same political party differ on some fundamental issues. What would be the use of a Parliament if we all agreed with one another, anyhow? Parliament was designed, because there are people who differ fundamentally on these problems of life and death. I close with some lines that I learned long ago from Shelley's "Queen Mab." They are not all I wish to convey, but they are very appropriate to this occasion:—

"War is a statesman's game, the priest's delight,
The lawyer's jest, the hired assassin's trade."

Remember that whether we call ourselves Christians, Universalists, Humanists, or Socialists, these men and women who are confined in prisons are our brothers and sisters and need our sympathy and help, so I ask you to make every effort to get the evils that I have spoken of remedied as quickly as possible.

MEMORIES:

Old World and New

Dear Mr. Aldred,—In reading the May issue I noticed the announcement of United Socialist Movement meeting to be held in Woodside Halls.

This brought to memory that I often heard my mother speak of Woodside as the place she lived in as a child after the family had left Stirling, where she had been born. At that time, as I recollect, Woodside was outside of Glasgow proper and really a sort of suburb, and I think there was a small stream in the neighbourhood called the Kelvin river; of this, however, I may be in error.

My mother also said that, to her as a small child, the district was beautiful, for during the summer the fields all about were filled with heather and other beautiful wild flowers.

The pastor of our Church in Providence, Rhode Island, a young man who had only recently graduated from college and had come to our Church as his first charge in the Unitarian Ministry, was, during the following summer, taken to Europe by our Sunday School Superintendent, a man of means, who decided that such a trip would be valuable to our new pastor.

My parents asked the pastor that when and if he visited Scotland they would be very thankful if he would report to them on his return, all about Glasgow and Woodside, etc., et. The trip I think occurred about 1886 and my parents said that the Botanical Gardens were, when they left for America in 1860, on the outskirts of the city.

Our pastor upon his return to Providence reported that the city had spread out some distance beyond the Gardens and that it had taken in the section called Woodside. All of which was surprising to my father and mother.

I don't know what kind of weather has been furnished you in Scotland the past winter and spring, but here in America, it was a cold winter and spring; and now, when we should be enjoying a touch of early summer, it is both cold and damp. Here, at our home, we usually try to have flowers each summer. Of course, the annuals came along pretty well, but, in addition, we plant bulbs and seeds, and these have been slow to move, due to lack of sunshine and warmth.

A neighbour loaned us a fine book to read. It is entitled, "The Brothers Mayo," a life history of a family of doctors and surgeons. The original member of the family, Wm. Worrall Mayo, was born May 31, 1819, in the English village of Eccles, "separated by only a few miles of green countryside from the voraciously spreading industrial city of Manhester." Worrall left England for America in 1845, and after many trials and uphill work in various States, finally arrived in Minnesota, where he and his two world famous sons, Will and Charlie, started, after years of hard work what is known throughout the world to-day as the Mayo Clinic and Foundation.

Doctors and patients from all parts of the civilised world come to the Clinic at Rochester, Minnesota, for healing and for post-graduate work and instruction at

MISSION TO MOSCOW

There were protests all over the United States when the Warner Brothers' film, "Mission to Moscow," was shown in that country. Joseph E. Davies, United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union from 1936 to 1938, whose book was used for making the film, was accused, freely and clearly, of falsifying history. This charge cannot be refuted.

Davies book is subtitled :

"A record of confidential dispatches to the State Department, official and personal correspondence, current diary and journal entries, including notes and comments up to October, 1941."

Somewhat tedious in its description of mediocre personalities who have power and domination in an age of conspicuous mediocrity, the work is valuable for its occasional glimpses of reality. It depicts well the Moscow retreat from Communism. Ambassador Davies realised that Communist principles were abandoned in the Soviet Union long before his arrival in Moscow, and rejoiced to see that the assassination of the Czar had not inaugurated classless society. Violence is not revolution but counter revolution and revenge is merely reaction perpetuated at the expense of the common people. Davies saw how the Commissars lived and noted that they "certainly treat themselves well." He concludes :—

The idea of a "classless" society has been and is being destroyed in practice. The government itself is a bureaucracy with all the indicia of class, to wit: special privileges, higher standard of living, and the like. An illustration is found in the fact that the only caviar which can be obtained here is served to the high government officials or possibly obtained as a matter of favour through the Kremlin restaurant, which is provided for the high governmental officials living therein.

In the book, published in Britain at 15s., and not intended to be read by the proletariat, Davies wrote also :—

There is scarcely a day but what our American chauffeur "Charlie" Gilberti is approached on the streets by some American who has taken out Soviet citizenship and who pleads that he intercede with the American authorities to help him to get back home. A thousand communists came here in 1934-35 from Austria, so I am told by the Austrian Minister, took up citizenship in the promised land, cannot get out, and are all bending every effort to get back home.

This passage is not illustrated in the film. Nor is the following description of the terrorist methods used by the Soviet Government and recorded by Davies with spirited opposition :—

The Terror here is a horrifying fact. There are many evidences here in Moscow that there is a fear that reaches down into and haunts all sections of the community. No household, however humble, apparently but what lives in constant fear of a nocturnal raid by the secret police (usually between one and three in the early morning). Once the person is taken away, nothing of him or her is known for months—and many times never—thereafter. Evidences of these conditions come from many sources. They are statements made to myself or members of the staff from first hand witnesses; statements based on actual personal observations of members of the staff (as in one instance, the sight of a struggling unfortunate being arrested and torn from his eleven-year-old child on the street in front of the adjoining apartment houses at 3.30 a.m.) . . .

These passages are not illustrated in the film version of Davies' Mission to Moscow, because Hollywood experts were required to transform Davies' story into pro-war ally Soviet propaganda film, sacrificing first impressions to calculated war interests.

The American capitalist magazine, Life, in its issue for May 10, 1943, described the film as follows :—

Davies' movie whitewashes Russia . . . . Beyond entertainment value, the movie has a serious political mission—to sell Soviet Russia to suspicious American citizens. To this end the U.S.S.R., its leaders and its foreign politics are whitewashed to a degree far exceeding Davies' book. Russians are made to look and act like residents of Kansas City, and the American standard of living appears to prevail throughout the Soviet Union. The complicated history of international diplomacy is reduced to terms of lily-white virtue and blackest villany.

In the film, Davies is shown visiting wounded Chinese children, who had been taken to Russia after the occupation of Nankin. In the book, no reference is made to this visit, for the simple reason that no such visit ever took place.

The Moscow Trials, which were queried rightly at the time in the capitalist press of the democracies, are re-staged as genuine. New falsifications are added to the original frame-ups. Marshal Tukhachevsky, who was never tried publicly and was shot without benefit of confession for the simple reason that he would not confess, appears in open court at the trial of the alleged conspirators, Radek and Bukharin.

Tukhachesky did not confess. Furthermore, he was not arrested until three months after the trial of Radek and Bukharin. No one knows anything about a trial in secret, for no such trial is recorded. He was shot secretly and only afterwards was he said to have confessed at a secret trial.

Yagoda is shown in the dock confessing along with Radek, although at the time he was the chief of the O.G.P.U. and running the trials! He was engaged actually in the prosecuting of Radek!

There were altogether four of these trials but they are telescoped into one. Men are seen confessing at a trial where they were not even accused. Others who figured prominently in the actual trials are missing.

In the third trial, held in March, 1938, Bukharin and others were made to confess not only that they had been plotting with Germany and Japan, but also with Britain and Poland.

Stalin's prosecutor at the trial, Vyshinsky, stated :

Implicated in this case are the remnants of at least, as has been exactly established by the trial, four foreign intelligence services, the Japanese, German, Polish and British—and, it goes without saying, all the other foreign intelligence services which maintain friendly, so-called operative contact with the above-mentioned intelligence services.

Thus the accused were executed on the ground that they were guilty of plotting with Britain and America and others of the "United Nations," as well as with the Axis powers, to overthrow the Soviet Union. Why are these trials made into one, and why are film audiences asked to accept the picture of the sentence of death as deserved, if even the official version is doctored to suit the present political war aims of Britain and the United States. If these people were not agents for United States and Britain, yet were prosecuted and sentenced for being agents for Britain, then the trials are not genuine. If the trials were genuine, then the present film record is a travesty and a lie.

In his book, Davies reveals how doubtful he was during the trials. Later events led him to see the justice and significance of the trials. What brazen impudence! In the film, we see him represented as present at a bogus trial, a completely fictionalised affair, a parody of the mockeries that Stalinism imposed upon the world. And here he is made to reveal his complete certitude in the court-room!

To this contemptible travesty of fact, Davies, in his own person recites a prologue. The audience see him as a plain Christian American citizen who has made good and stands for the well-being of the world. Afterwards, Walter Huston takes over and plays the part of Davies.

The falsification is not restricted to Moscow. The film shows Emperor Haile Selassie making a dramatic speech before the League of Nations at Geneva; Litvinov supports him and the German delegation stamps out. Nothing of this kind happened at Geneva. Haile Selassie made a speech on June 30, 1936, but the German delegates did not walk out because Germany had left the League of Nations three years before. The German delegates were not there. Italy declined to send a delegation.

On June 30, 1936, Anthony Eden presided. The film shows a different president. Litvinov made no speech. No delegate walked out. Therefore the Geneva "incidents" are inventions. But film fans will accept these "shots" as being true.

These falsifications are designed for the purpose of leaving the film audiences to believe that the pre-war industrial and political situation can be explained by alleging that all critics of the Stalin Government and its policy were in the pay of Germany and its subsidiary Nazi Powers.

The Soviet Union being in alliance with the so-called democratic capitalist powers, the allegations made at the actual trials, that the accused were in the pay of Britain, is dropped. In the Russian showing of the films, the suggestion, emphasised in the English showing versions, that the accused were in the pay of Japan as well as Germany will be dropped : for the Soviet Union is not at war with Japan. What a study in the ethics of politics, the educational power and value of the film! What a commentary on the tragic fact that men are dying and killing, allegedly for Truth and Freedom, surrounded and menaced by a world propaganda of lies!

The charge of being in the pay of Germany has been very popular since the first Russian Revolution in 1917! Kerensky attempted to discredit Lenin with that cry. Stalin used it against Lenin's close associates and comrades. And now it serves the ends of capitalist war propaganda. As though Truth itself did not condemn Nazism! As though lies helped or were necessary.

These falsifications, and their political significance, should be challenged by every worker in the country. They should be exposed by every Labour writer, whether he believes in the war against Fascism on the field of battle and by methods of destruction from air and sea, or whether he is a pacifist and social revolutionist, believing in civil war to overthrow Fascism. The man who is willing to die for democracy should be honoured by being told the Truth. To die in the act of killing is a terrible death. But so to die, and to have no respect shown for the Truth that inspired one; to die falsely and to hate falsely as one dies : this is a blasphemy against humanity beyond forgiveness in any democracy.

The Hollywood Mission to Moscow production is a type of propaganda fillm unknown to Britain hitherto because it has factual setting that persuades the thoughtless film-fan of the true historical and political content. The film is presented not as entertainment but as factual episode. Yet it has fictionalised even falsehood itself. It has taken even the Soviet official reports of the trials for a joy-ride. Hollywood has accepted all the official Stalinist apologies for the trials, then gleefully treated them as incidents of no factual importance. It has fitted four trials into an exciting and sensational melodrama without regard to the facts, and evolved a trial utterly false even as a mock trial, with accused and accusers throughout confused in the parts they play in court. The trial, therefore, belongs to the Hollywood version of Sherlock Holmes at Washington and Nick Carter up-to-date. Utterly false and impossible.

The events leading up to the war are flashed on to the screen as the headlined history familiar to newspaper readers and also as the personal experience of an official eye-witness and participant. Through the combination of newsreels of Hitler Germany and Stalin Russia with the re-enacted story of Mr. Davies as he never recorded it at the time, with incidents that never happened, the film takes on the qualities of an authentic historical reality. As he views passes from shots of Nazi demonstrations, in which the whole German people seem to be massed before Hitler, to a scene of Davies making a futile proposal of disarmament to Schacht, the spectator feels himself transported behind the scenes. He feels that he is witnessing directly the secret historical process of diplomacy preparing for war. He forgets that the shot of the Nazi parade is one thing, and that picture of Davies and Shacht is something different, merely a study of two Hollywood actors, Huston and Basch portraying parts. He is persuaded by the surrounding context of news reels and by the official character of the film based on the confidential reports of an American Ambassador and approved by the Soviet Government, that the actors are reproducing the original events rather than a travesty of even Davies' impressions.

Davies is shown as a plain-spoken American citizen, who moves around with true democratic ease, armed with the authority of a mission from the President of the United States. He meets the inaccessible dictators face to face, pleads with them, denounces their evil intentions, understands their temptations, applauds the good that may have inspired them, and offers, for all good purposes, his sincere promise of co-operation, and that of the democracies.

The good faith of Davies is assured by a simple trick of contrast. The great heads of state are shown only in their offices and at military reviews. Davies is seen often with his wife and daughter. He represents neither a man of private political ambition nor yet one concerned with a mean political assignment. But he symbolises the human family and the inherent decency of humanity, one who loves and cares for others, and is removed from all ideas of outrage and violence. He is the envoy of human well-being who is called away from a fishing trip to discharge his great political task in which he remained the little man whilst being the great one. What a picture of capitalist diplomacy! Here is a moral, humane effort, an extension of genuine simple goodness and spontaneous intimacy of ordinary everyday trek into the realm of world affairs! Here is an envoy who could not lie! And so one must believe all that is said in the Mission to Moscow film!

(To be concluded.)

A "COMMUNIST" NOTEBOOK

Workers who wish to understand the machinations, compromises and reactionary opportunism of the Communist Party in its struggle for political power and careerist distinction at the expense of the working class struggle, should read our new booklet, "Communism." This is sub-titled, "The Story of the Communist Party." The work is a factual and historical study, consisting, in all, of 28 chapters. Read with it should be "Socialism and Parliament," Parts I and II, especially the 16th chapter of the first part, dealing with "Communist Parliamentarism" and Willie Gallacher's struggle for a parliamentary career. We ask our readers to note the promises he made to the Fife miners at the 1935 election, when he defeated the miners' leader, Willie Adamson. In the "Daily Worker" at the time, Gallacher described his return for West Fife as—

A striking blow to the forces of reaction which are preparing for war and new attacks upon the workers.

That picture fits in with Gallacher's later record of Churchill eulogist and parliamentary warmonger!

In the "Sunday Mail," Glasgow, for July 25, 1943, William Quin, Deputy Regional Commissioner for Scotland, contributes a "Scottish Notebook," in which he says:—

Even M.P.s on the extreme left do not allow political differences to disturb personal relationship. I saw Willie Gallagher, M.P., leave Euston for the North. Prior to the train leaving, Gallagher was busy searching for Sir James Lithgow, who was aboard. I facetiously asked Willie if this was another United Front; the Communist Party and Big Business.

It is a great characteristic of British life that political loyalties rarely interfere with personal friendships.

Had not the same sort of tribute been paid to Willie Adamson in the capitalist press when he was M.P. for West Fife? Did not Gallacher denounce Adamson on that account? What a game!

And who is Sir James Lithgow? He is the great Capitalist shipbuilder and has held a Government appointment since 1940.

The "Daily Express," for June 24, 1943, published an interesting news item:—

Moscow, Wednesday.—Major-General Sinilov, commander of Moscow garrison, in an order demanding more "spit and polish" when Red Army men appear in public in the city, reveals a Russian saluting problem.

He says that recently he had to arrest a lieutenant who was carrying a large bundle in his right hand so that he could not salute superior officers.

In consequence the General orders that, when walking out, soldiers may only carry small parcels, and these must be in the left hand, leaving the right free for saluting.

In case the reader believes that this picture of the Red Army soldier is a caricature, a satire on Communism, we quote this item from the "Daily Worker," for July 9, 1943, sent by its Moscow correspondent, John Gibbons:—

Nowadays, private and N.C.O.s, travelling in a bus, tube or train, must give up their seats to men of senior rank should they be standing. Other newly enforced regulations lay it down that men in uniform must not attend market places, nor must they appear in streets carrying large parcels and suitcases.

Stand up, comrades, as our contemporary, "Forward," says! Hi--de-hi, ho-de-ho!

"Forward," Glasgow, for July 17, 1943, quotes from an article published during the previous week in the Glasgow "Daily Record," from Walter Kerr, the famous war correspondent. Describing the Red Army, Kerr wrote, among other things:—

It is not a big happy family of soldiers who hold meetings to solve a military problem. It is a tough disciplined force in which the violation of an order or regulation is severely punished.

There is as much discipline in this army as there is in any army in the world and more than in most.

A private behind the front earns 10.60 roubles (about 22s.) a month and 40 roubles (about 84s.) a month while on the firing line. The lowest rank of command officer, the junior lieutenant, gets 600 roubles (about £63) a month. That is a wide difference between private and lieutenant.

Saluting in the Red Army! Restriction on the soldier's freedom! Differences in pay! And then official prayers for victory, as in the time of the Czar, and as in orthodox Capitalist countries.

Here is an item from the "Bulletin," Glasgow, for June 25, 1943:—

Prayers for victory were sung in Moscow Cathedral yesterday by massed choirs of all the Moscow churches at a service marking the anniversary of the German attack.

The whole Orthodox clergy of the capital, with the deputy locum tenens of the Patriarch Metropolitan Nicholas of Kiev and Galich at their head, attended.

Metropolitan Nicholas read a message from the head of the Russian Orthodox Church, Acting Patriarch Sergius, saying: "Our people is at one with its leader and the Army and the people will spare nothing to achieve victory. May God make the third year of the toil of war a year of victory for us."

"The Economist" for June 19, 1943, discussed the question of Soviet Millionaires. Our contemporary stated:—

For several months past the Soviet press has carried lists of acknowledgments for donations contributed by individual colletive farmers to the various defence and Red Amy funds. Sometimes these donations have amounted to several hundred thousand roubles; and a recent donation by a Kirghiz farmer amounted to more than one million roubles.

The generous donor was honoured by a personal letter of thanks from Marshal Stalin.

The size of the donation raises, of course, the question of the size of private incomes in Russia. It looks as if the "immoral kulak"—liquidated thirteen years ago—has been miraculously resurrected.

Yet there is nothing really miraculous in this economic process.

Ever since 1934 some sort of private farming and some private trade in agricultural products have existed in Russia within the framework of the collective agricultural system.

The scale of this private trade has been difficult to assess since official statistics ignored it.

Our contemporary concludes that there must be a development of private trade in agricultural products and adds that the list of donations published in the Soviet press seems to bear out this assumption. It continues:—

The donors have been almost exclusively peasants and they can in the main have derived such large savings only from private trade. Even so, the size of the sums is somewhat surprising.

Probably these figures point to a very advanced stage of inflation in private trade in the countryside.

It is also significant that the possession of large private savings is being explicitly encouraged. Marshal Stalin's letters to the donors have more than a hint of the old "Enrichissez vous"!

The Economist returned to this question in its issue for July 3, 1943, when it explained that one of the main reasons for this growing wealth is that the farmers can sell the produce of their own private allotments for their own benefit, and many of them choose to sell in the uncontrolled market where prices are very high.

Apparently, the Daily Worker felt it must do something to explain that economic inequality and political distatorship in Russia were really the outward and visible expressions of the growth of Socialism. So our contemporary in its issue for July 13, 1943, published the following "Communist" defence of the recent disclosed rapidly-growing wealth of some Russian farmers on collective farms, and avowed that millionaire farmers proved that Stalin had kept his 1933 pledge to make collective farms prosperous:—

First, a rouble millionaire is far from being a sterling millionaire. Secondly, the accumulations of a Soviet millionaire have been gathered together entirely without exploitation of any kind, solely as a result of personal labour, or more probably, the joint labours of a family over many years. . . . The emergence of millionaire collective farm families is an indication that that pledge is on the way to being fulfilled.

Believe it or not, according to the Daily Worker, millionaire farmers are evidence of the triumph of Socialism!

In the same issue of the Daily Worker, July 13, 1943, appeared a defence of the Soviet system of giving substantial prizes (but no interest) to individual investors in War Loans who happen to draw lucky lottery numbers.

Those terms appeal to Soviet millionaires. They would not be likely to do so to the barons of Wall Street or the City of London.

Since when has the Horatio Bottomley principle of prizes to holders of lucky numbers been regarded as a feature of Socialist society?

Every thinking worker aught to read My Life as a Rebel, by Angelica Balabanoff, published by Hamish Hamilton in 1938. Borrow it from your library. If possible, purchase a copy second-hand and preserve it for reference. From Chapter XXIII, pages 330-1, we make the following interesting extract:—

Mussolini's rise to power and the triumph of the Blackshirts in October, 1922, had been a terrible blow, but in spite of the stories which reached me every day of the atrocities practised against the Italian movement and its leaders, I did not believe that our movement could be crushed. As long as it could function, I knew that it would fight back. When the murder of Matteotti, in 1924, aroused the indignation even of the foreign capitalist Press, it still seemed that the workers in the rest of the world must see that this was no isolated phenomenon and that they would come, somehow, to the aid of their Italian comrades. It was at this time that I received the final blow to my faith in Bolshevism. After the murder of Matteotti, Mussolini was practically boycotted by most of the foreign ambassadors in Rome. Yet a month after the event he was invited to lunch at the Russian Embassy. The newspapers published a photograph of Mussolini and his friends, sitting under a picture of Lenin and the hammer and sickle, in the Soviet Embassy in Rome.

Balabanoff deals very effectively with tht Moscow trials. So does Max Nomad in his excellent work, Apostles of Revolution, published in 1939, by Martin Secker and Warburg. Every worker should read this work, and aim at possessing a copy for himself. A strong apologist for these trials, and a stern denouncer of the Bolshevik leaders who were liquidated in consequence, is I. Maisky, former Soviet Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in Great Britain. On page 40, of the Labour Party National Executive Committee's report 1943, is published the correspondence between J. S. Middleton, Secretary of the Labour Party, and Maisky on the question of the execution of Hamish Erlich and Victor Alter. Quite rightly, the Labour Party refers to Erlich and Alter as "Our Polish Comrades" meaning that they were Socialists and enemies of Fascism. Maisky justifies their execution on the ground that they were enemies of Socialism and allies of Hitler. In this connection we venture to quote the following passage from page 422 of Nomad's book:—

The main posts in Stalin's diplomatic corps are now held by Maisky, a former Minister in the Cabinet of Kolchak's White Government, who is now Ambassador to England, and by Troyanovsky. A militant opponent of the Bolshevik Revolution during the civil war, who is now Ambassador to the United States.

Of course, the suggestion that Soviet millionaires are not interested in dividends only State lotteries is another way of saying to the Socialist critic: "Name the Soviet Capitalists! Who are they? The United States has Ford, Mellon, Rockfeller, Morgan, and Britain its Rothschild, etc. But where is the Soviet millionaire? Name one, a household figure, an outstanding name, that can symbolise the system."

This can be done.

The New York Times for July 4, 1943, states:—

The Inter-Continent News, the Communist agency which supplies the Communist Daily Worker with most of its reading matter reports from Moscow that the Soviet press is giving front page prominence to a report that the collective farmer Berdybekov chairman of the "Karl Marx" collective farm in Pahkta Aral district of Kazakhstan, together with his family, bought war bonds to the amount of 1,037,000 roubles and paid for them in full and in cash. The same story relates how other collective farmers, and especially the chairmen of collective farms, signed up for thirty, fifty, seventy and one hundred thousand and more rubles worth of war bonds for which they also paid cash. But Berdyhekov seems to be the leading farmer millionaire, for his achievements was so outstanding that he reported it directly to Stalin and got a letter of greetings and gratitude in reply.

Comments the New York Times editorially:—

All this is in line with similar developments that have been going on in Russia for some time, such as the sidetracking of international revolution and proletarianism in favour of national patriotism and a hierarchal structure of society in which the Communist party members emerge as the new ruling "white collar" aristocracy.

How true is that N.Y. Times comment about the side-tracking of Socialism is shown by the reationary article published in the Daily Mirror for Friday, August 6, 1943, headed in bold type: "Motherhood First for Russian Girls." This article was cabled from Moscow by Marion Sinclair. It makes a sorry comment on Lenin's essays on Socialism meaning the emancipation of woman. Cabled Marion Sinclair, with the consent of the Soviet State censorship:—

The post-war contribution of Soviet women to the State will not be work—though that is needed too—so much as the production of as many children as possible.

The preoccupation of the State with the question of the birth-rate was already seen some years ago, when the practice of abortion was declared illegal—except on medical grounds.

Now, another measure has been taken which, at first sight, seems to have nothing to do with an increase of population, but which, nevertheless, is designed partly for that purpose—the abolition of co-education in schools.

This, of course, is a return to pre-revolutionary reaction and a surrender of every principle of equality, liberty, and progress. It was not worth the assassination of the Czar, the denunciation of Kerensky and all the poetic eulogies of the Bolsheviks, most of whom have been assassinated since, to achieve such a result.

U.S.A. HUMANIST LETTER

The Humanist Society of Friends

2405 West 23rd Street,
Los Angeles, California,
July 21, 1943.

My dear Dr. Aldred,—Your very interesting letter of June 29th is just received and I hasten to reply. Must say at once how pleased we all were to see your Ordination Certificate reproduced in "The Word," and to know that you accept both the Ordination and the Superintendency.

I also see in the June issue that both the Tories and the Communists seem to be "ganging up" on the Duke of Bedford in an apparent attempt to discredit him. We here in California particularly admire him for his enemies, and have officially and unanimously elected him an Ordained Minister in the Humanist Society of Friends. When you recently wrote us that he was a sort of combination of a Unitarian and a Quaker we were thereby assured that he not only should, but actually does, belong with us Humanists, for our Humanist Friends Society is chiefly composed of both present and former members of those two Churches. We Humanist Friends avoid the use of the name Church, so that many of our members are also, and at the same time, members of some other religious body, you understand, and without any apparent inconsistency, for as they gradually develop into the real Humanist philosophy most of them eventually forget about their former Church affiliations. I am enclosing the Credential for the Duke of Bedford herewith.

You will be interested to know, that all of our young Ministers of military age have been recognized as Ministers by the United States Government and thus exempted from military service in the present war. That is not to say that we personally approve the law necessarily in that regard, but since it is the law here, we are proud to receive the recognition and approval of all branches of Government, which you will understand and appreciate gives us a tremendous advantage in many ways in the post-war days as well as during these present serious times.

You will notice that I have addressed you as Doctor. This is another departure from the practice and precedent of the more orthodox religious bodies. Not claiming or pretending to know much or anything at all about Divinity, we have no Doctors of Divinity, and neither use nor recognise the term. Nor do we address our Ministers as Reverend, Parson, Priest, Preacher, Rabi, etc. But we do address them as Doctor (Dr.), for most all of them are actually Doctors of Philosophy (Ph.D.), Doctors of Law (LL.D.) or Doctors of Medicine (M.D.), etc. It so happens, however, that it is the custom of most of our established and endowed Colleges and Universities of our "status quo" civilisation, not to honour our most brilliant, original and liberal personalities with such degrees, so we have our own academic institution, known as The Pacific International University, which enables us to properly honour and recognise not only those of our own organisation who deserve such designation, but also other outstanding liberal leaders anywhere in the world as well as in our own U.S.A., you understand. So now, Dr. Aldred, in case you have not to date received such recognition from your own Institutions in the British Isles, we wish you to know that we are institutionally equipped to so honour you for the outstanding work you have done and are now doing as a defender of freedom of religion and conscience, as well as Editor of your great magazine, "The Word," in addition to your work as a student of law and a preacher, who has upheld in your High Courts, great constitutional principles, and also been permitted to defend the poor and the oppressed, often successfully as we see from the reports; and now as Superintendent of the Humanist Society of Friends. As a student of law, whose arguments and cases have been preserved officially in the Law Reports of the United Kingdom, you would prefer, doubtless, the Doctor of Laws (LL.D.) degree to any other.

The word, "doctor," as you know, actually means a man of erudition and professional attainments. It is the highest degree in the university faculty and it is one that ought naturally to have been conferred upon you for your untiring research work alone. Your further activity as a teacher and writer, and your outstanding prowess as a thinker, emphasise your right to this recognition.

We shall await word from you before taking action, but I can assure you, as President of the Pacific International University, there need be no unnecessary delay about conferring this degree, or uncertainty about its legal validity. We await only personal approval and acceptance of the idea to thus record definitely our scholastic appreciation of your work.

We shall be glad to co-operate in publishing the articles by the Duke of Bedford, as you suggest, for his messages are certainly needed here, and throughout the English-speaking world; and, of course, among those who do not speak our language too.

Again thanking you for all your wonderful interest and co-operation in every way, and with very best personal regards to you and your splendid associates, believe me, always.

Sincerely and fraternally yours,
LOWELL H. COATE,
General Director Humanist Society of Friends.

AFTER THE WAR

The Proposed Trial of War Criminals

By C. H. Norman.

June 26th, 1943

Right. Hon. Viscount Cecil of Chelwood.

My Lord,

There is one point which very much troubles me concerning the attitude taken up by you on the question of punishment of war criminals. It seems to me that all these abuses of authority must be balanced against the fact that since 1914 practically the whole of Europe on land from Moscow to Lisbon has been passing through the ordeal of war, civil war or revolution during the whole period up to now. One element in the distresses of Europe has been the lack of food for women and children during that period. The British Food Blockade (which I, personally, think is as cruel a form of warfare as was ever devised and is our readiest weapon) contributed in 1914-1919 largely to that state of things (see Bryant's "Unfinished Victory," chapters on "Famine over Europe" and "In the Time of the Breaking of a Nation").

You were Minister of Blockade during a part of the last war. Supposing the Germans had won the war, as they nearly did, would you have thought it right that you should have been tried for your part in directing the Blockade, during which even dried milk was refused passage. Far more women and children died in Europe from that cause than have died from the atrocities arising directly from the war and which are always ancillary to war.

Yours faithfully,

C. H. NORMAN.

Chelwood Gate,
Haywards Heath,
Sussex.

July 3rd, 1943.

Dear Sir,

I am obliged to you for your letter. There is an essential difference between blockade operations and those atrocities charged against the Germans and Japanese. Blockade is a regular method of warfare, recognised by all authorities on international law. Like most operations of war, it is horrible and involves great hardship and suffering to individuals, but that is not its purpose. Its purpose is to deprive the enemy of the means of carrying on the struggle and it was with that object that the so-called blockade was enforced in the last war. There is this to be said for it, that it leaves the government of the blockaded country with the power of distributing provisions to those sections of the population that they themselves choose. I do not know to what extent that was done by German in the last war, but, from all the information received, there was no time during the blockade when there was not enough food to maintain the lives of all the people in Germany, provided that all shared alike, though that might not have been a policy of which military experts would have approved.

The point about the atrocities now charged against the Germans is that, if they were committeed, there was no adequate military reason for them. The attempt, for instance, to exterminate the Jewish people cannot be justified on military grounds and is certainly not recognised as a defensive proceeding by any authority on international law. The same, of course, is even more true of the acts of individual slaughter, of wholesale outrages, or of the devastation or abstraction of private property. These seem to me all in the nature of ordinary crimes carried out, it may be, with some political object but still affecting not the State but the individual. I am confident that conduct of this kind not only inflicts great and unnecessary suffering but lowers the whole standard of international behaviour, and it is for these reasons that I think judicial investigation should be made as to the truth of the charges, and, if they are found to be true, those guilty should be punished. It must be remembered in considering this course that the hatred engendered by the German seizure of the occupied countries is so violent that, unless there is some means of punishing those who have been guilty of crimes in the course of that occupation, the result will be wholesale massacre, which would be, in my judgment, very much to be deprecated.

Yours truly,

(Signed) CECIL.

July 6th, 1943.

Rt. Hon. Viscount Cecil of Chelwood.

My Lord,

Thank you for your letter of July 3rd.

I cannot agree that there is any moral distinction between the Food Blockade and the atrocities charged against the Axis States. I know of no decision of an International Court upholding the contention that the Food Blockade directed against neutral, friend and foe alike, is lawful. Any such decision would be the negation of law, international or otherwise. In the last war Holland, Norway and Sweden suffered severely from the Food Blockade, though they were neutral throughout.

The justification by English lawyers and statesmen of the Food Blockade is merely the British form of the doctrine that "Might is right" when exercised by the British Navy.

Most of the atrocities alleged against Germany (except those arising from the revolution, in which Jews, Socialists, Pacifists and others suffered alike, as supposed opponents of the new regime) arose from the circumstances of military occupation, and the British Manual of Military Law allows the most serious steps against the resisting population of an occupied country. The acts of the German military authorities in the circumstances seem to fall within this category. In other words, the whole evil arises from the war itself, which is the real atrocity.

I recollect in the last war it was said that the Turks had massacred about a million Armenians, but when the war was over no one heard anything more of those massacres, and the Turks are to-day regarded as friendly and prospective Allies. I fear these atrocity campaigns are maintained, not for humanitarian reasons, but to inflame uniformed opinion against the enemy of the moment. This policy has been adopted against the Russian Government ever since it was established. I was reading the other day a hair-raising speech by Mr. Winston Churchill, as recently as August, 1940, on the subject of the crimes of the Russian Government and the inefficiency of the Red Army.

The point that it would be necessary to have trials of War Criminals in order to keep the peace after the war seems to me fantastic. Anything more calculated to arouse bitter feeling than a vast series of trials of persons alleged to be guilty of war crimes by hostile tribunals, can hardly be conceived. The whole conception is really shocking to anyone who knows how difficult it is to secure, even in England, fair trials for political offences in times of peace. How, therefore, would it be possible to carry out such a scheme in what would be practically still wartime, when the Judges would suffer (if neutral) in most cases under the handicap of not knowing the language of the persons accusing or accused. The idea of wholesale massacres taking place after the war again strikes me as improbable and put forward as an attempted justification for a policy hitherto unknown to the law, civil or international, highly calculated to embitter feeling everywhere, and certain to lead to the most terrible miscarriages of justice in almost every quarter of the globe.

Yours very truly,

C. H. NORMAN.

NOTE.

The correspondence can be left to stand, except by making good the reference to Mr. Winston Churchill, who was good enough, as Prime Minister of England, to express himself in these terms in January 1940, on Russia and the moral effect of Communism :—

"The service rendered by Finland to mankind is magnificent. They have exposed,for all the world to see, the military incapacity of the Red Army and the Red Air Force. . . . Everyone can now see how Communism rots the soul of a nation; how it makes it abject and hungry in peace and proves it base and abominable in war."

This may be only an example of the alcohol of rhetoric. But there may be another explanation, as some explanation is certainly required, when one compares statements of this kind with the flowery compliments to Marshal Stalin and the Russian forces in Mr. Churchill's speech on August 31st, 1943, as broadcast from Washington, only one of which one need quote : "The Russians fight so well." A possible explanation is this. There was once upon a time living an American novelist of the name of Winston Churchill and the speculation is that, as a war measure, vis a vis the United States, these two gentlemen have exchanged their personalities, and that the gentleman speaking from the United States on 31st August, 1943, was Winston Churchill, the novelist, not Winston Churchill, thePrime Minister, and a slight hoax has been played on the world. One is familiar with a curious example of the same kind of delusive similarity in name in the case of a Mr. Herbert Morrison, who was a conscientious objector of a very vehement kind in 1914-1918 (and indeed up to a speech at the Albert Hall in 1926, when he took the pledge never to engage in war) and a Mr. Herbert Morrison who is the Home Secretary in Mr. Winston Churchill's Government, who are clearly as two different persons on the subject of conscientious objection as are the two Winston Churchill's on the subject of Russia and Communism. Still, it is rather confusing to find two double personalities in political harness in this way; however, the uninstructed may now see light in his mental black-out; on the other hand, perhaps he may not!

The only other reference that need be given is to the sections in the British Manual of Military Law dealing with the treatment of resisting civilians in an occupied country by the occupying troops. It is chapter 14, pages 270-414. Those who incite from England the civilian populations in occupied territories to commit acts of sabotage and murder against occupying forces must bear a heavy responsibility for the war crimes and war criminals, which are the subject of the above correspondence.

C. H. NORMAN.

P.S.—Judging by the regret expressed at the failure of the scheme for shooting Signor Mussolini for "attempting to escape," apparently Mr. Winston Churchill (the real one) does not propose that the war criminals should even undergo the formality of a trial which perhaps removes the proposal from the arena of humbug into that of reality.

"CARLILE & THE SURGEONS"

The British Medical Journal, in its issue for August 14, 1943, page 202, publishes the following interesting notice :—

Dr. Charles Wortham Brook, having read a biography of Richard Carlile (1790-1843), came across a reference to Sir William Lawrence, and this started him upon a hunt for traces of progressive leaders of the medical profession who may have been known to Carlile—a man described by G. J. Holyoake as "having done more than any other Englishman in his day for the freedom of the Press." Carlile was kept in Dorchester Gaol for six years for publishing political works frowned on by authority, and suffered in all nearly ten years' imprisonment for his vindication of a free Press. Under the title "Carlile and the Surgeons" Dr. Brook has compiled a pamphlet (Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow; 2s. 3d.). This includes an open letter to the Mayor of Dorchester, who was also surgeon to the gaol, in which Carlile vigorously supported the medical reform movement; some historical matter about William Lawrence's "desertion and betrayal of Wakley and the medical reformers in 1828," and about Joseph Hume, described as "the surgeon who became a party leader"; also an extract from the "Lancet" of February 18, 1843, in which Thomas Wakley commended the bequest by Carlile of his body for dissection at St. Thomas's Hospital.

The Medical World, for July 2, 1943, summaries Dr. Brook's study well :—

In the year 1791 there was born at Ashburton in Devonshire Richard Carlile, whose father was a simple cobbler. For some time Richard worked as a tinsmith in a shop in Holborn Hill. He soon became interested in politics and in the Reform movement, so in the year 1817 he forsook his former occupation to become a publisher. His journal was known by the title of "The Republican," which emanated from his office in Fleet Street. Soon he got into trouble with the authorities and was for six years an inmate of Dorchester Gaol, from which he was released in 1825. All this time his journal kept on appearing, but he withdrew from the Reform Party. His tirade against industrial capitalism took shape when in 1827 he wrote bitterly against the conditions prevailing in the Manchester, cotton mills. In 1831 he was again imprisoned, on this occasion on a charge of sedition, for having encouraged and supported agricultural labourers who were then on strike. In 1843 Carlile became seriously ill and he died on the tenth day of February in that year at his house, No. 1 Bouverie Street. The death certificate gives the cause as bronchitis, and his occupation as that of bookseller. He left instructions for his body to be dissected. This was done at St. Thomas's Hospital before a numerous assembly. His remains were interred in Kensal Green Cemetery on Wednesday, February 28, 1843.

Such, in brief, is an account of Richard Carlile, but it has been elaborated for those interested by Dr. Charles W. Brook in a small book under the title of "Carlile and the Surgeons." Some of the latter came into association with Carlile, such as the surgeon to Dorchester Gaol, Christopher Arden; William Lawrence, Assistant Surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital; Thomas Wakley, founder of "The Lancet," and Robert Taylor who was familiarly known as "The Devil's Chaplain." The latter contributed several articles to Carlile's journal, "The Republican."

The book contains many quaint references and throws a flood of light on the character of the Fellows of the Royal College of Surgeons in these early days of its existence. It forms most interesting and, at times, amusing reading, and the whole story is well told by Dr. Brook.

SOCIALISM AND MONEY

Duke of Bedford Criticised.

By J. CRAIG.

[The following essay was addressed to the Editor in the form of a letter.—Ed.]

I was among the large and cheery audience which filled the Empire Theatre, Motherwell, on Sunday, 8th August, and heard you speak with the Duke of Bedford on "The War and After." The meeting was a profitable one despite the Communist Party contingent's attempts to shout down the discussion. The Duke attacked the defects of the financial system, and in the course of an interesting and informative address formulated certain propositions which form a useful jumping-off ground for an attack on the important question of Socialism and Monetary Reform.

I do not pretend that the following points are a fair or adequate summary of the Duke's address but they were the points which impinged most directly on me as a Socialist.

(1) Our financial system is corrupt and financiers wield anti-social power by controlling the supply of money in circulation, the banks creating and destroying credit by mere book entries and manipulating the interest rates on loans with one motive, the preserving of this system which yields such lucrative rewards and with no thought for the general well-being.

Public control of the Banks and monetary reform which would adjust the supply of money to the flow of desired goods and services available is therefore a half-way stage to Socialism and would be supported by many industrialists who are hampered by the antics of the money market. Eradicating capitalism root and branch, is a heavy task and more success might be gained by this plan as a first step.

(2) Under Socialism some form of money would be required. Theoretically it is possible to do without money by the use of a universal rationing system but the people of this country are too accustomed to the use of money to give it up.

(3) Slumps and booms are caused by deliberate action on the part of the powers of high finance (this was implied rather than expressly stated).

I take point (3) first. Trade cycles originated with the Industrial Revolution and have been occurring in almost regular pattern ever since, interrupted, of course, by world wars. Several years ago I made a detailed study of the following basic factors relating to the trade cycle between the last war and the present one, workers employed, wages, cost of living, wholesale prices, industrial production and profits and their study showed the amazingly regular periodicity of the phenomenon, indicating that it is a natural feature of our social system and not the work of financiers, although, of course, the financier performs an involuntary function in the process, and, I am not averse to believing, aggravates our distress by a complete disregard for the general well-being.

The Marxian explanation is that, due to the increasing use of labour-saving devices in the face of competition and the consequent saving in labour, the average rate of profit (surplus value derived from labour power) has a tendency to fall. This can only be mitigated by Capital accumulation and re-investment involving a shift in demand from consumers goods to producers goods, reductions in wages and eventually a glut of consumers goods (slump). This result is unavoidable since under capitalism production is engaged in solely for profit.

Reverting to the main issue, money's original function was in facilitating the exchange of commodities and gold and silver became the money commodities due to their peculiar suitability for this task. Money was a tremendous force for progress when production was the difficulty and it alowed the primary accumulation to take place which made capitalist production possible. The tremendous strides which have been made under the impetous of this mode of production have transferred the emphasis. Distribution is now the vital question. No one doubts that full-scale modern production can take place without capital. The Duke stated that lack of money need never impede production and that money should be created to allow production to proceed.

Under Socialism the problems are distribution with equity and the gearing of the system of production to meet the real needs, desires and indeed, the whims of the people. Money is not necessary for distribution to take place and exchange of commodities between individuals, already unimportant at present, will disappear under Socialism. Who would buy a used radio when he can be issued with a new one?. Money is necessary for trade and trade will have ceased to take place. Money in a money society, is power. If money is in use, private accumulation is possible and this accumulation could be used to re-institute capitalism or to build up power and dictate to one's neighbour.

Coming to the question of distribution, I should mention comrade J. W. Braithwaite's thoughtful letter on Socialism and money published in the May issue of The Word. While endorsing his conclusions, my criticism is that his conception of distribution has a Utopian flavour. It reminds one of the idea, often mooted, of the shop of the future from which one removes the articles desired on the strength of a nod to the attendant —if there is an attendant. But must we await the elimination of greed from human nature before achieving Socialism? I think not. At present we surrender coupons and money when making a purchase. Surely this is nonsensical. The present position is that the money system is virtually suspended for certain classes of necessities in short supply. Sugar for example has a value to the purchaser out of all proportion to the cash paid for it. A universal rationing system is easily practicable. The great advantage which the coupon possesses as an instrument of distribution is, that it automatically expires and cannot therefore confer permanent and absolute title to goods and services on the holder. Put a date of expiry on a bank note and we have, in effect, the same thing. We would not then require banks, only the Mint and a waste paper basket.

The coupon values would be based on supply and demand. Eventually supply would be determined by demand. If a generally required commodity were in short supply, separate coupons would be issued for that commodity as at present, but we would expect this only in the initial stages. The general purpose coupon, let us call it the Socialist Note, would allow the holder to procure any type of article, the coupon value of the article being fixed according to the supply available. When production of all the common necessities and luxuries ceased to be determined by geographical, physical or technical factors, it would be determined solely by consumers' orders and these commodities would then naturally come "off the ration." The issue of these commodities would be recorded merely as a book entry for check purposes, to avoid waste and to provide statistics on which the administration would base estimates for the future. Waste it may be remarked in passing would mean longer working hours. But let us make no mistake. Our society will not be a society of sheep who wear the same clothes, eat the same food, are entertained en masse and think the same thoughts. Every variety of article and products from all parts of the globe will be procurable and the tawdry baubles condescendingly bestowed on working folk by private "enterprise" will disappear. The Socialist Note would always be necessary to facilitate the equitable distribution, according to individual taste, of articles seldom in demand or difficult or dangerous to produce, that is if an article dangerous to produce cannot be dispensed with altogether.

We live in a money society which resembles any money society in that it has false standards of value. We say "What is he worth?" and we mean £ s. d., not intellect and service. According to the man of the world, so called, everyone has his price. But corruption and bribery must be outlawed in the new society. You could not purchase a man's soul or a woman's soul or body with clothing coupons or with notes which will be waste paper at the end of the quarter. But as long as we have a money society, monetary reform or not, we can have these horrors in our midst and Socialism will be afar off,

My reply to the Duke is, therefore, that if we press on for Socialism, Capitalist society will be forced to reform the financial system to stave off collapse, just as at present it may reform the insurance system a la Beveridge.

"SOME FORGOTTEN WORTHIES"

Under this heading, A.R., in The Literary Guide, for August, 1943, publishes the following review of Dr. Brook's work, Carlile and the Surgeons:—

There is no more signal instance of the biased way in which history is written than the treatment by historians of the political struggles of the early nineteenth century. One may read the accounts of that period in most standard text-books and get an impression somewhat like this: that a united British nation gloriously defeated Napoleon; that the war led to a certain amount of social distress and to certain regrettable incidents such as Peterloo; but that enlightened statesmenship weathered the storm and gave us first the Reform Bill and then the Repeal of the Corn Laws, thus ushering in the golden age of Queen Victoria, in which "freedom slowly broadened down from precedent to precedent" until we arrived on the scene.

How many of these historians mention Richard Carlile? Professor G. M. Trevelyan, an honourable exception, pays him due tribute; but most pass him over in silence. Even Mr. A. L. Morton's valuable "People's History of England," published by the Left Book Club, forgets him. Yet the name of Carlile alone should be a reminder that the early nineteenth century was not a period of enlightened statesmanship, but of fierce struggle between reaction and progress, every step forward (including the Reform Act and the Repeal of the Corn Laws) being preceded by revolutionary agitation and savage repression until change was forced on an unwilling oligarchy by sheer terror of worse.

Carlile was sent to prison in 1819, the year of Peterloo, for the crime of selling cheap editions of Paine's "Age of Reason" and another advanced book. His sentence was three years and a fine; but he refused to pay the fine and was kept in gaol for six years. The great Duke of Wellington demanded in the House of Lords that Carlile should be outlawed and transported for life; and Peel (another hero of the text-books) refused in the House of Commons to interfere with the sentence on one who promulgated "offensive and dangerous doctrines." After his release Carlile devoted himself to exposing the evils of the factory system, and in 1831 was imprisoned again (under the Government that passed the Reform Bill) for his outspoken championship of the agricultural labourers. This time he served two years. Later he was given a three years' sentence for refusing to pay Church rates, but was released after four months. He died in 1843 at the age of fifty-two, after, in Professor Trevelyan's words, "suffering and achieving more for the liberty of the press than any other Englishman."

Mr. Brook introduced us to some of Carlile's contemporaries and associates—William Lawrence, F.R.S., who got into how water for questioning, in a course of lectures at the Royal College of Surgeons, the historicity of the Biblical account of the creation of man, and who, after being championed by Carlile, disappointed him by recantation; Thomas Wakley, founder of "The Lancet" and a fearless Parliamentary champion of the people against an oppressive Poor Law; Joseph Hume, another Radical surgeon, who tried to get Carlile released from his first long imprisonment, but who rather angered him by his handling of the matter in Parliament; and Robert Taylor, the ex-parson, a close friend of Carlile, famous in his day as a courageous, if somewhat unbalanced, Bible-smasher and trail-blazer for the "myth" theory. Mr. Brook makes the incidental statement that Taylor in 1824 inaugurated the Christian Evidence Society! The pamphlet is adorned with portraitsof Carlile, Lawrence, Wakley, and Taylor. It is a useful centenary tribute to an outstanding fighter for freedom.

MOTHERWELL I.L.P. ACTIVITIES.

F. W. Jowett Again Defines His Attitude Towards the Duke of Bedford

The splendid activity of our comrade W. E. Currie, Organising Secretary of the I.L.P., and his comrades, on behalf of Socialism and Peace, and the unity of the working-class movement, continue. As a result of the meeting at the Empire Theatre, Motherwell, at which the Duke of Bedford spoke, comrades in Glasgow, belonging to the I.L.P. and the N.C.L., organised the successful Glasgow meetings, reported elsewhere in this issue. The income from the Glasgow gatherings went to the N.C.L. C.O. Prisoners' Fund and will assist greatly that most important work of maintainence and struggle against the victimisation of conscience.

An echo of the Motherwell meeting was reported in the Motherwell Times for Friday, August 20, as follows :—

TRADES COUNCIL TURNS DOWN PROTEST.

Motherwell and Wishaw Trades Council had a request made to them at their meeting on Wednesday night to protest against the Duke of Bedford's recent speech in Motherwell on the plea that the Duke is a pro-Fascist and that he does not represent the working class. The proposal was made by the Constructional Engineers' Union.

Opposing the motion, several delegates said they attended the meeting in question and had no fault to find with the Duke's speech.

By 11 votes to 8 the proposed protest was turned down.

The same issue of our contemporary reports the open forum meeting held the previous Sunday afternoon in the Lesser Town Hall by the I.L.P. Speeches were delivered by Miss Isa Colman, Women's Stop-War Movement, and Mr. M. Lyons, I.L.P. The speeches were followed by keen questions and discussion. Miss Colman developed an argument for a negotiated peace and Mr. Lyons attacked the Beveridge Plan and urged that Socialists should go after Socialism.

Comrade Currie sent a report of the Duke of Bedford's Motherwell meeting to our veteran comrade, F. W. Jowett, who is the outstanding national figure in the Socialist movement in Britain to-day. Jowett sent an interesting letter to comrade Currie, defining his own attitude towards the Duke. Later, at the request of comrade Currie, Jowett gave his permission for the letter to be published in The Word. Jowett's service and standing in the Socialist movement; his great Anti-Militarist stand during the first world war; his magnificant gesture of protest against war and his loyalty to Truth in connection with Nurse Cavell Memorial, when he was First Commissioner of Works in the 1924 Labour Government; these evidences of his worth and integrity and his great humanist loyalty to mankind as well as unswerving loyalty to his class in the struggle towards Socialist Society, lend tremendous weight to his words. We reproduce both comrade Jowett's letters to comrade W. E. Currie, that they might speak for themselves :—

Dear Comrade,—I shall be very pleased to have my letter re the Duke of Bedford's appearance on your Socialist platform at Motherwell published in "The Word" with Comrade Aldred's approval.

With all good wishes,
Yours fraternally,
(Signed) F. W. JOWETT.

10 Grantham Terrace, Bradford,
September, 8, 1943.

Dear Comrade,—Thanks for your letter re your I.L.P. meeting at the Forum addressed by the Duke of Bedford and Guy Aldred.

The Duke is a brave man and your meeting would greatly encourage him. Although I disagree with him on some points (as I do also with Comrade Aldred) I do not think he is far from being a convinced and staunch Socialist in spite of his upbringing and regardless of all possible adverse personal consequences.

With all good wishes,
Yours fraternally,
(Signed) F. W. JOWETT.

Bradford, August 19, 1943.

At the Reception given to the Duke of Bedford at the splendid No-Conscription League social in the I.L.P. Hall at Bridgeton, on Saturday, September 11, tribute was paid to comrade Currie for his earnest efforts in bringing the Socialist and Pacifist forces together in one great movement of action and social reconstruction. One result of that effort was seen the following day at the splendid meeting at the Cosmo Cinema, largely boycotted in the Capitalist press, when the Duke addressed a packed house, the halls having been closed on a large number of disappointed would-be listeners.

A small report that appeared in the Glasgow Bulletin on Monday, September 13, merits quotation :—

DUKE WANTS FAIR PEACE.

A negotiated peace fair to all parties was advocated by the Duke of Bedford when he spoke at a meeting held under the auspices of the No Conscription League in the Cosmo Cinema, Glasgow, yesterday.

"No people to-day," he said, "would continue the war if they realised that they were perfectly secure from military domination from the other side and were also going to receive a fair share of the world's resources."

It would be extremely necessary, added the Duke, to adopt in our own country, and by example to encourage the adoption in other countries, a sane financial and foreign trade policy. The present financial system which starved the whole country of purchasing power was a far greater evil than production for profit.

Very full reports of comrade Currie's long and consistent Socialist work in Lanarkshire are to hand. They will receive publicity as soon as possible. He is arranging United Socialist Activity throughout Lanarkshire. All wishing to help him, and to join in the splendid work of the Motherwell I.L.P., should write to him : W. E. Currie, 178 Muir Street, Motherwell.

Councillor EARL'S APPEAL

AN APPEAL TO ALL WHO SINCERELY BELIEVE IN WORLD BROTHERHOD, TO WHOM LIBERTY, EQUALITY, AND FRATERNITY ARE NOT MERELY WORDS, BUT LIFE ITSELF.

Comrades,

How many of us can listen to or read Abraham Lincoln's immortal words "that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth" without feeling a tremendous thrill, but when the thrill is passed what do we do about it? Emotion has its right and proper place, but unless that emotion is translated into action, the words that thrilled us have fallen on barren ground. I want to speak about words that thrill most of us every month, and they appear in our paper The Word. We read, we learn, and I hope are inspired and encouraged by the various writers, at any rate I know that that is the case so far as I am concerned. The Word strikes me as the most human, knowledgeable, broadminded paper there is. It literally breathes Liberty, Equality and Fraternity. However, that is not all. I and many others, have sought help and guidance in our struggle with vested interests, and never has our comrade Guy Aldred (busy as he is editing The Word) hesitated to give us all the assistance in his power not only by allowing us valuable space in the paper, but giving us the benefit of his own knowledge and experience.

I know too, that the widow and the fatherless, the men in the Forces and their wives and families, victimised or bewildered conscientious objectors, and the underdog generally, have never appealed in vain to Guy Aldred, either for expert advice or financial assistance. Many C.O.s have reason to be thankful for his careful preparation and successful pleading of their case. In short nothing is too much trouble for him to undertake, he is in the truest sense a brother to us all. He just hates to be dragged into the limelight and thanked, but it has been in my mind for some time to do this and I hope I shall have done it effectively. Knowing all this I have been very sorry to see that it has been necessary for him to appeal for funds to carry on the good work of himself and The Word. Unfortunately in a capitalist order of society, propaganda work of any kind costs money, and when it is of the kind done by Aldred and The Word, it is the obvious duty of all of us to see that the backing he requires and deserves is readily and substantially forthcoming. You may not believe it, but when I wrote to Comrade Aldred asking permission to make this appeal, I had almost to go on my hands and knees about it, he did permit me to do it, but with the remark "I do hate begging!" So do I hate begging and I'm not going to beg, I'm going to ask and not beat about the bush either. We can't all be newspaper proprietors, editors or writers, but we can see that a newspaper we all like and respect, a newspaper that is doing the work we most want done, a newspaper that inspires, encourages and gives us hope for the future, is not allowed to suffer for lack of funds. It is not enough merely to buy the paper, twopence is too little to pay for so much. I ask you all to set aside a definite amount each month, and persuade your trade union branches, your peace groups, women's guilds, etc., to send donations to keep this work going. The sort of work which is to build a new order of society, where war, poverty and all the other evils shall no longer exist, the work that is ours to do.

Yours in the struggle,

CHAS. A. EARL.

[Comrade Earl has asked that we allow the above appeal to stand as he wrote it. We objected, and still object, that our somewhat weary imprisonments are a thing of the past and call for no comment to-day; that we would be unhappy did we do not play our part in the struggle to-day; and that actually, since we probably stumbled a lot in the struggle, no praise is deserved. On the other hand, we aim at loyal service and we need some help. Our deficit appeal was not quite made, but a London curate made a conditional offer of help which will be announced next month.—Ed.]

CARLILE AND THE SURGEONS.

By CHARLES WORTHAM BROOK.

Stories of The Surgeon of Dorchester Gaol; The Surgeon Who Recanted; The Surgeon Who Became a Party Leader; The Surgeon Who Became The Devil's Chaplain; The Surgeon at the Post Mortem. Illustrated. A wonderful Study of the early 19th century.

The Monthly Record of the South Place Ethical Society, for July, 1943, publishes the following interesting review from the pen of our comrade, F. G. Gould :—

This book is a contribution to the recent celebration of the Centenary of Richard Carlile, whose death occurred on February 10, 1843. The author is a medical man whose recently acquired interest in Richard Carlile has led him to investigate the relations between that great champion of the Freedom of the Press and various members of the healing profession. That Carlile was a student of medical science is shown by a long "open letter" addressed to the Surgeon of Dorchester Gaol, which Dr. Brook has included in his book. This letter is mainly concerned with the merits of crude mercury as an aperient and will be read no doubt with surprise and disapprobation by modern specialists. Carlile was as critical of doctors as of parsons and for equally good reasons. There is additional information about the Reverend Robert Taylor, M.R.C.S.—the Devil's Chaplain, who was associated with Carlile after the latter's release from his longest term of imprisonment. Perhaps the most interesting part of Dr. Brook's intriguing compilation is the story of Sir William Lawrence who, as a young Professor of Anatomy and Surgery at the Royal College of Surgeons, delivered in 1817 lectures "On the Physiology, Zoology and Natural History of Man," which led to him being publicly rebuked by John Abernethy, F.R.S., Surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. After a spirited defence Lawrence was led, presumably in his own professional interest, to publish a recantation of his unorthodox opinions and to promise never to publish anything more on similar subjects; Carlile would not, however, let the matter rest, for in 1823, without the sanction or consent of the author, he reprinted the lectures in question. Lawrence's lecture "On Life," is included in Dr. Brook's book, and can be read with advantage even at the present day. There is a striking comparison of Lawrence's recantation with that of Galileo.

SOVIETISM AND FREE SPEECH IN BRITAIN

SHOULD CRITICISM BE SUPPRESSED?

The Accuracy of D. N. Pritt, K.C., considered.

By H. W. Henederson

Speaking in the House of Commons on March 22, 1943, Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., drew attention to a lecture delivered by Miss May Findlay to troops in Scotland on February 16.

Mr. Pritt asked the War Minister whether he was aware that Miss Findlay had made a strongly worded anti-Soviet speech in the course of which she stated:

1. That Russian citizens are slaves of the State;
2. That children are, and have for the last four years, been taken from their mothers at birth and, save by chance, are never seen by their parents again;
3. That there is no public religious observance at all; and
4. That persons who grumble are shot.

Mr. Pritt desired to know whether the War Minister would put a stop to this sort of thing and provide the troops with lectures which would tell the truth about the Soviet Union.

Mr. Pritt's position is an interesting one. He confesses to an intense admiration for the Soviet system. He has delivered lectures in many parts of the country in praise of it and has been given complete liberty to do so. Yet in the Soviet Union, whatever other merits it may possess, there is neither freedom of speech nor freedom of the press. Mr. Pritt could not name a single newspaper in the Soviet Union published in opposition to the Government. The Soviet Constitution guarantees (on paper) freedom of the speech and freedom of the press.

Yet all but the very blindest are aware that opposition to the Government is considered treason and is treated as such. If Mr. Pritt were attempting to express an honest opinion in the U.S.S.R. and if that opinion conflicted with the fundamental policies of the Government he knows the fate that would await him. Listen to Louis Fischer, for fourteen years a newspaper correspondent in the Soviet Union:

"The bill of rights in the Constitution grants and guarantees by law, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and meetings and freedom of street marches and demonstrations. In life these liberties are non-existant. If a Soviet citizen were to try to publish an article or letter or make a speech attacking the Soviet Government . . . he would soon find himself in gaol. The Soviet regime permits only a single political party . . . In the Soviet Union there is no protection for a political minority . . . Political opponents and political minorities are purged by shooting, exile or imprisonment."—"Men and Politics."

This is the position, then, in Soviet Russia, a country which Mr. Pritt is never tired of holding up as a model to the British Empire. Seeing that the British Government allows Mr. Pritt to express his opinions with complete freedom, and considering that the Government he admires will not permit the slightest criticism of its fundamental policies, one would have imagined that Mr. Pritt would be thankful for the privileges our form of Government accords to him, and allow to others the same freedom as he himself enjoys. Not so—Mr. Pritt stands up in Parliament and urges the War Minister to put a stop to the expression of opinions of which he does not approve.

I do not know Miss Findlay, the lady of whom Mr. Pritt complains. If her statements about the Soviet Union are inaccurate it is a pity. But it is hardly conceivable that they can be any more inaccurate than those of Mr. Pritt himself. Let us give one example out of many.

Speaking ni Edinburgh on January 4, 1943, Mr. Pritt asserted that the Soviet Union "had built up its industries without borrowing money, and any industry the Russians had they had got by planning it themselves and by starving themselves while they built it." ("Scotsman," 6/1/43). Moreover, it would appear, according to Mr. Pritt, that, on the average, the Russian Government had "multiplied real wages seven times" during a period of thirteen years, and that Russians had the "highest rural standard of living in the world." The Russians have "liquidated illiteracy" and before the War they instituted a seven-hour day, "the shortest working day in the world." Other statements of an equally amazing character were made but I select these four points as being representative of his general argument. Mr. Pritt is a critic of the accuracy of others. Let us see how accurate he is himself.

First we have the claim that the Soviet Government has built and developed Russian industries without assistance (for this is what Mr. Pritt's remarks amount to). In actual fact,

"during the first five-year plan not a single plant was erected or a new industry launched without the direct help of foreigners working on the spot."—(N. A. de Basily: "Russia under Soviet Rule."

Speaking at the seventh Soviet Congress Ordzhonikidze, People's Commissar for Heavy Industry, made the following admission:

"Our plants, our mines, and our factories are now supplied with an excellent technical equipment which is unequalled in any country. You may ask, how does it happen that no other country has such a perfect technique as we have? Where did we obtain it? We have bought from the Americans, the Germans, the French, and the English the most improved machinery, the latest achievements of world technique, and we have provided our plants with them."

Even the giant Dnieprostroy Dam, which is featured so much in Communist propaganda, was built by the American engineer Colonel Cooper, and other foreign experts, as Boris Souverine points out in his monumental biography "Stalin." Souverine says, with justice, that while sneering at "moribund capitalism," the Bolsheviks made the fullest possible experience and competence of great capitalist firms like Ford, Austin, General Electric, Westinghouse and other, "whose creative work the mouthpieces of the party shamelessly attribute to themselves."

So much for the accuracy of Mr. Pritt, the critic of Miss Findlay, on this particular issue. Let us briefly examine other points. "Real wages have multiplied seven times in 13 years." This is not the opinion of numerous Communists and Communist sympathisers, who have lived in the Soviet Union in recent years. Mr. W. H. Chamberlain, for 12 years correspondent in Russia for the "Christian Science Monitor," estimates the real wage of the Russian manual worker before the Revolution at 18 to 20 American dollars a month. "To-day," he continues, "the purchasing power of the monthly average wage of the Soviet worker or employee works out at 12 American dollars." ("A False Utopia"). Mr. Chamberlain's conclusions are supported by Victor Serge, friend and associate of Lenin, and former member of the Executive Committee of the Communist International ("The Destiny of a Revolution"), by the American Communist Andrew Smith, formerly member of the Cleveland City Central Committee of the Communist Party of the U.S.A., who spent three years as a machinist in the Soviet Union and by numerous other witnesses. None of these people noticed a seven-fold increase in the Russian standard of living. At the time they wrote—a few short years ago—they were of the opinion that the standard of life had decreased rather than increased since Tsarist times.

An interesting fact, which may not be unrelated to Mr. Pritt's assertion that the Soviet standard of living has increased seven-fold, is the following, revealed by the French Communist, Yvon, disillusioned after many years' experience of the Soviet system:—Before the War the monthly wage of the average worker was 30 roubles. In 1937 (after 20 years of Communism) it was 220 roubles—7 times greater. But the price of a kilo loaf was 5 kopecs before the War: in 1937 it was 85 kopecs, or 17 times as much!

With regard to "the liquidation of illiteracy," which Mr. Pritt has mentioned, Boris Souverine, formerly leader of the French Communist Party, who spent a considerable period in the Soviet Union, considers this another myth, like freedom of the Press and freedom of election (both "guaranteed" by the Constitution and both completely non-existent). But supposing illiteracy has been wiped out, where is the advantage if people are fed on State-provided propaganda and not allowed to read the other side? Can there be any real mental development under such a system? Is such an education really worth while?

Finally there is "the seven-hour day," which must sound extremely attractive to people who know nothing of the actual facts of Soviet life. Perhaps the most effective reply to Mr. Pritt is to be found in the words of the American Communist, Andrew Smith, not a parlour Bolshevik but a manual worker speaking of his actual experiences in the workshops:

"In America the Communists raised the slogan of the six-hour day while in the Soviet Union you have a sixteen or seventeen hour day, if you count the seven hours regular labour and the ten hours SUBOTNIK, which is actually compulsory. Some of the Russian workers actually work in two factories to make ends meet."

The present is not the first occasion on which Mr. Pritt has called upon the Government to take action against someone with whose opinions he disagrees. In view of what has been said in this examination of one of his own political lectures (and it is typical of many that he has delivered since the "imperialist" war became a war for human justice) it would seem appropriate that he should consider more carefully the reliability or otherwise of some of his own assertions. We desire the friendliest co-operation with Russia in the post-war years. But the exaggerated praise of everything Russian by men like Mr. Pritt and their intolerant attitude towards those who disagree with them bid fair to create a spirit of resentment rather than goodwill in the hearts of British people and to prevent a fair comparison of our different ways of living.

MY ACCOUNT WITH THE UNKNOWN SOLDIER.

Do I not have an account to settle between my soul and him? They sent men like me into the camps to touch those secret, holy springs within him so that with loyalty and self-sacrifice he might go out to war.

O war, I hate you most of all for this, that you lay your hands on the noblest elements in human character, with which we might make a heaven on earth, and you use them to make a hell on earth instead. You take our science, our loyalty, our unselfishness, with which we might make the earth beautiful, and using these our finest qualities, you make death fall from the sky and burst up from the sea and hurtle from the unseen ambuscade sixty miles away; you blast fathers in the trenches while you are starving their children at home with blockades and you so bedeviled the world that years after the armistice we cannot be sure who won the War, so sunk in the same disaster are victors and vanquished alike.

I will do the best I can to settle my account with the unknown soldier. I renounce war because of what it does to our own men. I have seen the long, long hospital trains filled with their mutilated bodies; I remember the maimed men for whom the war is not yet over. I renounce war because of what it compels us to do to our enemies, bombing their mothers in villages, starving their children, laughing over our coffee cups about every damnable thing we have been able to do to them. I renounce war for the undying hatred it arouses, for the dictatorships it puts in the place of democracy, for the starvation that stalks after it.

I renounce war and never again, directly or indirectly, will I support another! O Unknown Soldier, in penitent reparation I make you that pledge.

MINERS' LEADERS: THEIR EVOLUTION

What Do The Miners Say?

Recent incidents in the coalfields, and the speeches of miners' leaders in relation to the post-war conditions and their concept of the way to world peace, make this enquiry timely.

Mr. John Wilson, M.P., D.C.L., died on March 24, 1915. He was born in 1837. He had been a member of the Durham Miners' Association E.C. since 1875. He became treasurer in 1882; financial secretary in 1890-1896; corresponding secretary, 1896-1905; general secretary, 1905. He occupied this position at the time of his death, besides being Liberal M.P. for Mid-Durham since 1890. For a number of years prior to his death, he consistently applauded Lord Joicey, the mine-owner, as a generous minded man, and maintained that the employers of Durham were as good a body of employers as were to be found anywhere in the world. These nice things were said, of course, in the presence of the employers concerned. Wilson had worked as a collier in England and the United States and his statements were received as having the hall-mark of personal experience.

James Joicey was born in 1846. He died on November 21, 1936. Whereas Wilson lived to be 78 years of age, Joicey lived to be over 90. He was chairman and managing director of James Joicey and Co. Ltd., and the Lambton Collieries, Ltd., the two largest colliery companies of Durham. He was Liberal M.P. for Chester-le-Street, Co. Durham, 1885-1905. He became a Baron in 1905 and joined the Conservative Party in 1931.

Joicey reciprocated Wilson's tributes. He repeatedly avowed, in public, that he had good reason to thank Wilson for good, wholesome advice. The trade union leader (Wilson) was one of the shrewdest men in the coal trade and had been a father to him (Joicey). It was always a pleasure to attend any meeting where John Wilson was speaking. There was no better representative of his class in the House of Commons than Mr. Wilson.

Since Lord Joicey declared this to be the case, it will be understood that it was so. Wilson only represented the miners in the House of Commons for a period of twenty-five years. He was an elected miners' leader for forty years. He led and represented them so well that their lot remains one of appalling oppression and poverty. Which only shows the value of trades unionism, parliamentarism, and labour careerism.

Wilson described himself as a "Christian Socialist." Examined, this meant that he was neither a Christian nor a Socialist. He repudiated the idea of social ownership of the means and instruments of wealth production. He clung tenaciously to Liberalism and affirmed the identity of interests of capital and labour. He claimed to have lived in different periods and under changed and changing economic conditions; to have seen a great revolution in the relations between employer and employed; and to have witnessed a mitigation, if not a complete destruction of the animus and antagonism which had existed. He had noticed the gulf separating these two sections of the community, narrow beyond the dreams of possibility forty years before—he made this declaration in 1912—and he had not praise for, nor thanks to the man who sought to widen it.

The majority of the Durham miners subscribed to this rubbish. Wilson continued to proclaim these platitudes whilst the miner continued in his misery of living. Wilson lived well and enjoyed great public repute. What has the miner of to-day to say to Wilson's successes in parliament and the Union? Can he not see how little worth or integrity there is in them?

In June, 1910, Wilson had the honorary degree of D.C.L. conferred on him by Durham University. The robes and cap and a handsome leather case were subscribed for and presented to him by the Durham members of the Senate. Dean Kitchen, as Chancellor, in making the presentation, stated that Mr. Wilson as one who was engaged in making the laws of England, would now, having the degree of D.C.L., have a deeper increased amount of responsibility on his shoulders!

In presenting Mr. Wilson at the Convocation in the Castle Hall, the then Bishop of Durham referred to him as one whose name was a household word in the county as that of a great and trusted leader of men, esteemed alike by employers and employed, a man who was animated by the highest and most patriotic motives, whose zeal for his fellows was tempered by the wisdom of discrimination, possessing that true vision of national life which refuses to see any necessary conflict between capital and labour or between class and class, and upholds the principle that "each man has some part to play."

Wilson replied to Dean Kitchen: He declared that the degree was not a personal affair, but an honour to the miners. It meant his self-respect had secured the respect of others. As a guarantee that he would wear the robes and cap with becoming dignity, he referred to his life of between forty and fifty years of severe struggle in the cause of social and other reforms! So the nauseous cant went on, whilst men and boys were toiling and suffering in the mines.

At a meeting of the Conciliation Board in 1910, Wilson, as a mouthpiece of his Trade Union Committee, offered to accept a reduction in the men's wages. Lord Collins, as umpire, afterwards said that no reduction was due.

In 1911, the Cambrian agreement was signed by Enoch Edwards, Abraham, Richards and Ashton. The South Wales Miners repudiated it and commenced a national strike agitation. As a chairman at the Durham Gala, Wilson threw in his lot with the officials, denounced "these men" who opposed it, and avowed "that there is not an agreement in the mining world equal to it!"

When Fenwick, the miners' leader and Liberal member for Wansbeck completed his twenty-one years' service in Parliament, Lord Joicey publicly presented him with a cheque for £260. Wilson thanked Joicey for presiding, and jocularly asked the latter to bribe him to the same extent.

These facts caused George Harvey, a working miner, then editor of the Socialist, and a member of the Chester-le-Street Industrial Union Group, to write and publish, in June, 1912, a criticism of Mr. Wilson in a pamphlet entitled: "Does Dr. John Wilson, M.P., serve the working class?" Actually, this pamphlet was a reply to a challenge, and was issued, not as a personal attack on Wilson, but as a condemnation of the policy pursued by trade union leaders and Trade Unionism throughout the world. Wilson's record was cited as typical.

After quoting certain figures to prove that the exploitation of the worker was increasing, Harvey stated that Wilson knew his statement about interest between master and man to be false. Harvey added that, during his career as a "labour leader," Wilson had > looked at things through a master's telescope. He may deserve the esteem of the employer, but not of the employed. His aim has always been to bolster up capitalism, and he, more than any other leader perhaps, has swayed the miners to take that particular kind of action which is either harmless or beneficial to the capitalist class.

Harvey complained that > all the changes which have been made for the purpose of getting efficient workmen, Wilson would have us believe, had for their object the betterment of the miner's lot. They are weighted down by argument to prove his maxim—"Reform not Revolution." They furnish the wished for material for capitalists to mask themselves. Nor is the material wasted. Like its author, it is trotted out and made good use of at charity affairs and other fakes of the capitalist class. And he rejoices in the praises of the Lords Coal and Pool, and makes it known publicly that a cheque from their hands would not come amiss. . . . If £260 is the price, then miners' leaders are cheap and worth getting at.

Commenting on Wilson's Durham Gala Speech Harvey stated that the former cast his weight, Judas-like, against the men of South Wales, although he knew that neither monetary figures nor assurances were in the agreement, and that the Law Courts had decided against the Welsh miners on the question of the claiming of consideration for abnormal places, pointing out that any such payment was really charity.

These passages offended Wilson who demanded that the pamphlet's author should apologise for, and withdraw these statements. Harvey refused to do this, and so Wilson instituted proceedings for libel. The case was heard at the November Newcastle Assizes, and resulted in the plaintiff securing £200 damages and an injunction. Court and Jury upheld the plaintiff's contention that his position as a miners' leader was absolutely gone if any general body of men among the miners thought that one-tenth of Harvey's allegations were true. He (Wilson) would be ruined in every way, and would lose the reputation he had won and held for many years.

We understand that this would have been a calamity for Wilson. On this ground all criticism of careerists and careerism can be stilled. Trade Unionism, in our view, is a snare and delusion to labour, and the reputation of every trade union leader is founded on a false attempt to identify the interests of capital and labour.

Since 1906 our aim has been to destroy Trade Unionism, to expose the false reputations of trade union leaders, to penetrate their mask of virtue, to promote revolt against capitalism and its tools. If our Law Courts say we must not criticise the labour leader, because it is his business to make his living out of leading labour, we can only say that this legal recognition of the identity of interests with the capitalist system is no argument against, but a reason for, our antagonism. In 1912 we appealed from the Law Court decision, this no-de-script jury, this capitalist judge, and this labour leader represented by solicitor, junior, and King's Counsel, to Harvey's comrades, the Durham miners. What did they think of this prosecution?

Harvey addressed a splendid defence to the court. He contended, in our opinion rightly, that his attack on Dr. Wilson was not false nor malicious, but fair comment on matters of public interest. Seeing that Wilson admitted the accuracy of Harvey's facts in the witness-box, and only questioned his deductions; seeing, further, that Wilson admitted that Harvey attacked, not his reputation, but his policy; we agreed with Harvey, that a more flimsy and childish case had never come before a Court of Law. This awful criticism was no better and no worse than any other criticism. Wilson was not a schoolboy, but a man of great ability, who had had facts and figures brought before him for the past twenty or thirty years bearing upon the social and economic conditions of the people. He had a right to know that that which he advocated was entirely contrary to the facts which had come under his notice. He was bound to know, as a Liberal, that his party was staking their cause upon the misery and degradation of the people. Still he deliberately wrote down statements opposite to the facts.

This was the gist of Harvey's case. It speaks for itself. Even supposing it to have been a little too exacting, which we do not admit, his prosecution was a scandalous proceeding, a menace to all honest writing and terse, firm criticism. Accordingly, in our organ The Herald of Revolt for December 1912 (Vol. II, No. 12), we expressed the hope that the Durham Miners would have a word to say to Wilson with reference to it.

One miner in particular responded—Will Lawther!

We published his reply in The Herald of Revolt for February 1913 (Vol. III, No. 1). It is reproduced exactly as printed at the time:—

WILSON v. HARVEY

WHAT A DURHAM MINER THINKS ABOUT IT.

(By WILL LAWTHER).

Commenting upon the result of the libel action of John Wilson v. George Harvey in your December issue, you ask what do Harvey's comrades, the Durham miners, think about it. As one who is a member of the Durham Miners' Association, and a worker down the mine like our comrade Harvey, I venture with your permission to express my opinion on the same.

To those of your readers who know not the Durham miner, nor the way he is tricked on every hand, a little explanation is necessary.

It has been the custom for many years, whenever the period came round for the election of the Executive Committee of the Durham Miners' Association, for certain persons who wish to be "leaders of men" to start an agitation for "reform of the rules of the association," "wages to govern prices" (this savours of the "comedy" economists), or the latest cry of the "Forward" (?) Movement (a body of office-seekers who already hold checkweight jobs and other positions that have salaries attached to them), "better conditions for surface workers, etc., etc. This (the reformer and office-seeker) method has gone on for a long time, and as the various items in their programme passed away and the reformers got scrambled into office, the official element never got into any alarm over these conjurors' tricks. But when a working-miner who is not out for office comes forward to criticise not only the foundation (the trade-union) but the contemptible and dirty actions of the paid officials, legal action is taken, with the result as stated, £200 for speaking the truth.

If it is true what Harvey wrote, then let those who believe it say so. The mere fact of a capitalist judge and jury deciding in Wilson's favour is sufficient proof that whatever Harvey had said or written was not true in their eyes. But the facts of the every-day life of the miners, and the prejudices of those who batten on his degradation, are two different points of view, and can never be reconciled as long as capitalism lasts. Harvey wrote as a working miner; Wilson, the judge, and jury think and write from their standpoint, which is that of parasites living on the working miners, HENCE THEIR OPINIONS MUST BE DIFFERENT. How can they be otherwise?

People who think they know what a miner's daily life is, and yet have not lived that life for thirty years, should not be offended when the truth is told them We who live that life, who know what it means to have to scrub along throughout the year and have nothing to show at the 31st of December except poverty and, perhaps, a comrade less who has lost his life in the mine, must show, not only to the paid officials, but to civilisation if needs be, that we are not satisfied. It is up to us, as miners, to show to George Harvey, by word or deed, that we believe what he said was true. Everyone of us believes it—I have never met anyone who took an opposite view—then why be silent? Is a mere libel action to crush the spirit of revolt? They who think it will, are very much mistaken. From the stand that Harvey has taken, a movement has arisen right throughout the northern coalfield for "direct action" against the "law and order" fiends. And I believe that, during the forthcoming summer, the gospel of revolt, of direct action, of anti-leadership will spread, not because Harvey or any other person believes in it, but because of the oppression and tyranny that is taking place in the mines, due to the development of the trust and combine. This is a factor that many ignore, but just as it has awakened the rank-and-file, so will it awaken he who follows the crowd, which is the function of a "leader." He always takes hold of any end of the stick, if, by taking hold, his own end of the economic problem is solved for him.

Ideas as to social and industrial revolution and betterment do not originate in the heads of men, nor do they drop from heaven; they arise out of the mode of production, and men espouse them. Thus the ideal of direct action, open revolt against capitalism, with all its tools of Labour M.P.s, parsons, and trade union leaders, arise from the existing conditions. The person who has nothing to lose except a "soft job" will not fight for the overthrow of capitalism (except at election times, when he moves further on the worker's back). To you, fellow-slave of the lamp and pick, I appeal to carry on the fight. Do not wait for any leader to show you the way. "The time is rotten ripe for change" of tactics. Make the change yourselves. You have the capacity for thinking: think and act then, for only thus will your freedom from all tyranny be secured.

Will Lawther continued in this Anarchist, Socialist, direct-activist frame of mind for a while. The fact raised his stock among the miners.

The Herald of Revolt ceased publication in May, 1914. We replaced it by The Spur, in June 1914. In The Spur, for February 1915, Vol. I, No. 8, we published a column "What Readers think." One of the letters was from Will Lawther. It read as follows:—

> Your article on "A Call to Manhood" is very fine indeed, and makes a splendid appeal to the man "within a man or men," rather than the appeals to-day to men to be murderers. All things stand for the moment on their head. Even some who professed to have seen the light, have gone to be butcherers of their fellows that they know not. The night is dark, but let us hope that the morrow breaks clear, and in the light, mankind will see the truth.
> Chopwell. WILL LAWTHER.

We reprint "A Call to Manhood" in a separate column, so that the reader can note the Anti-Militarism that Lawther applauded in 1915.

If the reader will go into some public library and consult Who's Who, he will find the following account of William Lawther:—

LAWTHER, WILLIAM: Executive Secretary, Durham Miners' Association; President, Mineworkers'

Federation of Great Britain; General Council Trades Union Congress; Miners' National Welfare; Anglo-French T.U. Commission; b. Northumberland, 1889. Educ. Colliery School; Central Labour College, London. Contested South Shields, 1922-23-24; M.P. (Lab.) Barnard Castle, 1929-1931; Durham County Council, 1925-29; Member National Labour Party Executive Committee, 1923-26.

Now re-read Will Lawther's 1913 Herald of Revolt article. Note how the member of the Durham Miners' Association has arrived. The "worker down the mine like our comrade Harvey" has attained to much the same position as that once enjoyed by John Wilson.

And what about his Anti-Militarism of 1915? At the Labour Party Conference he upheld Vansittartism, which has since been repudiated by the Trades Union Congress. As leader of the British miners, Will Lawther broadcast a message of explanation to the German people, the resolution was felt to be so outrageous. This was as bad as the original militarist resolution and our comrades F. W. Jowett and Emrys Hughes have had to take Lawther to task for his ridiculous militarism.

Such is the evolution of the miners' leader.

WHEN YOU HAVE FOUGHT FOR FREEDOM'S CAUSE

When you have fought and bled for Freedom's cause,
And you are home again, we'll make great laws,
That not one single worker will complain
Of ever being left out in the rain.

Many of you will not return, we know—
We've bungled things a little bit—but show
The bulldog spirit, die like gods, and we
Will shield your wives and kids eternally.

You have a cause—as you have always had,
For are you not the chosen men of God,
To keep the world safe for Democracy,
And give all men—but niggers—liberty.

So fight like lions—as you've always done,
Crush in the mud the face of every Hun,
And when the war is over you can tell
How you saved all from slavery and Hell.

But is there any need to tell you this?
You know full well from past experiences
That British rulers always keep their word,
That's why our greatest ally is the Lord.

JOE CORRIE.

(Concluded from Column 3)

We are opposed to war, but we have never gone out of our way to sabotage the war effort. We do not disguise our sympathy with the miners.

Responsibility lies with the owners and the authorities who put the first man in jail.

The Daily Mail interviewed the Duke of Bedford. Replying to the Miners' Union allegation, he said :—

I don't know what they are talking about. They are hostile to me because of my views on the war, I suppose, and this is just abuse.

I categorically deny that I have anything whatever to do with the strike.

In the Friday, October 1, issue of the Daily Worker, Harry McShane, after summarising, not too correctly, the statements of Stirling and Russell, continues :—

The Scottish organiser of the I.L.P. also pleads innocence. It so happens, however, that the I.L.P. organ in its issue of August 7 boosted the Militant Miners and referred to Hugh Brannan's connection with it.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

Hugh Brannan was put up for presidency of the Lanarkshire Miners' Union. He took the chair at a I.L.P. branch meeting addressed by the Duke of Bedford a few months ago. Although he is attached to No. 6 branch of the union, he attended a meetin g of No. 1 district, which is the district most affected by the strike.

This statement is false. Hugh Brannan did not take the chair at a meeting addressed by the Duke of Bedford. It would prove nothing if he had done so. The fact that he did not do so discredits completely McShane and his "Communist" associates. Truth has no place in their propaganda.

CARDOWAN PIT STRIKE

"Communist" Officials Blame Anarchists, Troskyists and the Duke of Bedford

AND HERE ARE THE FACTS!

A pit strike began at Cardowan Colliery, Stepps on Thursday morning, September 23, 1943, as a protest against the arrest of three miners who had failed to pay fines imposed on them for taking part in an alleged illegal strike in May. The May stoppages covered thirty-two days. The protest-strike spread throughout Lanarkshire during the week. The main area of the strike was No. 1 District in the North-West of the county, but stoppages took place as far south as Castlehill, Carluke and Canderrigg, Netherburn. At the height of the stoppage it was reported that over 20 collieries were idle, involving over 7000 men.

In the last stages of the dispute there were sixteen men in prison. The strike ended on Monday, October 1.

ANARCHISTS AND DUKE OF BEDFORD BLAMED

Mr. Abe Moffat, President of National Union of Scottish Mineworkers, in a statement to the press on Wednesday, September 29, blamed Anarchists, Trotskyists, the I.L.P., and the Duke of Bedford. Why did not someone remind Moffat of his history as a miners' leader, his activity in the Miners' Reform Union which rose in opposition to the then official union, and his reputation based on attacking officials who betrayed the miners in their struggles? Let us remind Moffat that we recall Kirkcaldy days when we met him in James Bryson's house. Does he remember? But does he recall all his "revolutionary" froth and his indignation when we refused to take his pretensions seriously. What a tribe these "Communist" opponents of Adamson have shown themselves!

Moffat told the press :—

It is imperative that all miners should be acquainted with the actual position, so that they can deal with disruptive elements. . . .

The six lads in prison are victims of a deliberately planned plot not to advance the interests of the union, but to bring about a political situation for a group of people identified with the Anarchist movement, I.L.P. and so-called militant miners who are definitely opposed to the war against Fascism and have no interest whatever in the affairs of the miners.

The only people who can lose by following the lead of these anti-union elements are the miners themselves. The people who will gain are the Fascists and the associates of the Duke of Bedford.

The reference to the Duke of Bedford and his associates is nonsense. Most of the capitalist press regarded this excursion of political hate as being far-fetched and refused to publish it. But the Daily Mail and the Daily Worker gave it publicity.

CARDOWAN BRANCH OFFICIALS SUSPENDED

The relationship between the executive of the National Union of Scottish Mineworkers and the Cardowan Pit strikers took a dramatic turn immediately following the executive statement to the press. The Executive met the Cardowan Branch officials at Hamilton that night and decided to suspend the three chief office-bearers. The latter admitted that they were responsible for the issue of a leaflet in the name of the branch. This leaflet was circulated throughout the Lanarkshire coalfields. They declined to repudiate the leaflet.

STRIKERS' MEETING

Next day, September 30, the suspended officials addressed a meeting at Hamilton. A resolution calling for the release of the imprisoned miners and for the removal of the suspension of the Cardowan officials was carried by 276 votes to 8.

This meeting demanded the release of all men imprisoned, the suspension of all existing summonses, and negotiations with the Government Departments concerned for modification of regulations which govern working conditions in the industry, so as to make these regulations adaptable to the day-to-day conditions in the pits.

Regarding the imprisonment of miners, and their fining for taking part in stoppages, the meeting declared that this treatment of miners as "criminals" offers a threat to every miner in the exercise of his elementary right as a trade unionist.

In our view, this is a correct statement. The demand ought to be upheld by every lover of civil liberty throughout the length and breadth of the country.

OFFICIAL MEETINGS

The executive held meetings in the same area as the strikers on the Thursday also, recommending that work be resumed.

ANDREW STIRLING'S STATEMENT

The suspended officials were Andrew Stirling (Cardowan), President; Robert Archibald, Secretary; and Patrick McGowan, Treasurer.

Andrew Stirling stated to the press that the Union Executive was evading the issue :—

The stoppage was a spontaneous expression of the unrest rampant in the Lanarkshire coalfield.

I want to make it clear that on the first day of this dispute at Cardowan no branch official and no member of the pit committee advised any man to go home. What was done was decided by the men themselves. Any accusations against branch officials are fiction.

This, of course, is true.

Stirling added that he was friendly with Gilbert Russell, editor of the Hamilton Trotskyist publication, The Militant Miner.

Russell used to be a miner and was at one time closely connected with the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation which was later superseded by the United Socialist Movement. The Anti-Parliamentary Socialist Movement was pioneered in Lanarkshire by Daniel Mullen, whose story was given in The Word for July, 1942.

For some years past, Russell has been a Trotskyist and so entirely out of sympathy with his former comrades of the Anarchist, Anti-Parliamentary and Socialist Movements.

Stirling further explained :—

At no time have I contributed either by articles or financially to "The Militant Miner."

The only connection I have had with that organisation was when I attended a meeting in Hamilton in May, and I was asked to leave my seat in the audience and take the chair. I did so.

"The Militant Miner" put forward my name as a likely man for the Lanarkshire union executive at the time of the last union elections.

I think their support has led to the executive linking up the Militant Miners with the Cardowan dispute, but there is no connection whatever. None of the Cardowan branch officials expelled to-night is in the I.L.P. and I don't think there is one member of the Anarchist organisation working at Cardowan.

Stirling's statement is correct, for the Anarchist and Anti-Parliamentarian Movements are confined to Blantyre, Burnbank, Hamilton and Motherwell.

Gilbert Russell made a statement to the Daily Express. He is secretary of the Hamilton Divisional Labour Party. He defined the policy of The Militant Scottish Miner. We reproduce his statement :—

We have fought Fascism all along and will continue to fight it. The Militant Scottish Miner has a purely industrial outlook and is in no way connected with any political party.

We have in no way tried to influence the miners to go on strike, nor have we tried to destroy the trade union.

Dan Carradice, Scottish organiser of the I.L.P. said that it was nonsense to blame the strike on to political groups when the cause was the failure of the Union to maintain the standard of living.

Eddie Shaw, of the Glasgow Anarchist Group, interviewed by the Scots Daily Express, denied that Anarchists had incited the strike. He added pointedly :—

(Concluded foot Column 1)

THE MOVING FINGER WRITES

The death of Lord Wedgwood did not receive the notice that it merited from Socialists and Pacifists. Josiah Wedgwood was a man of contradictions yet he had a flair for liberty and justice. Lady Constance Malleson (Colette O'Neil) in her "After Ten Years," published by Jonathan Cape in 1931, has a description of a C.O. meeting that was held every Wednesday evening during the critical anti-conscription struggle period of the last war, at Gustave's Restaurant, Soho. She describes Snowden, Mrs. Snowden, George Lansbury,

"And Josiah Wedgwood, with his thin, hatchet face, deeply tanned, and his lean body very taut—and whole of him uncompromisingly on the side of liberty in every single issue. A born fighter—if ever there was one."

Later,in the same work, she describes the Albert Hall meeting, on March 31, 1917, with Josiah Wedgwood on the platform. This was to celebrate the great Russian Revolution, first episode.

On the outbreak of the First World War, Josiah Wedgwood stood for social revolution but immediately became an ardent militarist, and served in the war. His militarism did not make him any the less libertarian and he repeatedly defended the Conscientious Objector in vigorous questions and speeches in the House of Commons. At a later period, he protested against the opening of our correspondence by the Government. He raised also the question of our 1921-22 imprisonment. All these matters will be dealt with later when we review his place in the social struggle.

We commented on Wedgwood's elevation to the peerage in these columns for March 1942 and described him as an Anarchist peer. Our mixture of criticism and praise revived a correspondence that had declined since 1925. It is permissible to publish now two letters that were not intended for publication at the time.

Writing from the House of Lords, on April 14, 1942, Wedgwood said:—

House of Lords.
14/4/42.

My dear Guy Aldred,—You say don't reply; but you write so pleasingly that you know I must say thank you. Neither your comrades of the Strickland Press nor you need lose sleep over Lord Vansittart. The Duke is, I think, in greater danger! He stands too fearlessly for principle and identifies himself too much with the well-being of the oppressed, and has too little respect for status, to please his own class. You are a known menace; he is an unexpected and incalculable one. And he has no working class backing. I like the idea of being defended against your attacks by Arnold or Ponsonby. I do have great fun.

Yours,

WEDGWOOD.

Wedgwood was suffering greatly. He knew that his hold on life was very frail. Every speech he made took a toll of the days that remained to him. And he loved life and energy. He wanted to enjoy an irresponsible fearless individualism of utterance. It required a brave patience to suffer such mockery of his will to live in a boisterous free expression. For he believed what was termed irresponsible politics, untied freedom of utterance, was, in time of crises, the most responsible of all expression. Notwithstanding this mortal disappointment, the letter Wedgwood wrote to us on May 24, 1942, was typically Wedgwood in its happy lightness of style and whimsical cynicism.

Wedgwood wrote:—

House of Lords.
24/5/42.

My dear Guy Aldred,—Your praise is deserved but verges on flattery. I don't mind. My wife is beginning to agree with you,—a very pleasant conversion. If you ever print my eloquent exhortation to their lordships, as I hope you one day will, you might correct the sentence in the report to which I have drawn your attention.

The Duke will be all right when more at home and able to jeer. At present he takes himself too seriously and has just reached the Labour Party in 1937. Defence is a fatal as well as a foolish policy. Nobody cares what the Duke thinks about himself. We all care what others think about us. And we judge our neighbour by what others say about him. We do not live in an age of worth but one of pomp, class, and status. The Duke surrenders his status from simplicity and belief in the power of democracy. His sincerity and abandonment handicaps him in his struggle against the hypocrisy and cynicism of entrenched interest. Righteousness bores the average man but aggressiveness commands his attention. The Duke must become aggressive and develop a method of vital attack if his opposition to war is to become effective.

Yours,

WEDGWOOD.

Wedgwood had a great regard for Emma Goldman and took the chair at her South Place London Meeting on Thursday, January 29, 1925. We criticised that meeting in "The Commune." February, 1925, Vol. II., No. 6, pages 57-60. There is no need to reproduce the criticism. Suffice to say that the audience that applauded Emma Goldman in 1925 would lynch her to-day, in its regard for Stalin, who upholds private property, rank distinctions in the army, honours the orthodox church, and has revived Czarist orders of merit for service to the state. Sovietism scared them in 1925 and they applauded Emma Goldman. Sovietism is their ally and defender to-day. They are scared no longer. They have no time for persons who style themselves Anti-Militarists and Anarchists. Emma Goldman died on May 14, 1940, a sadly disillusioned propagandist.

Passing on, the moving finger wrote the epitaph of a great colleague of Emma Goldman, Dr. Ben L. Reitman, on March 16, 1942. He was 63 years of age. Reitman died in Chicago. Despite the fact that he lived as a hobo and an outlaw Anarchist propagandist for many years, he was really a physician, and a very able physician at that.

In their obituary notices, the New York dailies sketched his career in Chicago since 1904. For some reason they overlooked his activities in New York, when he was associated intimately with the propaganda of Emma Goldman. Reitman came in for a great deal of public persecution in New York. Also, he was mobbed and tortured in San Diego, California, in 1912. We told the story at length at the time in the columns of the "Herald of Revolt." It is a story of dastardly outrage and one that disgraces the political traditions of the United States.

In New York, Reitman assumed the title "King of the Hobos." This description stuck. In East Broadway he organised a meeting of "outcasts" and made a speech, introducing the speakers, which was denounced as indecent by Ryan Walker, the United States radical illustrator who died in Russia in 1932.

Reitman visited London in 1910, where we lived then, and became most active in the Anarchist propaganda we were conducting in London at that time. He contributed his impressions to Emma Goldman's New York magazine, "Mother Earth," for October, 1910. This article was entitled "A Visit to London." One passage read:—

With me at all times was a wonderful boy, Guy Aldred, an Anarchist. Although a bit too precocious for his age, and too prolific in his devotion to the use of the pen, he is nevertheless very remarkable. A brilliant speaker, enthusiastic and daring, he is the mainstay of the public agitation carried on in London now. Guy Aldred has just paid his toll to the British Bull for his connection with the Indian propaganda. His great zeal and fire should serve as a lesson that prisons do not "reform." Would to goodness we had such inspiring workers here. It might help to put a little life in some of the American parlour radicals. Guy Aldred, and his companion, Rose, both through their spirit to each other and their solidarity to me, have shown me the beauty of true comradeship.
